Publisher's Notes.

Read Them All!

These words from the warm-hearted workers of the W. C. T. U. They are only a tithe of the number that we could print. Note the one from Montana.

Lend yourself to this enthusiasm. Just one new name with $1.00 (more if you will get them) will entitle you to the picture of Miss Willard providing we get 15,000 new names

Before July 4th!

Worth working for? You will say so when you see the picture. It will be the work, in all probability, of Prang & Co., and that statement, of itself, is a guarantee of the superexcellence of the work We have been asked, "How can you afford to offer so much?" We could not possibly afford it except by an edition of 20,000 or more pictures. By modern processes these will all be equal to the original, and the utmost care will be taken to have this picture as near perfect as it can be made.

Only One Month

Left for action! But with over 80,000 people to act how the response could be made!

and old methods are not the easiest by far. Many people travel them because they have not tried the better way. DEMOREST, GEORGIA.

IN THE HEALTHY HIGHLANDS.

No Malaria, no Mosquitoes, no Saloons. Best climate in the United States for all-the-year-round residence.

SPLENDID PROGRESS.

Started late in 1889 with no population or improvements, the development already made is surprising. Five factories are building, and several companies organized to build others. No booms, but steady, substantial progress. A knitting factory company is organized, the stock to be all owned, and entire business managed by women. It will pay large profits. Those who want homes in a "clean city," where the rumshop, brothel and gambling den are perpetually excluded, should buy soon, as prices are rapidly advancing.

PROFITABLE INVESTMENT.

Stock in the Demorest Home, Mining and Improvement Company will pay large profits. There are also good opportunities to make paying investments in several manufacturing enterprises. For full information address

TO MOTHERS.

If for any reason you cannot nurse your child, we can assure you positively that there is but one Food that is practically a perfect imitation of Mother's Milk in composition and digestibility, and that is LACTO-PREPARATA. It is made wholly from milk.

All manufacturers of Infant Food make the broad claim that theirs is the best, but few, if any, tell how it is made or of what it is composed for the facts told to any intelligent person would condemn most of them.

CARNRICK'S SOLUBLE FOOD contains 62 1-2 per cent. of Powdered Milk and 37 1-2 per cent. of wheat. Both the milk and wheat are partially digested. It is especially adapted for Infants from six months upwards, and for Invalids, Aged People and Dyspeptics.

Before you take the risk of trying any other Food, do not fail to send to us for a pamphlet of 64 pages entitled Our Baby's First and Second Years, by Marion Harland, which also gives a minute description of Lacto-Preparata and Carnrick's Soluble Food and their mode of manufacture. Sent Free.

Read the above pamphlet and then ask your Physician which Foods are the nearest approach to mother's milk.

Signal Notes.

LET us take care how we speak of those who have fallen on life's field. Help them up—don't heap scorn upon them. We did not see the conflict; we do not know the scars.—The Reformer.

MR. GLADSTONE, in a letter on the licensing question, says that the mere introduction in Parliament of the License Bill, which provides for compensation for loss of licenses, has already increased the value of publicans' property to the amount of probably 50,000,000 pounds. The measure, he says, is the heaviest blow ever struck at the cause of temperance.

THE Salvation Army's "Two days with God" crowded the immense Free Trade Hall, Manchester, England.

AN Illinois correspondent writes thus: "The Rev. J. M. Mailley, a student of Garrett Biblical Institute at Evanston, Ill., gave a very interesting temperance lecture in the city hall of Aurora, Wednesday evening, May 21. Our people seldom have the opportunity of listening to so eloquent and logical a speaker. The W. C. T. U., under whose auspices he came, and all good temperance people join in pronouncing him not only a very pleasant speaker, but one whose arguments are clear and convincing, and one calculated to do a great deal of good in the work. Any of our unions would do well to secure him for a lecture. We hope to have him again in the near future."

MRS. JOSEPHINE K. HENRY, former president of the Versailles, Ky., W. C. T. U., is nominated by the Prohibitionists for the responsible and lucrative office of clerk of the court of appeals. This is the first time that a woman has been nominated for a state office in that state; indeed, few have been thus nominated in any state. The press of Kentucky predict a largely increased prohibition vote. Could the white-ribbon element be represented in the judiciary department of the Bourbon State, it would give great impetus to the work. Doubtless Prohibitionists and white-ribboners appreciate this fact, and will rally to the support of Mrs. Henry in the coming campaign.

THE State Prohibition Executive Committee of Mississippi have recently issued a proclamation urging the election of the ablest and best men to the Constitutional Convention to be held on the 12th of August, and stating that the whisky men of the state are seeking to control it (the committee). "We favor an article in the new Constitution to the effect that no new saloon, gambling house, house of prostitution, or lottery, shall ever be legalized in the state. All efforts to regulate the traffic have signally failed. Saloons are essentially lawless, and they are the nesting places of gambling, thieving, murder and prostitution. They have no proper place in a civilized state. It is better for the Convention to recognize its duty to protect the homes of the people, and make an end of the struggle now—for the question will never be settled till it be settled right. The saloon has long been a dominating and corrupting influence in politics, and must be eliminated, for the liquor traffic is satisfied with nothing less than the full control of the government in the interest of its destructive work. We specially recommend and urge—1, Vote for no man whose character and record is not approved by the best people who know him. 2, Vote for no man who is in sympathy with the whisky combine, gambling hells, lottery swindles, stews, or the saloons, the foster-mother of the quartette."

MISS A. C. ASHTON, secretary of the Asheville W. C. T. U. Assembly, is working hard to make that gathering a success. She sends out a ringing circular asking the coöperation of each local union in the Southern states to send one dollar towards defraying expenses, and to work up such an interest as shall insure a large attendance. The first object of the Assembly is for instruction in methods of Bible study and of W. C. T. U. work, Dean Wright having charge of the former division and Miss West of the latter. There will also be lectures and entertainments. Miss Willard, Miss Anna Gordon, Miss Griffin, of Georgia, Miss Scovel, Mrs. Chapin and others will be on the program. Asheville is both a pleasure and a health resort, at an altitude which makes its summer climate delightful. Special rates of board, at from five to six dollars per week, have been secured for delegates, and efforts are being made to secure reduced railroad rates. The Assembly opens Monday evening, July 21, and continues ten days. Further information can be obtained by addressing Miss Anna C. Ashton, 63 Church street, Asheville, N. C.

MR. LUCIEN HAGANS.

"How is the strong staff broken and the beautiful rod!" A great shock has come to our office in the death of Mr. Lucien Hagans, husband of the treasurer of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association. From the very inception of our work he has been our strong staff. In those early days of struggle and difficulties he was our ever ready and ever wise counselor. The directors scarcely ever held a meeting without finding his presence necessary, and never was it asked in vain. A successful business man of large experience, his advice was invaluable; and the fact that he had retired from active business life gave him what so few men as competent as he possess—time to render the assistance required. He was not only our business adviser, but our genial, warm-hearted friend. His beautiful home was ever open to us; its delightful walks were named for officers of our board; and never did he seem more happy than when taking us through the beautiful grounds of Hawthorne. We have knelt with him around his family altar from which arose daily prayers for the success of THE UNION SIGNAL, and when the news came that he had passed "through the gates into the city," our first thought was, "One less on earth to pray for us." His last illness was long and distressing, but the end came suddenly. The Master called and he gladly responded. With him, to live had been Christ; to die was gain.

Into the sacred sorrow of that home, where wife and only son sit desolate, we may not penetrate; yet we know the loving presence of Jesus illumines its gloom, and the promised Comforter binds up the bruised hearts. The tender sympathy and prayers of thousands are with our treasurer in this hour of sore bereavement, and as she shall take up, alone, the burden of life, which he has always so tenderly and lovingly helped her to bear, may the Everlasting Arms be about her.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

The Illinois Supreme Court has decided that buying on margins is gambling.

Southampton, Long Island, celebrated the 250th anniversary of its settlement June 12.

Miss H. L. Reed, of the Annex, has been awarded the Sargent prize at Howard University.

The Presbyterian General Assembly formally recognized the usefulness of the order of deaconesses.

Charles Francis Eastman, a full-blooded Sioux, is one of the last graduates of Boston University, in medicine.

Harriet Hosmer has completed her model of Lincoln for the Cregier statue; it promises to be the greatest work of her life.

In response to the request of our Sunday-school department, Miss Willard has been given a place on the International Sunday School Convention.

A memorial tablet to Professor Guyot has just been erected at Princeton College; it is set in a stone deposited on his father's farm in Switzerland by glacial action.

Governor Fifer has called an extra session of the Illinois Legislature to pass needed legislation allowing Chicago to increase its bonded indebtedness for carrying on the Columbian Fair.

Of the four graduates of the Woman's Mutual College who entered the competitive examinations for the Philadelphia Hospital, three passed successfully. Of the twenty-five applicants from the University of Pennsylvania, thirteen passed.

The Council of the University of the city of New York has decided to form a Woman's Advisory Committee of twelve representative women to coöperate for the encouragement of advanced study by women.

Judge Rayburn, Armstrong county, Pennsylvania, has decided in favor of the agent of the Cincinnati Brewing Company, in the case brought against him for opening an original package store in Leechburg, a prohibition town, in a prohibition county.

INTERESTING letters from Mrs. Poole and Mr. Hall, completing report of the National Temperance Congress, are received too late for insertion; they will be given next week.

The Independent says: "We do not doubt that the boys were drunk who, while noisily celebrating Harvard's base-ball victory over Yale, the other night, nearly ruined the statute of the man after whom the university was named, and painted their profanity on the plaza of Memorial Hall. Their drunken condition aggravates their offense, and we heartily wish the police had arrested them. Why do not the police attend to such noisy ruffians?" Why not?

A GENERAL Missionary Conference at Shanghai, China, is considering the awful curse of the opium traffic to that country. Two missionaries from India are in attendance, who brought to the Viceroy, Li Hung Chang, the Indian Memorial, signed by over ten thousand Christians, including eight hundred missionaries, asking that the Tien-Tsin Treaty, so far as it relates to the sale of opium, be repealed, and one enacted prohibiting the legalized importation of opium into China.

THE Ohio Valley Prohibition Assembly at Moundsville, West Va., opens July 4, and continues until July 14. Our good friend, Hon. T. R. Carskadon, of Keyser, West Va., is president, Hon. Frank Burt, vice-president, Rev. C. H. Mead, secretary, and James W. Bodly, treasurer. Its amphitheatre has a seating capacity of 5,500 persons, and its program has drawing power enough to fill it. It is this Assembly which gives kindly welcome to the W. C. T. U. School of Methods, conducted by Mrs. C. B. Buell.

THE Central Union, Chicago, has moved its restaurant from its basement quarters into elegant rooms, 69 Washington street, and Thursday had a grand opening there. Preparations were made for two hundred guests, but at noon there was such a rush that hundreds were turned away. While in the old quarters this restaurant won a name for having the best cooked victuals in the city, and now that it has pleasant surroundings, on a prominent business street, its patronage will doubtless be proportionate to the excellence of its cuisine. All must wish for it unbounded success, as its profits go to sustain the many Christian philanthropies of the Central Union, which are seeking to make bright some of the darkest portions of this city.

MR. GLADSTONE has been understood as in favor of a restricted sale of intoxicating liquor in England, but in the House of Commons he sustained Sir Wilfrid Lawson in his opposition to the licensing question. Sir Wilfrid said: "The country had hitherto pensioned men for killing enemies of the nation. The bill under discussion would pension those who were daily active in killing their fellow countrymen." Mr. Gladstone gave the government advocate credit for sincerity in desiring to lessen the evils of the liquor trade; but the means proposed were utterly futile and extremely dangerous. Public opinion was fast rising against the liquor traffic, and the liquor party should remember the power of that opinion to overthrow them."

SELDOM has a more hopeful sight gladdened the eye than that of the seven thousand earnest, enthusiastic Christians gathered in Music Hall, St. Louis, at the annual meeting of the Christian Endeavor Society. One can hardly help envying the emotions of President Clark as he looked into those eager young faces and thought into what a great tree the little seed of his planting has grown. To-day the Y. P. S. C. E. numbers 660,000, an army strong enough to take the world for Christ. At the close of the first session there were 8,100 delegates registered. The exercises were of intense interest, the themes discussed were extremely practical and handled with masterly skill, by such speakers as Dr. Tiffany, Dr. Wayland Hoyt, Minneapolis, Rev. J. N. McLean, of California, Professor Harper, Rev. T. S. Hamlin, and many others. The association appreciates the value of good literature as is shown by the fact that the receipts of its publishing department for the year are $34,383.26. The next year's meeting is to be in Minneapolis.

BEING criticised for her recommendation of Edward Bellamy's "Looking Backward," Miss Willard, in a letter to a friend, made the following explanation: "In respect to Bellamy's book I very much regret the deficiencies to which you refer, but the book is like a hand upon the rocking stone—it jogs people's minds, and it was for that I valued it. We do not subscribe to everything between the covers of any book that we may recommend. Nor did I content myself with being sorry that Mr. Bellamy had introduced wine and tobacco into his story and left Christianity and woman out. I have written him and labored with him, not perhaps so much because I thought it would do any good as to free my own mind. He is a charming fellow, the son of a Baptist minister, and I think full of good intentions; possibly somewhat of a recoil against the strict Calvinistic theology so that he would pay his attention to Christianity in action rather than as a theory. Take him by and large, I think that he is doing good, and it was in capacity that I recommended him."

FRIDAY night the British House of Commons witnessed a most exciting debate upon the Government's Licensing Bill. Gladstone led the opposition, making the points that this bill does establish the principle of compensation; that the name applied to it—the publicans' endowment bill—accurately denotes its nature; that its presentation by the government has enhanced the value of all publicans' establishments, and if it becomes a law it would establish the principle that licenses might be bought up by money from the public treasury at prices virtually fixed by the license holders; that the amendment proposed ostensibly to guard against this danger really means the endowment of a gigantic interest at the expense of the public purse, and that the success of the plan would entirely paralyze all hope of reducing the number of public houses without ruinous cost to the country. Mr. Goschen, Chancellor of Exchequer, defended the bill; Sir William Harcourt and Sir George Trevelyan spoke against it, the latter characterizing it as the worst proposal of the kind ever submitted to Parliament. The bill was finally rejected by a vote of 275 to 243. The government has consented to the appointment of a committee to examine into the question of compensation in connection with the licensing bill. The Chronicle praises Lord Salisbury's moral courage in allowing the appointment of this committee.

WE have conscientiously refrained from noticing the misrepresentations of the non-partisans, but one which is being persistently made by Miss Mary F. Lathrop, on the Pacific Coast, is of so grave a nature that common justice demands its denial. She appeared before several ministers' meetings in San Francisco, asserted that THE UNION SIGNAL denied the inspiration of the Scripture, read garbled extracts from this paper attempting to prove it, and that I indorsed it, and the National Union indorsed me, therefore the National Union is infidel. The simple facts are, the extract was taken from a note in a symposium giving both sides of the question in regard to the Bible authority for woman's public ministry. The author makes a series of interrogations, and closes with a statement of her own views. We never gave indorsement of these views, so that even had they been, as they are not, what Miss Lathrop represents, no fair judgment could impute them to THE UNION SIGNAL. Secondly, the National Union's indorsement of me, which she quotes as though made in this connection, and for this specific purpose, was that given at the New York convention, and referred to another specific action. Third, the lady who wrote the objectionable article is Miss Amy T. Mace, one of the most pronounced non-partisans in this state, so that if her sentiments are objectionable, the non-partisans, not the National Union, or THE UNION SIGNAL, are responsible for them. That the lady in question uses such measure and catches at such straws in her attempts to vilify the W. C. T. U. shows to what extremities she is brought in order to find material for her attacks.

THOU KNOWEST.

BY HELEN B. RANDOLPH.

Father, thou knowest that I walk before thee
In the dark way that thou hast set for me,
Repentant, humbled; fervently desiring
To do thy perfect will, nor stray from thee.
But I am tired; Father, do thou strengthen,
For heavy grows the weight of pain I bear.
Take thou my burden while the shadows lengthen;
"My child, I placed it there."

Father, thou knowest all; the tender yearning
For human sympathy, though thou art nigh.
When, faint and worn, on my lone pathway turning
I stretch to thee my trembling hands, and cry
"Place them, my Father, in some safe enfolding
Of earthly love, whose touch shall warm the frown
Of death that chilled them." 'Tis thy voice replying
"I love, yet strike them down."

Father, thou knowest all; the sad foreboding,
Lest, when I gain thy far-off home at last,
Too late from earth to have caught the glow of heaven
I stand unrecognized amid the vast Celestial multitude, my cry unheard
In ears that list angelic harmony,
And wait for lips, that, busy with thy word,
Are slow to welcome me.

O Thou whose love hath shaped and placed my burden,
Yet giveth strength for this my journey lone,
Thou who dost strike my hands from earthly clasping
That thou mayst fold them safe within thine own,
Thou'lt know me, Father, and with glad up-springing
My soul shall stretch her wings and fly to thee,
Hearing thy voice in tenderest accents ringing—
"Come home, my child, to me."

Lincoln, Ills.

JUNO.

BY MRS. ANNA A. PRESTON.

"Lie down, Juno!" and the fine looking, but somewhat seedy young man struck the restless English terrier a sharp blow across the face with his slouch hat.

"Don't treat the creature like that, Ned; she knows more than her master this minute," said young Dr. Miller, who was passing through Cale Rogers' gilded saloon, as the nearest way from the street to an upper room where the widow Hall, a poor but worthy woman, who had charge of the premises, was just then his patient.

"Prove it, Doc," said Ned Grant, the dog's master, in a maudlin tone, replacing his hat on his ill-kempt head.

"I've no time to waste words," replied the young doctor as he pulled off his gloves and warmed his white, soft, shapely hands by the flaming open wood fire.

"But your words, providing they are of weight, shall not be wasted. Convince me that the dog knows more than I do, and I'll sign the pledge, as you have so often asked me to do."

"So will I," put in Cale Rogers, who was always trying to conciliate the young doctor. "To my thinking that pup is a vicious, cross-grained brute. If I wasn't afraid of her I wouldn't allow her in the saloon."

"She was charged with the care of Ned Grant, so she follows where he leads," replied the doctor, "but she knows enough to keep sober and to go home at a reasonable hour on a cold, stormy February night like this. She knows that a blow across her face is an insult. Look at the poor thing, how crest-fallen she is! It always makes me melancholy to see a dumb creature with so much intelligence; it gives me a vague sort of a belief in the transmigration of souls. You are a lady, Juno, and whatever your master may once have been, he has evidently forgotten, under present affiliations, how to treat a 'lady' with respect."

"Thank you, Doc, for your compliment to the dog. She is a lady. Good girl, Juno!" and the dejected look gave place to an animated appearance as the creature wagged her short tail and straightway began again softly pulling with her sharp teeth at her master's sleeve, trying to coax him to go home.

She looked wistfully after the young doctor as he left the room, and the red-faced barber who stood with one elbow hitched up on the marble slab of the bar, against which he was leaning, posing for his own benefit evidently, as he never left off gazing at his reflection in the plate-glass mirror over the fire-place, said, with a hoarse laugh:

"The young doctor has a family liking for that dorg, I suppose. 'Taint so very long since his sister never set foot outdoor without her."

No one spoke or smiled. Every one looked at Ned Grant, who pulled himself together, gathered his feet and stout stick at an obtuse angle that made locomotion possible, and, bracing himself for the effort, got himself out the door with the anxious terrier at his heels.

"You ortn't to hev said that," spoke up Starkey, the blacksmith; "even the truth harn't ter be spoken at all times."

"What is the 'truth'?" asked Frank Wilds, the new druggist's clerk; "I've heard something of that sort hinted at a dozen times since I have been in the village, but no one comes out with the whole story."

"I don't know as it can be called much of a story," went on the barber, gratified at being questioned, and hitching up the other elbow; "but the facts are that Ned Grant and Miss Emma Miller were engaged to be married long ago, when they were both in the High School, and expected to be married as soon as Ned's business was good enough to warrant his taking a family on his hands. But after he got to drinking so like a fish, proceedings were delayed. One day Miss Emma was tripping along the street, and all at once she came upon Ned Grant, flat in the gutter. He had just come out of this saloon with a bigger load than he could carry, and some one had shoved him off the walk, and there he lay with quite a crowd of hoodlums around, laughing and jeering at him. I stood in my shop door and saw it all. She is a pretty girl, the loveliest girl I ever saw, and she came hurrying as if she dreaded to pass this corner, and with her face turned the other way. It must have been an awful shock when she came upon Ned lying there. I don't suppose she had any idea that he ever got down like that, but she is a lady all through; she didn't faint, nor cry out, nor look disgusted. She just turned to the dorg that was close beside her, as he always was in them days, and said, 'Juno, stay here and take care of our friend.' The obedient creature did as she was told, and hasn't left him day nor night since. Of course the dorg was well acquainted with Ned, and there hain't much doubt in my mind but what she understands pretty much all about the whole affair. She's a dretful knowing critter. Anyhow, Ned is safe where she is; there wouldn't nobody dare ter lay hands on him, drunk or sober, with that dorg within call."

An hour later, as the snow had ceased to fall, and a piercing wind tore the heavy clouds in shreds, allowing a few pale stars to be seen, the young doctor hurrying along the deserted street saw rushing upon him from an alley way the same tawny English terrier. With a sharp yelp of joy she threw herself groveling in his path.

He pulled off his glove and passed his hand caressingly over her face, saying gently: "What is it, Juno, my lady? Are you in trouble? Did you know the sound of my step? That must have been so. Where is poor Ned?"

At the sound of his reassuring, questioning voice, the dog jumped up and ran, whining, round the end of a large business block. The doctor followed with all haste and soon came upon her licking the pale, cold face of her master who was lying insensible in the snow.

"This is pitiful," said the young doctor; "the man has fallen below the level of his dog. I cannot lift him, and you cannot help me, Juno."

As he started to run for assistance, the dog thinking herself deserted, set up a piteous outcry.

"Be quiet, Juno. Keep guard, I'm coming back," and the faithful creature crouched again beside the insensible form.

But a few rods away he found the village patrolman, told his story and received the reply: "I should not dare go near him, Doctor. The dog would throttle me."

"Not by any means, if your intentions were kindly, and I would trust Juno every time to judge. Come, we'll carry the poor fellow to Cale Rogers' saloon. It's the nearest point where we are sure of a good fire, and it is, all things considered, the most appropriate place."

They lifted the limp form between them, and with the dog following closely, soon deposited their burden in front of the crackling hickory wood fire on a soft couch Cale Rogers kept for his own comfort, and which he vacated to open the door in response to their demand to enter.

No sooner was a pillow adjusted beneath the poor fellow's head than Juno leaped to a place beside him and remained there keeping sleepless vigil.

"I warn you to take that vicious brute and her drunken master out of here in short order," blustered Cale Rogers.

"And I warn you to touch them at your peril," replied the young doctor, calmly.

"It will ruin my business to have this room given over for a hospital!"

"On the contrary, I should think it would be an excellent advertisement of what the stuff you sell here can do for a man. Should he die here, as I do not know but he may, for he has evidently received a concussion of the brain by falling and hitting his head against the ice when staggering home from your saloon, where he spent the whole of yesterday, you would doubtless enjoy a wide notoriety; and at all events when it is known that he is here and under what conditions, I fancy you will receive more calls and from people of a different class than you have ever had before."

Indeed, that prophecy came true, for when it was known that Ned Grant was lying insensible in Cale Rogers' saloon, watched by his faithful dog, everybody came to look upon the pathetic sight.

Ned Grant had been born and brought up in the borough, his parents died when he was a mere lad, leaving him a small property invested in a snug little book and stationery store, and this business Ned, who was a favorite with every one, carried successfully forward.

No liquor had been sold in the town for many years until a new railroad and several new business enterprises brought in a great many new inhabitants and a variety of so-called "improvements." Among these was a petition for license to sell liquor in the warrant for the next town meeting.

There was a fierce battle between the old residents and the new element, but the new-comers, together with a few of the old property owners who had buildings to rent, won the day, and drunkard-making went on apace.

Cale Rogers, who was called one of the most public-spirited of the new-comers, fitted up his "gilt-edged saloon" next door to Ned Grant's dainty little store. He coveted the pleasant, sunny, corner room for his tobacco counter, and at once determined to get possession of it. At first, a door had been opened through, then cigars took the place of the bric-a-brac show-case, and presently, before any of Ned's friends mistrusted what was going on, a billiard table occupied the corner book-store, and the whole business belonged to Cale Rogers.

For a time Ned was employed about the place, but soon his suddenly acquired intemperate habits so grew upon him as to unfit him for any position of trust, and for some time he had been an idler about town, living, no one could tell how, but protected from insult or injury, whatever his condition might be, by his faithful Juno.

Dr. Miller alone could have told who paid for the poor, misguided fellow's board at a quiet little cottage standing at the head of the lane in which he had been picked up insensible on that inclement night.

Dr. Miller had been the most indignant of Ned's friends at his ruin, moral and financial, by Cale Rogers. He alone had been faithful in his efforts to win him back to the ways of rectitude. It was young Dr. Miller now who prompted all the best of the old residents to go to Cale Rogers' saloon and look at the pale, still face of their old favorite.

It was nearly time to vote for license again. There would be another sharp contest. The gilt-edged saloon was the headquarters of the liquor faction, and Ned's sojourn there happened at a most inopportune time for them.

Of all the old residents, dubbed by the new-comers, "the aristocracy," who came and went and lingered by the silent pair, no one noticed or addressed the proprietor of the place, who sat gloomily in the corner, from time to time throwing a hickory log upon the crackling fire. They petted poor Juno, they commiserated her master; they said what a good boy he had always been, what a brisk business he was doing, what a fine family he belonged to. They expressed their mind very freely regarding the wicked shame of having their clean, pretty, pleasant town polluted by rum-holes, and ridiculed the "smartness" of those politicians who graded the prosperity of the town by the brisk business done at these places.

They spoke very gently of poor Emma Miller, who was teaching at a distance, and told how sweetly and patiently she had met the trial of her lover's downfall.

Just at twilight, the long, western express came trailing into the station, and three minutes later, to every one's surprise, Emma Miller came softly into the room with her brother.

At sight of her Juno sprang down from the couch for the first time and leaped upon her with a cry that brought tears to every eye.

The lovely girl went forward and bent over the pale, set face. At the dog's cry of joy, he stirred and moved for the first time since he had been brought in. Juno sprang upon the couch and stood looking down at him, as much as to say, that now her mistress had come, all would be well.

Poor Ned opened his eyes and was first conscious of the dog. Then looking from her eloquent eyes into the face of the doctor, he said:

"I'll keep my word, Doc. I'm convinced the dog knows more than I do. I'll sign the pledge."

It was a faint voice, not much more than a whisper, but the saloon keeper, who was sitting with his elbows on his knees and his head in his hands, heard it, and said:

"I'll keep my word, also. I'll sign the pledge. I'll give up this business. I'll return Ned every penny I've cheated him out of, and start him in his former business in his old quarters; and I'll do more than that—I'll vote no license, as this young lady would if she could vote, and as Juno would, for I am convinced she knows more and has more humanity than half the men who will cast their votes for license in this town next week."

"I will keep my word, also," said Emma Miller next day when her lover was allowed to talk a little. "If you sign the pledge I will marry you without waiting to see if you are to 'hold out.' I am as sure you will as I am that we should have been spared all this sad experience had I been sensible enough to marry you long ago on our small means, for I know you were first led into the tempter's toils by the hope of making money faster and sooner to make a home for me."

Ned was carried to the polls the next week on his couch, and Juno went also, bravely decorated with ribbons. The pair were greeted with cheers of enthusiasm, and wonderful stories were told of the intelligent dog's amiable demeanor toward members of the temperance party.

That was the last of license in that town. The gilt-edged saloon was turned into a coffee house, and the old residents once more take pride in the clean, pure, wholesome atmosphere of their beautiful town.

Juno is an old, fat, much-petted dog, lying on her soft rug in a sunny window of the corner book-store, receiving the honors showered upon her with a knowing wimple of her short nose, and a lazy wag of her stumpy tail, as much as to say that she perfectly understands what people are saying when they tell how she saved her master, and saved the honor of the fine old town.

TWELVE REASONS WHY WOMEN WANT TO VOTE.

BY ALICE STONE BLACKWELL.

1. Because it is fair and right that those who obey the laws should have a voice in making them, and that those who pay taxes should have a voice as to the amount of the tax and the way in which it shall be spent. Harriet Beecher Stowe says: "If the principle on which we founded our government is true, that taxation must not be without representation, and if women hold property and are taxed, it follows that women should be represented in the state by their votes. I think the state can no more afford to dispense with the aid of women in its affairs than the family."

2. Because it is the quietest, easiest, most dignified and least conspicuous way of influencing public affairs. It takes much less expenditure of time, labor and personal presence to go up to the ballot box, drop in a slip of paper and come away, than to stand all day at the polls offering coffee and entreaties to a miscellaneous crowd of voters. Above all, the ballots would be effectual; the coffee and entreaties too often are not.

3. Because it would elevate and broaden women's minds to take part of the spare time which they now spend on fancy-work, wax flowers, crazy quilts and gossip, and devote it to the study of public questions. It would make them more intelligent companions for their husbands, and broader-minded mothers for their children. If women understood politics, a man would not be obliged to leave his wife and go down to the store of an evening in order to find some one with whom to talk over the questions in which he is most interested.

4. Because it would increase women's influence. Mrs. Zerelda G Wallace, "the mother of Ben Hur," lately said, speaking of the exclusion of women from all voice in regard to public affairs: "Think of the effect of this dishonor upon the boys of the land. The mother tries to teach her boy that he must be pure, and temperate, and honorable. That boy goes out from his mother, and the first thing he meets with neutralizes and gives the lie to all his mother's teachings. He says to himself, 'Why, mother says so and so;' but he finds men in high places violating all those teachings, and he begins to conclude that his mother does not know much about it. From that minute the boy discounts his mother's judgment, and though she must still have a hold on his affections, she does not have a hold upon him in any other way. There is where you wrong us, gentlemen, and cripple us in training men who will make the statesmen of this nation. If you want us to make statesmen, you must give the women an interest in the government, and you must count their opinions."

5. Because it would result in the election of better men to office. In Wyoming, soon after the passage of the woman suffrage law, a man was elected who was popular with his party, but who was a secret drinker. After his election he grew more careless, went into saloons openly, and was several times seen on the street the worse for liquor. The politicians of his party did not care. When his term was out, they re-nominated him. A man came home from the caucus, and his wife asked him who the candidate was. He told her. "Why," she said, "that man cannot possibly be elected." "Why not?" asked her husband in surprise. The wife made no answer, but she put on her sunbonnet and went out and talked with the woman next door over the fence. The woman next door then put on her sunbonnet, and went out and talked with her next neighbor; and so they passed the word all through the town. The women held no caucus, made no public demonstration, but when election day came the intemperate candidate found himself defeated. He knew he had done nothing to make him lose caste with his party, and he could not understand his defeat until one of his lady friends said to him very quietly, "We could not let you go back; you were setting a bad example to our boys." In Wyoming, both parties have come to recognize the necessity of nominating their best men, or, at least, not nominating bad men, if they wish to succeed.

6. Because, under our present system, bad women have too much influence in politics. A member of the Michigan legislature once told Rev Anna Shaw that if women voted, the bad women would have to vote. She answered: "There is a certain row of houses close to the capitol at Lansing, and you know by what sort of women those houses are occupied every year during the session of the legislature; and you know that their influence is a formidable factor in determining legislation. If women could vote, a class of men would be chosen to office who are not so susceptible to the influence of bad women." The bad women are too few in number, in comparison with the good women, to exert much influence merely by their votes But our public officers are elected by men alone, and are responsible for their official acts to a constituency composed of men alone. Public opinion on social questions is comparatively lax among men. Hence, men of notoriously immoral character are often chosen to positions of high public trust, and they appoint others like themselves. Witness the case of Sheriff Flack of New York. Such men, of course, are open to the influence of bad women, who are thus able to exert a power out of all proportion to their numbers. Let the great mass of good mothers, wives and sisters have a voice in choosing our representatives, and a higher class of men will be chosen, who will not be under the sway of bad women. Women want to vote in order that the good women may have more influence in politics than the bad ones.

7. Because women want to protect their business interests. As farmers need votes in order that they may represent the farming interests, and manufacturers in order that they may represent the manufacturing interests, so women need votes in order that they may represent the interests of the home. For instance: A few years ago the mayor of Louisville made an effort to enforce the city ordinances against gambling-houses. He was met by a petition from leading citizens, lawyers, doctors and merchants, begging him to desist, on the ground that his action would injure the business interests of the city. Men who came to Louisville to trade expected to have "a good spree" after transacting their business. If they could not do this in Louisville, trade would go elsewhere. Not long after, the mayor of St. Paul made an effort to enforce the city ordinances against houses of ill-fame, and he was met with a similar petition from prominent citizens, protesting on the same ground—that it would injure the business interests of the city. How many of the wives of those prominent citizens do you suppose you could have got to sign such a petition? Probably most of the men who signed it were not themselves gamblers, or patrons of the other places. But they were business men, their minds were fixed on making money, and they looked mainly at the money side of the question. The mothers, too, were in business. Their business was bringing up the boys and girls to be good men and women. They knew that the gambling-houses and similar places interfered with their business—which is really the most important business of all, and the one for the sake of which all the others exist. And every mother of them would have supported the mayor—if she could. But every gambler, every loafer, every man who is absorbed in material interests to the exclusion of moral interests, has a vote with which to intimidate a mayor who tries to do his duty. The good wives and mothers have no votes with which to sustain him. Is it any wonder that city officials so often wink at violations of law, when it is not the shops or factories of a city that are endangered, but only its homes?

8. Women want to vote because politics are so corrupt. For years, good men have been trying in vain, unassisted, to purify them. They need the help and coöperation of women. The corruption of public life sets a bad example to every woman's husband; it assails the morals of her son as soon as he steps across her threshold; it takes the tax money contributed by women, and refuses to apply it to purposes which women think most useful and desirable, such as police matrons, and squanders it lavishly for things which women regard as useless or even harmful, such as great quantities of champagne at inauguration balls. It is idle to say that the political world is too corrupt for women to touch it, when it inevitably touches women at so many points. It is as if a man, in a mistaken spirit of chivalry, should refuse to let his wife lift a hand to do any housecleaning, on the ground that the house was too dirty for her to touch it, and at the same time should expect her to go on living in that same dirty house. When she saw her husband and children suffering from the effects of dirt, she would be sure to ask to be allowed to help clean things up. And to fancy that a woman can purify politics better by abstract moral disapprobation than by voting for good men and against bad ones, is like fancying that she could cleanse her house more effectually by frowning at the dirt than by taking a broom in her hand.

9. Because, in the laws now upon our statute books, the reasonable wishes of women are not adequately represented. Witness the laws which license the sale of intoxicating liquor; the laws in relation to the age of consent, which regard a little girl as mature enough to consent to her own ruin at ten or twelve years of age—in Delaware at seven; the law by which a married mother has no right to her own children as long as she lives with her husband; the law by which the husband can, by will, bequeath the custody and guardianship of the children away from their mother; the law of Massachusetts which provides a heavier penalty for stealing a fine cow than for ruining a virtuous woman by fraud and deceit. These laws were not enacted because men meant to be unjust or unkind to women, but because they looked at things simply from their own point of view. That is human nature. If women alone had made the laws, no doubt the laws would have been just as one-sided as they are now, only in the opposite direction. As we need two eyes to get a correct perspective, so we need to have both the masculine and the feminine points of view represented in legislation in order to reach a just result.

10. Because actual and cruel wrongs are every day inflicted upon women, to which woman suffrage would put an end. We have all shuddered over Dr. Kate Bushnell's account of the stockaded dens of vice in the lumber camps of Michigan and Wisconsin, where women are compelled to lead a life of shame against their will. Dr. Bushnell and others who have tried to do away with the evil, all testify that the reason such things are allowed to continue is that the officers of the law are in league with the wrong-doers. How long would such officers remain in power if their tenure of office depended in any degree upon the votes of women? No woman has all the rights she ought to want, until she has the right to say with authority that such things shall cease.

11. Because it is a maxim in war, "Always do the thing to which your enemy particularly objects." The Brewers' Convention at Chicago passed this resolution by a unanimous vote:

Resolved, That we are opposed to woman suffrage everywhere and always; for when woman has the ballot, she will vote solid for prohibition; and woman's vote is the last hope of the Prohibitionists.

You may persuade a church member that the majority of mothers would vote for dramshops; but you will never make the liquor interest believe it. "The children of darkness are wiser in their generation than the children of light."

12. Because we are more and more coming to realize the truth of Frances Willard's emphatic assertion, "The Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount are voted up or voted down upon election day." When such interests are trembling in the balance, every woman must long to cast a vote into the scale that represents purity, sobriety, and honor.

OPIUM AND IMMORALITY AND OUR DUTY CONCERNING THEM.

BY W. E. ROBBINS.

[We call especial attention to the terrible facts here given by a gentleman who knows whereof he speaks. —ED.]

Any one at all conversant with the history of sin in the world knows that vices are gregarious; like misery they love company. In almost no instance will any one form of sin be found to prevail to the exclusion of others, whether it be in the individual or in the community. The opium vice is no exception to this rule, having almost a larger train of attendant evils than any other. Of all these associated evils, whose name is legion, physical and mental, material and moral, temporal and eternal, none is more to be deplored than that which is denominated preëminently the social evil, being the one most of all that saps the very foundations of all society.

I knew something of the association of these two dreadful vices in California twenty years ago, but it was only after my arrival in Shanghai that I found them flourishing together so luxuriantly, not only unhindered and undiscouraged, but actually licensed and regulated by a community representing more than one Christian nation. Of the multitude of opium dens here I have visited quite a number, of which at least four are calculated to accommodate in the neighborhood of 1,000 smokers each at a time, and it is safe to say that each is visited of an evening by from 5,000 to 10,000 people. Among the attractions in these gilded, palatial trap doors to hell are young women and girls arrayed there for the purpose of ensnaring men and drawing them into the adjoining houses of infamy and pits of destruction.

That this may be the better understood a word of explanation is needed. The Chinese as a government never tolerated either of these vices until the opium was forced upon them by foreign arms, and even now there is nothing on their statute books in their favor, but everything against them. The penalty awarded by Chinese law for the keeper of a house used for immoral purposes is one hundred blows of the bamboo, three months of the canque (a large board around the neck with the crime and sentence written on it) and banishment to the distance of 3,000 li (1,000 English miles). The punishment for the owner of such house is from eighty to one hundred bamboo blows, two or three years' banishment and forfeiture of the house, with lesser penalties for those who know of it and do not report. Whether these sentences are generally carried out or not, the law is so deterrent that no such places are known to the public in the native city of Shanghai. When after the first opium war Shanghai was opened to foreigners and ground was leased to them for residences, the Chinese government, afraid of their influence, stipulated that no Chinese should acquire a residence on the land so allotted. When, however, the Tai-ping rebels drove so many of the Chinese into the foreign settlement for protection it was agreed that they might live in it but should not own real estate. It was further stipulated that no houses of infamy, gambling houses or theaters should be kept by them therein. I have before me now the form of official act of authorization for building, letting or leasing in the American settlement, which must in each case be procured from the United States consul and H. I. M's Intendant of Circuit, which specifically excludes the above mentioned purposes. As Article 33 of the Treaty of Wanghia in 1844 distinctly prohibited all United States subjects from engaging in the opium traffic in China, it was perhaps not thought necessary to refer to it in this authorization. This prohibition has been reiterated and emphasized in the Commercial Treaty of 1880. And yet in defiance of all these stipulations with the Chinese government, we now find 1,060 opium shops licensed by the joint municipality of the British and American settlement; united for convenience of local government, and a similar number of houses of infamy, of the female inmates of which about sixty-five are examined weekly at the lock hospital by a municipal doctor to be certified to as to their fitness for the market of lust, some of them as young as fifteen years. As an additional recommendation and security to their vile customers each girl has her photograph stitched on to her certificate.

Correspondence.

A PROHIBITIONIST ABROAD.

This is written from Smyrna, in Asia Minor. We have crossed Europe from Liverpool to Naples, and have visited Egypt, Palestine, Syria and the northeast ports of the Mediterranean. We have not seen much drunkenness on the streets. As to the reason of this there may be various explanations. The fact, however, is as stated. We have seen poverty enough and beggary enough to satisfy the most exorbitant appetite. One phase of the question which we have met deserves some consideration. A drunken man has no regard for the excitement he may create in a crowd. If a man is insane the crowd pays no attention to him; if he is sober he has some fear of prisons and penitentiaries; but if he is drunk he has no fear of the one, and is not as irresponsible as in the other case. With the antagonism which we have found in the Southern European countries, and especially in the Turkish Empire, against the government, a half-drunken man running loose on the streets would start a riot amongst other half-drunken men in five minutes any time. As a result, drunkenness is a much more dangerous political crime than it is in either British countries or in America. Distilled liquors are, therefore, scarcely manufactured at all in this section of the world. In a very large number of the interior towns the government officers prohibit people from being abroad at all after dark without a light. The whole town, therefore, must be in their houses and quiet after nightfall. This is on the theory, we are told, that these deeds of darkness are concocted after dark, and that the government police have no great trouble with the people except when they are allowed to be out of their homes after dark. I gravely doubt whether this phase of the liquor question has been sufficiently appreciated by those who have so highly extolled the sobriety of Eastern cities. The governments can no more afford to allow their discontented people to have exciting drinks than penitentiary officers can allow whisky to get among their prisoners.

As for the wines, we have tasted them where there were native wines, enough to know that they contain quite a decided quantity of alcohol. All the statements that Oriental wines will not make drunk are, according to our observation, untrue. They will make drunk, but it takes a great deal of it to do so. The reason why people here do not get drunk on wine is mainly a mechanical one. The human stomach only holds a certain amount, and it is not every stomach that will hold enough of these Oriental wines at one time for a stout man to get very drunk on it. The importance of this last consideration must never be overlooked in discussing the effect of wine in maintaining temperance in wine-growing countries. The heat at mid-day here is such that travelers and laborers both do their work in the early morning and in the later afternoon. Our party tried the process of sleeping late and riding through the day, but soon gave it up on account of its discomforts. So laborers in the fields and everywhere else here go to work pretty early in the morning and take lunch at noon, and then sleep through two or three hours in mid-day, and work again in the evening. The arguments of Peter on the day of Pentecost would still be very strong presumptive evidence in this country. At the third hour of the day (or nine o'clock a. m.), nobody has yet begun drinking, nor do they begin, ordinarily, until dinner-time, from six to nine in the evening. Here at Smyrna there is an efficient mission work done by some English philanthropists, called the "Smyrna Rest," and they report that the sailors of the Mediterranean Sea, so far as drunkenness is concerned, are the same that sailors are everywhere else.

Somebody ought to rise up and defend the water of Europe and Egypt and Palestine and Syria and the Mediterranean Sea ports. Its reputation is very bad. It is reported to be so filled with animalculæ and malaria that no human being can drink it and survive, and that an addition of alcohol in the form of wine of some kind is indispensable to the preservation of health. Some of our party have used wine through this trip as the ordinary traveler does, constantly but moderately, and they have been fairly well. Others of the party have not tasted wine at all, and they are quite as well as those who have. Others have investigated its effects in various ways, and they are of the opinion that the water of this region and the wine of this region are very much the same as water and wine are everywhere. As for ourselves, we have been able to secure milk wherever we have really wanted it, and those who wish to do so can generally avoid both the water and the wine by using either boiled water as tea, coffee and the like, or ordinary milk, either cow's milk or goat's milk.

On every hand we are informed that the old Moslem law of total prohibition is becoming more and more obsolete among the Mohammedans of this region. They are drinking Mastic and brandies, and other villainous adulterations, and old residents say that the use of them has grown very much with the last few years. This is greatly to be regretted, for we have had several instances of the tenacity with which the Mohammedans hold to their faith. When our vessel was in port at Latikia, two of us went on shore for a tour through the town. While there we somewhat thoughtlessly made quite a purchase of candies, and whenever we were asked for "back-sheesh" by the numerous children who beset our path, we responded by giving them handfuls of candy. It was generally refused. Two boys accepted the candy, and in one case I put some in the boy's mouth, but at once noticed that he took it out and handed it to another boy. Several of the very little folks refused to take it at all, and we only learned the explanation when by and by a boy answered us in Arabic, and on asking our guide what he said were told that he said he would take it if we would let him keep it until after sunset. Then the whole story was plain, for we were in the midst of the Mohammedan feast of Rammadan, and that feast is a fast from sunrise to sunset, and then is a feast all night. It was their religious fast that kept those children from eating the candy. We were told that in many of the towns workmen would go all day at their work without either eating or drinking, and then in the evening would gather in their homes with a big meal all spread and ready, and sit round it until the cannon shot which announced the sunset would turn them all loose on the provisions before them. Then they would gormandize all night. In plenty of the mosques we found men sleeping through the day, and the guide told us they were pilgrims who had been up feasting and rioting all night, and were sleeping and fasting through the day.

One thing is quite evident, that the wine trade is rapidly increasing in this region. We everywhere saw new vineyards just being started. In many sections of Syria it was only a few years ago when the wine vats were outside the houses, with liberty to passers-by to help themselves. All that is past now, and these Eastern Mediterranean ports do a large business in Lebanon wines and the wines of the different sections of Asia Minor. In Alexandretta we saw large wine shops with the big earthen wine jars open and accessible to customers. These big wine jars would hold, perhaps, as much as half a barrel. My suspicion is that drugged cigarettes will, by and by, come to be as much of an evil in this region as any other. It is so easy to insert a little opium into cigarettes, and it so largely promotes their sale that the temptation to do so is very great; and the report that it is done increasingly is abroad in this region.

GEO. P. HAYS, D. D.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE IN SOUTH DAKOTA.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—South Dakota will vote November 4th on the pending constitutional amendment proposing the enfranchisement of all women, on the same terms as men now enjoy the privilege of suffrage. Thus early in the season much work has been done, and great interest is being taken. The Dakotans are experienced in amendment work, having shown themselves capable of herculean tasks successfully accomplished in recent moral reforms. I have not been an enthusiast in believing a popular vote a sure method of securing woman suffrage within state lines. It is not to be expected that women can educate the prejudiced, the ignorant, the drunkard, the wife-beater, in short, the great unwashed constituency in the time usually allotted for a campaign to secure a majority vote for their enfranchisement. I believe this never can be accomplished in the older states where large cities exist. These must look to the same methods to liberate women as were applied to the colored men. This must come about by a National Constitutional Amendment, submitted by Congress, to the ratification of the picked men composing the legislatures of the several states. However, I believe South Dakota presents an exceptional opportunity to adopt woman suffrage by popular vote, and furthermore I believe she will do it this fall. Among the encouraging features are:

First. She has no large cities with a slum vote to be cast against the proposition.

Second. Her villages and rural population are exceptionally intelligent; her people are largely men and women reared in the free schools, colleges and universities of the older states; they represent the highest moral development of the American people at the present time.

Third. She has a smaller percentage of the vicious and ignorant foreign element, her foreign population being of the higher order of emigrants, and fewer of these than any other Northern state, according to population.

Fourth. Her saloons are gone, and with them their solid vote against woman suffrage. So perfectly does prohibition prohibit, and so completely has this element shaken the dust of Dakota off their feet that I have seen nowhere the least sign of the saloon, and no man apparently under the influence of intoxicants. At Watertown, a wonderfully beautiful and prosperous county seat, with a population of over five thousand, business men assure me that a man under the influence of liquor on the streets is a most unusual sight.

The Farmer's Alliance is a powerful organization extending throughout the state. Its pronounced declarations in favor of the amendment is a prophecy of aggressive work and a large vote. The W. C. T. U., the Prohibitionists, a large number of influential Democrats and Republicans are laboring for its success. So far neither of the two old parties have given platform declarations in favor, but at their forthcoming conventions efforts will be made to secure promised advocacy by both. An efficient state committee, with proper headquarters, is at work systematically and sensibly.

Rev. Mr. Barker, of Huron, the secretary, has resigned his pastorate and has been put upon a salary that his entire time may be devoted to the work and a general supervision of the field. Already a large portion of the counties are organized in every township and all will be by September I. After this the best speakers the nation affords should be for two months constantly engaged in educating the people.

There is an immense amount of ignorance and prejudice among the masses on this subject. There is nothing easier than the removal of this. A single speech will convert nearly every one of the largest audiences that may assemble, at first opposed. The reasonableness of our demand is so apparent, it is so much in the line of American thought that no work pays so well in converts as that on behalf of woman suffrage.

If Dakota can secure this beneficent law she can prevent her cities from becoming the hot-beds of vice and crime and her revenue will be derived from property values instead of from the sale of indulgences to the vicious and criminal classes, as is the rule now in most of our states. I believe that it promises more for civilization than any other proposition before the nation.

To the end of its adoption we should all bend our energies of purse and mind; especially should this be true of those engaged in temperance, social purity, the purifying of political methods and the exaltation of public service.

Dakota's great need is money with which to carry on this widespread and vast work. This must be largely supplied by those outside the state. This is a battle for womanhood; the nation, one and all, should feel a personal interest in its success. Miss Susan B. Anthony has secured about three thousand dollars for the work. She does not place this at the disposal of the State Suffrage Committee, and refuses to allow them to dictate its distribution with the exception of three hundred dollars which she has given them. She is badly out of touch with these home workers, and being strange to the people she can not get her speakers before sufficient audiences, and much desultory work is the result. Just at the time that this committee should have the use of this fund they are deprived of it. I regret that all outsiders do not work subject to, and under the direction of residents of Dakota. This disposition of funds by Miss Anthony renders other contributions still more imperative. The committee refuse to make her appointments, and she is a free lance, doing what she can.

Miss Anna Shaw has given seventeen addresses under her pay. Mrs. Howells, of New York, is with Miss Anthony holding conventions and speaking. Mrs. De Voe, of Dakota, is also under her employment, doing efficient organizing. This seems to be the extent of visible work being done by the fund placed in Miss Anthony's hands. Mrs. Julia B. Nelson, of Minnesota, is not paid, as reported, by the suffragists of her state or the National-American Suffragists. She is doing efficient work under the direction of the state committee, the W. C. T. U. of her state having contributed fifty dollars toward her services.

Miss Hindman, of Pennsylvania, is paid by California friends, and is doing most excellent work.

Mrs. Will, Mrs. Best and Mrs. H. M. Barker, all Dakotans, are in the field with many ministers and prominent citizens putting on the armor of the laborer in the vineyard.

Catherine Waugh McCulloch, of Rockford, is filling a series of thirty lectures at the present time, and is Illinois' representative, a good share of her expenses having been contributed to the fund which I am raising, by the people of her state, for that purpose.

I am speaking to large and enthusiastic audiences thus far and shall donate twenty days in so many of the largest cities during the present month. I have already raised about five hundred dollars which will be expended by, or under the advice of, the State Suffrage Committee. I must raise fully one thousand dollars for them before my conscience can be clear and I can say I have done what I could. To this end I earnestly desire that every one who reads this shall set about collecting money and send to me. For this purpose I have set out the facts herein presented. Let the contributions be great or small, but let something be done, and done at once.

Literature in English and Scandinavian has been prepared in abundance and the German must be forthcoming. This is of little use, however, until an arrest of thought has been made by the spoken word. I have to-day written Mrs. Grubb to issue suitable literature in German, and I depend upon those who read this to help answer my prayers that the fund shall be forthcoming with which to meet the expense.

Now, dear readers, let us win South Dakota for justice and this great hole in the wall will soon cause the whole fabric of injustice to totter and fall when mothers will be as powerful in the eyes of politicians as saloon keepers, when John Sullivan's vote et al. will be annulled by Frances Willard's et al.

Who can measure the results of such a victory? What will you do to win it? Answer by acts as well as wishes, by works as well as prayers. HELEN M. GOUGAR.

PACIFIC COAST OUTLOOK.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—"Behold, I bring you good tidings." All along shore the clans are rallying. From El Paso to the Pacific Coast has been one splendid realization of what Theodore Cuyler said: "The W. C. T. U. must have been an inspiration from God, for no human mind unaided by the Holy Spirit could ever have planned so grand a movement."

Arizona with her sandy plains and mountains infested with Mexicans and Indians, making it the hardest field I have ever seen, has women so strong to do and dare that one must be convinced of the guiding power of "One mighty to save." At Bisbee, a mining town, every American woman in the town wears the white ribbon, and the minister, Rev. Mr. Pritchard, stands by to help, holding gospel temperance meetings Sabbath afternoon, and also keeping open all the week a free reading room, where can be found all the prominent prohibition papers. Tucson, Phœnix, Tempe, Florence, and other towns keep the white ribbon chain unbroken, while the new territorial president, Mrs. Hughes, and her good husband, watch every opportunity to add here a little and there a little temperance truth. How much these in charge of the outposts have contributed to the work, can only be known when the roll-call of those who "In His Name" gave "a cup of cold water" shall have been crowned from above.

I wish I had space to name those who have welcomed me to their homes, and said, "God bless you," when the way seemed so far, and I had grown so tired, but God knows and notes the service we cannot speak. A long and dreary ride over sandy plains was dispelled one morning early by the breath of roses and flutter of white ribbons at Pasadena, Cal. Beautiful Pasadena! Better than all, however, met me when I was ushered into the presence of over one hundred delegates in their county convention at the M. E. Church, and what a royal welcome they gave me, a welcome which has been repeated all through California. Miles and sandy plains are all that separate us from these royal women on the coast; they are with us in heart and work.

Miss Mary F. Lathrop is here now trying to organize non-partisan unions. It would be funny if it were not so pitiful. There was a thought in the mind of some that she might gather those who had not been earnest workers, but as yet there have been but two who were ever known in W. C. T. U. circles who have gone with the new organization. Our women pay no more attention than they would to a zephyr passing over. They are too busy. The King's business demands haste. Miss Lathrop asked to meet with the various preachers' meetings, and they, good, generous brethren, sent word to the W. C. T. U. to meet with them, too; so Monday morning Mrs. Johnson and I will go over to San Francisco "to tell the brethren" what we know.

Next week the School of Methods at Pacific Grove will be the attraction. A large attendance is expected; both Mrs. Bateham and myself will be there. After that, I go to Nevada to help with state conventions, filling a few appointments on the way; then to Asheville, North Carolina, to School of Methods, where we hope to meet white-ribboners from all about. July 21 to August 1st, Miss Willard, Miss West, Dean Wright, Fannie Griffin, Miss Anna Gordon, and a host of others will gather together on the mountain for a trysting time. Let everybody accept a real Southern welcome to "the land of the sky." We will do you good. Write Miss Anna C. Aston, Asheville, N. C., for rates.

THE BIBLE IN ALL TONGUES.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The National superintendent of "work among foreigners" has received portions of the New Testament in different languages from the Johnstown, Pa., Ladies' Bible Society. Miss C. M. W. Foster, president, through whom the gift comes, says: "Our city of Johnstown having been so recently the recipient of so much sympathy from other lands as well as our own, we desire to manifest reciprocity as we can though it be but little."

The amount sent was worth twelve dollars and is highly prized by the superintendent, who has long felt the need of such portions to send out with the tracts. The languages in which these portions come are Finnish, Polish, Bohemian, Hungarian, French, Italian, Swedish, Danish, Norwegian and German, Spanish and Portuguese. Any one desiring to use these in evangelistic work among the foreign population can have them free except postage. They are in the gospels, and are just what is suitable for nice little presents.

If any one desires to purchase them, however, the money will be forwarded to the Johnstown Bible Society to be invested in a new supply so as to keep up the work.

A NEW INVENTION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Steven's dish-washing machine deserves special notice outside of all business considerations from the fact that it was invented by two of our most devoted white-ribboners, Mr. and Mrs. Steven, formerly of Missouri, each of whom taxes the other with having done the inventing; but it was a joint affair, and Mr. Steven is one of the most generous of men, who, instead of taking all the credit to himself, is solicitous that his wife should come in for her share. The way it came about was this. In Missouri Mrs. Steven was prominent in our W. C. T. U. dining hall on the fair grounds where they fed ten thousand people, and the worst disadvantage under which she labored as a leader was the difficulty to get any one to wash the dishes. She often said to her husband that if this could be removed it would wonderfully facilitate the people and the making of money for the local union.

For a long time he paid little attention, but finally she got a collar box and some hair pins, correlated them according to her idea of how a dish-washing machine might be put together, and gave him no rest until he took notice of her idea. He is of a most inventive mind, and she was greatly encouraged when he said, "I believe that might work." So they took a washing boiler and set in with larger pins. Mrs. Steven says playfully, "We have made at least a hundred different kinds, but this one is perfection. It will win." Mr. Steven says: "My wife and I invented this machine. She saw the point first. We worked at it six years. There are already forty patents on dish-washing machines, but none has ever become popular. They have so many defects. We have studied all and tried to avoid all the mistakes of our predecessors. Heat and force do the work. Glassware is polished and made as glossy as velvet. There is no lint on the dishes. It takes but three minutes to wash and dry them in first-rate shape. Only three-quarters of a minute to do the washing. No hand touches them from the time they are put in the machine until you roll them up to the table and take them out when you wish to set the table the next time. Forty dishes is the complement of the ordinary home washer, sixty to three hundred for hotels, according to the size; and the price for family size will be ten to twelve dollars according to the distance the machine must be shipped. The dishes are held in a firm and novel manner, insuring them against any possibility to breakage, and remain stationary, that is, the dishes do not move around in the machine. It is easily understood and worked by a child twelve years of age, and is the only machine in which the dishes are handled but once." Women have been released many times but perhaps they have never had an emancipation that will be more generally appreciated than this, from the never-ending task that involves hot water, red hands, parboiled finger ends, and everlasting clearing up. As Captain Cuttle said, "Now it is found, make a note on't." This is a free translation, but covers the ground.

Our Book Table.

A PRAIRIE IDYL, and other poems, by Amanda T. Jones. Published by Jansen, McClurg & Co., Chicago.

Few poems have ever stirred us as do many in this book. Its descriptions take us out of the crowded city and the busy office to lie on the grass in orchards while apple blossoms shower around us,

To "travel all the fields and dales,
Creep under zigzag fences rude,
To "Wade through shallow waters slow,
Go shoulder-deep in meadow-swales,
And, charmed with woodland solitude
Sink down at last, where, weighed with dew
The pretty, pretty blossoms grew."

Other poems take us into even fairer realms; for example, "Freddie." The baby dies and thus she describes his waking in heaven:

"Not through sepulchre door-ways would stream,
In one burst all that excellence. Rather, I think,
Little Freddie would wake at some wandering beam
Darting in past the chink;
While down on his breast there would sink
Some rich-tinted flower and he, drowsy, would peer
Through the shadows each way to see who dropped the pink;
Reach out hands, have no fear—
And the Presence would smile and draw near.
So lifted, caressed, he would nestle and cling,
Drop lids, fall on slumber as babes do who hear
The hushed mother-voice sing."

We have marked many other gems, but you must get the book and read them for yourself.

WHITE-RIBBON VIBRATIONS is the name of the new song book by Flora Hamilton Cassel, and published by the W. C. T. U. Song Book Publishing Association, Hastings, Neb. It is a capital collection of songs, new and old, adapted to all the varying needs of W. C. T. U. work. It has solos, duets, trios and choruses, and any union with this book in hand never need be at a loss for the right thing to sing, whether for devotional or mass-meeting. We wish every union in the land had it, and used it, for it would be to the betterment of the music thereof. Price 35 cents single copy, prepaid; when ordered by the dozen or hundred, 30 cents per copy, not prepaid.

BLACK BEAUTY, HIS GROOMS AND COMPANIONS, is a book which ought to be read by everybody who has now, or ever hopes to have, a horse. Black Beauty tells his own story, and in such a charming way that a boy will spend his spare hour reading it, and in the reading "will learn courage, patience and good will from the brave, kind creature." George T. Angell says that it will do for dumb animals what Uncle Tom's Cabin did for the slaves, and its story is not such a sad one. It is written by an English lady, Anna Sewell, and over 100,000 have been sold in England. Mr. Angell has, through gifts of friends to the Humane Society, been enabled to print 40,000 copies, and to sell them for twenty cents each, postpaid. Mrs. William Appleton empowered him to present, in her name, a copy to each of the 1,600 Boston drivers, and she could not have done anything that would tell more effectually for the better treatment of our dumb brothers. We sent our copy to a Band of Hope, and it is being read by every boy and girl therein; it can not help being an educating force to them. We wish it might be placed in the library of every L. T. L. and recommend its circulation to our department of Mercy. It is for sale by booksellers for a quarter, and is cheap at that; yet Mr. Angell will furnish it in quantities for eight cents a copy, expressage or freight to be added. Here is a chance for unions to do good and to "put money in thy purse" at the same time, by purchasing the book thus of Mr. Angell, 19 Milk street, Boston, and selling it at the retail price.

THIRTY-SEVENTH REPORT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM ALLIANCE is received, and forms a valuable addition to contemporaneous history. The year has been a successful one in the work of the Alliance, as this record shows. Published by the Alliance, 16 Deansgate, Manchester, England.

TEMPERANCE TEMPLE ITEMS.

MATILDA B. CARSE.

Dear white-ribbon sister, brother, boy or girl: Have you a Temple mite-box on your table? If not, write to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, 145 Ashland Boulevard, Chicago, inclosing a two-cent stamp, and it will be promptly sent you on condition that you will drop into it a cent a day, or its equivalent, during the next twelve months. Mite-boxes in quantities will also be sent to unions for the cost of transportation.

In the death of Mr. L. A. Hagans, of Elmhurst, Ill., which took place June 6, we are called to mourn one of the truest friends of the Temple, a man who hated shams, and loved everything that was pure and good. He had the honor of being the first person to subscribe for stock in the Temple enterprise. He headed the list by a subscription of $10,000. We are indeed sorry that our loved and honored friend was not permitted to see the completion of the great building he so materially aided, but from the unseen Temple he will view with eyes of greater appreciation than we its progress—for in the light of God he will be able to apprehend the tremendous power for good it is to be to the world.

Mrs. W. H. Blair, of Clarence, Iowa, writes such a clever letter in regard to the sin of hoarding up money, which if set going on its mission might be a power for good, that we publish her letter below in full, hoping it will stir up the righteous mind of many of our white-ribboners to go and do likewise. She writes: "A few days ago a laborer was passing by with some packages of groceries for his home. I overheard a gentleman twit him on being at his old tricks again, spending his money. 'Why not?' he replied, 'when I keep a dollar lying idle in my pocket, it is neither doing me nor anyone else any good. When I spend it for something myself and family need, it is doing us good and it starts it out on its way for somebody else to do good with it.' That struck me as being true, practical philosophy. I began to think whether I had any dollar lying around that was not doing myself nor anyone else any real good. Yes, I had a bright, new dollar bill, that the only dear uncle I have living gave me, nearly two years ago, as a parting gift when I had been visiting him. I have been intending for a long time to give something for the Temple, but whenever I thought of giving uncle's present —I could not. Since I heard the poor laborer's philosophy my mind has been undergoing a change, and to-day I have decided to send uncle's dollar to you, trusting it may at least represent one brick in the noble building that will ere long stand as a beautiful Christian temperance light-house to the world."

The Moline, Ill., W. C. T. U. has the honor of sending in more money than any other union in the country. Last March they sent $17.50; June 3, $85.15, and this week $8.65; making in all $111.30. Mrs. M. C. Ells writes in regard to the gift of this union: "We have been led of God, and our women have worked with zeal to accomplish our aim by subscription, our treasury being very low." The Peabody, Mass., W. C. T. U. sends $13, their first installment on their pledge of $100. Mrs. M. O. Stevens writes that she hopes the entire amount will be paid in a few months, Mrs. Alice Williams sends $7.50 for autographs of the Blackstone, Mass., W. C. T. U. We hope this union will soon secure their $100 by the use of the mite-boxes. The Stoughton, Wis., W. C. T. U. sends a check for $8. Mr. Alice Leitery sends $3 for the Plattville, Ill., W. C. T. U. She writes: "This is a small sum, I know, but we are a country union composed mostly of farmers' wives."

We are grieved to think we have so little room in this column to give to the children. We will let a few of them speak through it to-day, however. The following letter written by little Grace Ward, Middletown, R. I., inclosing $5, the contents of her own and her aunt's mite-box, was received some time ago: "My aunty takes THE UNION SIGNAL, and reads me quite often what the little boys and girls are doing for the Temple. She also sent for a mite-box for me, and I have got all the pennies I could. I would like to see the Temple when it is done, and as I am a little girl ten years old, maybe I shall. I think if more of the little girls and boys who have aunties would send and get mite-boxes for them to run about and get pennies in the Temple would soon be built." The following letter was signed by three little boys aged respectively thirteen, eleven and eight years: "We are three brothers who wish to help build the Temple. We have never been to the city, but are coming this summer during our school vacation. Please send us a mite-box. Robbie, Arrie and Rollin Dunbar, Yorkville, Ill." Here is another cute little letter from a little boy in Mattoon, Ill.: "Inclosed please find $1 for the Temple. I earned it myself, and will earn some more if I can. I am nine years old; my name is Harry Morrison. My mother is a W. C. T. U. woman; she takes THE UNION SIGNAL, and I read the letters." Little Austin Lipsett, of Sault St. Marie, Mich., writes: "Please send a mite-box for my little brother and me; he is four and I am nine. We both belong to the Loyal Temperance Legion. We would like to help build the Temple; we will get as many pennies as we can for it." The following letter is from Yates, Mich., and signed by Delia and Georgie Rice, aged ten and twelve years respectively: "We want to send for a mite-box. We live in the country. We have a Loyal Temperance Legion of thirty members; we commenced with twenty." We are in receipt of The Midget, a bright little four-paged monthly paper for children, edited by a little girl only eight years old, Ethel Stout, Delaware, Ohio. The price of the paper for a year is only ten cents, one-tenth of the subscription money received for the paper is to be donated to the Temple. We will tell the children next week something more about little Ethel. We also hope next week to have room for some items about the work of the Loyal Temperance Legion.

Our Children.

I'SE A MAN.

BY JOSEPHINE BRAMAN.

There's a darling little fellow,
Sits in church in front of me,
Though his name I cannot tell you,
Yet acquainted well are we;
For on every pleasant Sabbath
We both nod and smile and say,
"Good-morning! I am glad to see you,
Hope you are quite well to-day."

We didn't have an introduction,
'Twas only eyes looked love to eyes
Till my heart was running over
With its unsung lullabies;
And I longed to hold and fold him
As of yore I did my own,
Ere from out the nest my birdlings
Any one of them had flown.

Coming in one day belated
His velvet cheeks I saw aglow,
And I knew somewhat had happened,
For the black eyes sparkled so;
But there was no chance to whisper,
And so still he had to keep,
Soon the little dreamland fairies
Gently drew him fast asleep.

But as benediction ended
Down the aisle he quickly ran.
"Stop! Lady, stop! I want to tell you
"I'se dot on pants! See! I'se a man!"
Could I keep the tears from starting
At ambition's early morn?
So the kiss I gave in parting
Held a prayer for boyhood's dawn.

Oh, the precious buds of childhood!
None may see the fruit or flower;
For the influence wrong or holy
Makes or mars the manhood's hour.
In the Father's special keeping
May the mothers all be found,
Till the sowing and the reaping
To His glory shall redound!

TWO LITTLE HANDS.

Once on a summer day divine,
Two little hands fell into mine;
How pink they were! how frail and fine,
Each one a crumpled velvet ball,
So soft and so absurdly small,
Ah, me! to hold within them all
Life's tangled and mysterious skein,
The mingled threads of joy and pain
Whose hidden ends we seek in vain.

O! fast the years have fled away;
Two little hands, at work or play
Still bide with me the livelong day;
Now on some willful mischief bent,
And now to loving service lent,
Now folded—sleepy and content—
The dimpled fingers curled, like those Sweet jealous leaves that cling and close
About the red heart of a rose.

I kissed them with a passionate sigh;
The quick fears spring, I scarce know why
In thinking of the by and by!
How will they build, these little hands?
Upon the treacherous, sifting sands?
Or, where the Rock Eternal stands?
And will they fashion, strong and true,
The work that they shall find to do?
Dear little hands, if I but knew!

Could I but see the veilèd fate,
Behind your barred and hidden gate!
Yet trusting this, my love must wait!
O! when perplexed no more by these Tear-blinded ways, my wanderings cease
In the sweet valleys of His peace;
Beyond the dark, some heavenly sign,
Some clew, however faint and fine
Shall guide these little hands to mine!

THE LEMONADE STRAW.

BY FLORENCE W. BUTLER.

The black Indian pony nodded his head and shook his shaggy mane over the barn-yard fence at little Lowell, as he busily loaded up his wheelbarrow with sand, and wheeled it over to his grocery store, which he had made under a tree near by. The chickens hopped up and down over the piles of wood and kindlings, and clucked in the wondering way that chickens do, as they eyed busy Lowell from first one side then the other.

The sky was blue, and the sun bright and warm. Everything tended to make Lowell feel as happy as a little boy could.

The sand which he was wheeling in the tiny red wheelbarrow answered a great many purposes in Lowell's grocery. He could tie it up in neat little parcels for sugar, tea, rice, or for almost any kind of soft grocery supplies, and as he had a never-failing customer in his mamma, he spent many happy hours in this way.

By and by, on this bright morning, he began to feel quite warm and thirsty, and he thought how much he should like some nice, cool lemonade. Then he remembered that his mamma had said he would have to drink his lemonade, instead of drawing it through a straw, as he was fond of doing, because the lemonade straws were all gone. Lowell had been reverently taught that every comfort and pleasure, all that he needed and enjoyed, were given to him by God. Since he could lisp, "Now I lay me," he had been taught to return thanks and ask for God's continued care over him.

Just now he wanted very much to have a lemonade straw, and so, with the sweet, simple faith of a little child, he knelt down and asked God to give him what he wanted, and then ran into the house and told his mamma he would like some lemonade, and he wanted a straw in it. His mamma told him he could have the lemonade, but he would have to drink it, for the straws were all gone. Lowell took the nice, cool drink, and drained the glass, but said nothing of what was passing in his mind.

The day passed and evening came, and little Lowell, all ready for bed, stood beside his mother.

"Now, Lowell," said mamma, "say your prayers, and then you can go to bed and to sleep, so you will grow rested and strong, ready for another day, and remember to ask God to take care of dear papa, so far away from us."

"I don't want to say my prayers, mamma."

"Why, Lowell, dear, why do you say that?"

"Well, mamma, God does not answer my prayers; He does not give me what I ask for?"

"What did you ask for, Lowell, that God has not given you?"

"I asked Him to give me a lemonade straw, and you said I must drink my lemonade because we do not have any straws, and I do not want to say any more prayers."

To Lowell's devout and thoughtful mother this was a serious matter, small as Lowell was, and she pondered in her heart how she should meet the doubts of her little boy. The next day, Cousin Fred, a tall, strong lad, came over. "Fred," said mamma, "I have a favor to ask of you; I wish you would spade up a small corner of the garden and plant some oats in it."

While Fred complied with her request, mamma and Lowell stood by and watched the proceedings. When they went back to the house, Lowell's mamma took him up in her lap and said to him, "Lowell, you told me last night that God did not give you what you asked for when you prayed to Him. Now I want to tell you, that almost always, when we ask God for things, there is something He wants us to do before He gives us what we ask for; and I think He wants us to plant some oats and wait until they grow up and ripen, and then I am sure you will find that He has answered your prayer."

Very often, as the days and weeks passed by, mamma and Lowell went to the garden spot where the oats had been planted and watched the tiny green spears as they grew larger and larger, watched them until the warm summer sun turned them yellow, and then together they went out and cut from the little patch dozens and dozens of beautiful, round, yellow lemonade straws, and Lowell saw for himself that his prayer was answered, and that after they had done what they could, God had not only given him the one straw that he asked for, but had given him a hundred fold.

A LETTER TO THE CHILDREN.

BY NINA DODD.

DEAR CHILDREN:—You have all been interested in the Flower Mission, I know, and now I wish you would think of a perpetual Flower Mission. This you may keep up among yourselves. It will not be hard work, but, after all, it will be for the Master. You can easily interest your school-mates, or your Band of Hope, in the good work. Now that the glad summer is here with its lovely flowers, you can gather all varieties which grow around you. Tie them in little bouquets, lay on plate or pan, and sprinkle lightly with water. When you have them all tied, shake off and lay in pasteboard boxes, on tissue paper or cotton; also put some between layers and over them. They can be sent cheaply by mail, if your box is not too large. If you send once or twice a week to nearest hospital, or home, or poor-house, or to the sick or sad ones even in your own vicinity, it will cheer many an aching heart, make a ray of sunshine in many a sad life, and do you good, too.

Spare a little of your candy money, if you can send the flowers in no other way. There are so many ways of doing good, if you only think about it. The fashion plates in the magazines may be cut out—paint the uncolored ones nicely with your water-colors—paste upon thick paper or cloth, send a box full to some children's ward in hospital or orphan asylum, and many a trembling little hand will hold them with eagerness and delight. A tissue paper cap, or cape, or apron will give additional pleasure. The tiny one cent china dolls can be dressed in loose robes tied with bright little sashes, and these will also give amusement to the dear little sick ones, who lie so many hours in pain and loneliness, with nothing to think of or look at but bare walls. May God bless you all and make you little missionaries, indeed!

BRAVE MEN.

Dueling is but "a fashionable mixture of murder and suicide," yet fifty years ago it was so universal that it required a true, brave man to refuse such "satisfaction." Yet Lord Shaftesbury smashed the practice to atoms when he wrote to tell the nobleman who challenged him that he had sent his letter to a police magistrate. Few are the ages which have produced men heroic enough to face contumely, persecution, even death, by telling the world and the nominal church that it sins and lies. But there have been some such men. Such a man was St. Telemachus, the Eastern monk, who by thrusting himself between the swords of the gladiators, and suffering himself to be stoned to death in the arena, achieved by his death the abolition of the cruel and bloody games which, though they had been denounced by Seneca, and were hated by Marcus Aurelius, yet lingered on even under Christian Emperors to the reign of Honorius at the end of the fourth century after Christ.—Canon Farrar.

FOR THE WEEK BEGINNING JUNE 29, 1890.

BY REV. C. C. HARRAH.

DAILY BIBLE READING NOTES.

(Daniel 1; II Samuel 20-24; Philippians 1.)

Sunday, 29; Daniel 1. Verse 4, These children were twelve or fourteen years of age, and were chosen by their handsome form, because that was thought to be indicative of mental power. Verse 8, Daniel's decision of character has called forth the admiration of the good in all ages. Where a boy stands up for the right and refuses to have anything to do with evil, the wise say of him that he will amount to something in the world. One great point in Daniel's purpose was not to drink from the intoxicating cup of this world. The boys in our homes should make strong resolutions to totally abstain from whisky and tobacco, and from everything else that injures the body, corrupts the heart and weakens the mind.

Monday, 30; II Sam. 20. Verse 1, The end of one trouble is sometimes the beginning of another. Now, when there was the greatest need of harmony in David's kingdom, there suddenly appeared the greatest danger. Verse 3, After the outrage committed by Absalom, these women were not divorced, for they were guiltless, but they were shut up in seclusion, which was the fate of the widows of kings. The dreadful wrongs and cruelties committed against women in the past make one feel that he cannot go too far in demanding for them, for all the future, equal justice and equal rights with men. Verse 16, By remarkable gifts, occasionally a woman, like this wise one or Deborah, was able to exercise her personal rights. These exceptional cases were blessed and honored by God.

Tuesday, 1; II Sam. 21. Verse 1, If God's judgments against sin are slow, they are also sure. A nation as well as an individual may rely upon the truth of the word of God: "Be sure your sin will find you out." Num. 32:23. In many ways, the sins of the fathers are visited upon the children. It was not the generation that put human slavery into our nation that wiped it out with its blood. David's kingdom was now punished for a sin committed by the nation in the time of Saul. Verse 9, The nation had broken a solemn oath by its exterminating war against the Gibeonites. Josh. 9:18-20. What the Gibeonites exacted by way of retaliation was barbarous in its cruelty. Verse 10, This kind woman kept watch of the poor victims day and night, as they hung exposed on the low gibbets. We must not judge humanity as a whole by the record of history. That tells us of the doings of kings, while the virtues and works of the common people are passed over, for the most part, in silence.

Wednesday, 2; II Sam. 22. Verse 2, God's hand is in our lives; He has delivered us out of the mire of our sins (Ps. 40:2;); He has been a rock for us to stand on, when iniquity, like a raging sea, was about to swallow us up; He has been a fortress for protection, when storms of trouble have broken upon us.

Thursday, 3; II Sam. 23. Verse 1, The time will come when our last words will be spoken. We should keep in mind in the conduct of each day, that we have but this one life to live, and it will soon come to its close. Verse 2, Great care is needed that we do not "offend in word." James 3:2. Verse 3, It is the plain duty of Christians to give their influence and ballots to such men for rulers as are guided by the principles of true religion, and who will make righteousness the foundation of government.

Friday, 4; II Sam. 24. Verse 1, God is sometimes described as doing what He permits to be done. He did not use His restraining grace to keep David from numbering the people, but permitted him to follow his own inclinations. Verse 3, The numbering of the people was wrong, because prompted by pride of power and distrust of God. Verse 17, The consequences of our sins do not stop with us. In this case of David, while the sin was his own, yet God was displeased with the nation on account of the increase of offenses, (verse 1) and it had to be punished.

Saturday, 5; Phil. 1. Verse 1, This is a blessed epistle of Christian experience, in which we learn what it is to be in the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. How great the contrast between David's earthly kingdom and the kingdom of our Lord. Verse 21, May this heart utterance of the great apostle be ours! Whatever of life, time and strength we have, let it be Christ's. Then, when we come to meet death, it will be no loss, but a positive gain.

THE PRAYER MEETING TOPIC.

(The Responsibility of Citizens for the Character of the Nation. Prov. 14:34.)

In our republican government, the final responsibility for the character of the nation rests entirely upon its citizens. The men, over twenty-one years of age, have a responsibility beyond all others, because they elect the nation's rulers.

1. The people are responsible for the advancement of righteousness in the nation. If there is wickedness in the land, it is their own doing, and they are responsible for its removal. It is an admission of cowardice, incompetency, and moral weakness, utterly unworthy of a citizen of this country, to say that there is any evil in the land that cannot be utterly destroyed.

2. Citizens are responsible for the success of all the reforms which have to do with our country's future welfare. No one can idly and indifferently excuse himself from active interest in any cause, the success of which will leave less of wickedness in the land to go down to those who will live after us.

3. The citizens of the nation are responsible for the educational influences which are training the citizens and voters of the future. If true and undefiled religion is not made a foundation for righteousness, then the condemnation of God will rest on those upon whom these things are now depending.

The Household.

PRIMROSES.

BY MRS. FRANK SNOAD.

"Country primroses! fresh and sweet!
Violets! only a penny a bunch!"
A young girl cries, whose weary feet
Tread many a muddy city street,
While rich folks idly dine or lunch.

Repletion theirs! starvation hers!
How long will those pale flowers keep fresh?
If no heart-yearning pity stirs,
How long ere she no more demurs
To sink the spirit in the flesh?

Ay! sneer and pass the other side!
Yet when Christ comes, of this be sure,
'Tis not her shame He will deride,
The shame is yours, who have not tried
To keep His blossoms fresh and pure.

MRS. BARKER'S LACE CURTAINS.

BY LAURA J. RITTENHOUSE.

Mrs. Barker rearranged her new lace curtains for the second or third time and then stepped back and looked at them admiringly. How pretty they were! How graceful the design of fern leaves and lilies, and how the room seemed suddenly changed by them from stiff barrenness into softness and warmth and homeiness!

Some one rang the door-bell and she hastened to answer it, not without giving a lingering look at her new treasures, and her delight bubbled over her lips as she admitted her friend, Mrs. Windom.

"Oh, I'm so glad you've come; I've something lovely to show you—a birthday present from Wallace, the old darling. See! aren't they beauties?" she said, fairly pulling her friend into the pretty parlor.

Mrs. Windom stood still a minute without speaking, looking at the curtains with critical eyes. To tell the truth, a little pang of envy shot through her heart as she realized how much the room was beautified by the new addition, remembering her own bare windows, unadorned, excepting by dark green shades.

"Yes, the design is quite artistic—quite so for imitation lace. I prefer plain shades for myself, however, until I can afford real lace curtains. I can't bear anything that isn't genuine. However, they do make the room look well, and it's altogether a matter of taste. Probably only a few of your friends will know the difference between the sham and the real."

And Mrs. Windom smiled in a patronizing way very exasperating to Mrs. Barker, relishing the idea that she had thrown a damper over her friend's pleasure in her new acquisition.

Yet Mrs. Windom was not really a cruel woman, nor entirely given up to saying disagreeable things to rasp the feelings of others. No one knew this better than Mrs. Barker, who could never forget how Mrs. Windom had come in and stayed day and night when Nannie had typhoid fever, the tenderest, most skillful of nurses, nor the hundreds of other great and small kindnesses she had bestowed upon her. And because she remembered them, she felt all the more sore over her friend's criticism, because no one can hurt us as much as those we love most.

Mrs. Windom did not stay long, and after her departure Mrs. Barker finished her morning's work, but much of the gladness had died out of her heart.

"Sham!" The word rang in her ears unpleasantly. Sham lace curtains for a woman who had always prided herself on being genuine, and on making no pretensions above her means.

She tried to stop thinking about it, but made occasional little trips of inspection to the parlor door. The curtains were still pretty, but somehow they had lost much of their first loveliness. They were only imitation, as Mrs. Windom had said, and cheap ones, at that, even though the design was so beautiful.

What a pity Wallace hadn't bought linen scrim instead. They would have been real scrim, at least, and no one could have accused her of bad taste and shoddiness. As it was, people would probably think she didn't know the difference between real and imitation lace.

When her husband came home at noon, she was looking so worried that he noticed it at once.

"Have things gone criss-cross with you this morning, little woman? You are looking ill and tired," he said, putting his hand under her chin, and kissing her with lover-like tenderness.

"No, nothing worth mentioning, Wallace. I ought to be the happiest woman alive because I have such a good husband," she said, her conscience smiting her for having caused him a moment's anxiety.

Then the children dashed in from school, and dinner had to be served at once, so there was no chance for further questioning.

Scarcely had the dishes been washed and her neat afternoon dress donned, before the door-bell rang again. This time it was a well-dressed, courteous gentleman, who handed her a note from a friend living in another town.

She asked him to be seated while she glanced over it hurriedly.

"The bearer of this, Mr. Burton, is a real gentleman, a member of an old, well-established, importing firm in Chicago. You will find him honest and upright in all his dealings, and his method of transacting business will make it easy for you to supply yourself with some good lace curtains. You see, I haven't forgotten how often you wished you had some, when I last visited you. I thought of you the moment he told me he was going to your town with his samples, and was determined you should have an opportunity to purchase.

Your loving friend, JENNIE RAY."

Mrs. Barker forced a faint smile to her lips after reading this note.

"I'm ever so sorry, but you see I have curtains. My husband made me a present of them yesterday."

The gentleman glanced at the curtains, and the hot blood rushed to her cheeks.

"Yes, I see you have, but pardon me, madam, for saying it, those curtains are only cheap imitation ones, and your friend told me you were a lady of exquisite taste, and would want a genuine article, even if it were only plain swiss or scrim. These would do well enough for your bed-rooms or dining-room, but your pretty parlor should have something better."

"I'm sure they are a lovely design," she said a little warmly, "and they are quite as good as we can afford."

"Oh! no, not the way I sell curtains; you don't pay anything for six months from the time you order; in fact, as they are made in Switzerland, you cannot have them earlier. Allow me to have my man bring my samples in."

And before Mrs. Barker could interfere, Mr. Burton had gone to the door and beckoned to the spruce-looking colored man who sat in a spring wagon in front of the gate, and a trunk was brought in and deposited on the parlor floor.

Mrs. Barker protested. "It really isn't worth while to show them to me, for I can't possibly buy. I haven't a cent to spend in that way, and the curtains I have correspond very well with the balance of the house."

"It doesn't cost anything to look at them, at any rate, and I'm sure it will be a treat to you to see them," the gentleman said pleasantly.

So the curtains were displayed, and Mrs. Barker fairly held her breath in ecstacy as she looked at them. So fine, so dainty, so exquisitely wrought they were, that her own cheap curtains seemed to grow coarser and commoner every moment.

"Of course you don't wish for these highest priced ones, madam, but here are some that would just suit you, and make your parlor look like a picture. They are cheap, too, to be hand-made—only fifteen dollars a pair. You'd better take them, you'll never have such another chance." And Mr. Burton held one of the curtains up, so the light showed every little leaf and bud and stem, and the curtains at the windows became as sack-cloth.

Mrs. Barker shook her head, "I can't even think of it, much as I should like to."

"Oh! yes, you can, too. Just figure a moment. Six months to pay in, and only forty-five dollars at that."

Mrs. Barker remained unconvinced, and Mr. Burton lowered his voice to a confidential tone.

"I'll tell you what I'll do. You may have the curtains for forty dollars, then you can lay aside six dollars a month—not quite a dollar and a half a week, and, behold! the curtains are yours, and you'll never miss the money."

It was all very tempting. She certainly could save that much, even out of her small allowance, and—and she would.

WORDS TO THE WISE.

BY ABBY MORTON DIAZ.

A teacher known to the writer thus relates some of her observations: "In my intercourse with the various families I could but notice that many of the objectionable traits manifested by my pupils were the natural and inevitable results of parental management. One day I found poor Mrs. L. in a peck of trouble. She was sure she did not know what made her children act so. They were irritable, they were fretful, they showed temper, they tried her dreadfully. She did not see why. They had pleasures enough, and were indulged enough.

"It would hardly have done to tell her, what was true, that the very tones and manner she used in dealing with her children served them as patterns and were faithfully copied. She reproved them in fretful, whining tones; she was impatient with them; she showed temper. They could scarcely help catching her mood; it was but taking in from the environment in the natural way of all living creatures."

Other teachers have made similar observations. They can be made almost anywhere by any observing person. A mother, for instance, finds it agreeable or necessary to gratify one of her little flock with some extra indulgence, perhaps some coveted tidbit, but to avoid trouble cautions the child not to tell the others. Here is a lesson in slyness, even deceitfulness. Also, in the process of "getting along," a mother will sometimes prevaricate, and in various ways conceal or disguise the truth. Many, in going out, will leave the house slyly in order to avoid a fuss. They do not consider, these unwise mothers, that in thus slying away, they are not only giving the child a lesson in deceit, but are losing opportunities of giving him lessons in self-denial and self-restraint, two qualities which go far to make that strength of character so much needed, but alas, so often lacking, in mature life. The qualities of the home atmosphere are plainly revealed by the children who breathe it in. Thus a girl pupil who talks much of clothes, frequently remarking on her own, and on those of other pupils, is sure to come from a home where the women-folk are largely devoted to style and fashion, and where, whatever may be the "living," "plain," or otherwise, you do not find "high thinking," or much profitable conversation.

In thus dwelling on the responsibility of women-folk, that of men-folk should be ignored by no manner of means. True, the father has the fewer opportunities, but the very fact that he is less constantly with the children, together with the wifely deference usually shown him and expected by him, renders his words and bearing more deeply impressive. The children are his as well as the mother's, and both are equally bound to refrain from giving lessons in deceit or injustice, fretfulness, impatience, self-indulgence, and from showing temper. In regard to the latter, so frequent in punishing and at other times, the question should be asked, Am I doing this to benefit my child, or to give vent to my own anger, my own irritability?

A QUAKER MOTHER.

BY ROBERT B. HOWLAND.

[A prominent Quaker at the East sends to one of our leaders the following interesting account of his mother's work, and it is in a spirit so helpful that we believe the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL will be glad to get these suggestive and inspiring words.—ED.]

My sainted mother had thirteen children; she was for almost half a century a beloved gospel minister in the large meeting of Friends, in New Bedford, Mass., active in all Christian work, doing much pastoral work, also in sympathetic ministration at funerals. She spent months of extensive travel in many states in the exercise of her ministry, and lastly four years in unremitting labor seven days in the week through England, Ireland, Scotland, Germany and France. She was in no wise unsexed, but was a tender mother, a dutiful wife, beloved as a gentle, graceful lady by all. She had what we call "a gift," was spiritual of discernment, and had an insight possessed for two hundred years by many of our ministers, a gift that enabled them when anointed for the service to enter the houses of perfect strangers, and to so read the spiritual life of each individual as to speak exactly and definitely to the soul-needs of each by way of warning or encouragement, and in the demonstration of the spirit and with power. I have known such to address fifty persons separately in a day in this manner,—a close exercising, labor of faith and love. This was not a continuous power, but one given at especial times; always in the fitting time; and at such seasons the church, through its living, Holy-Ghost-baptized spiritual members knew how to encourage and send out with its indorsement the anointed and appointed ones. I have had testimony from individuals in all of these nations to the effect that my mother's particular message to them marked a turning point in their lives. The spirit had sent an unerring shaft that met the witness in the heart of the one addressed. A Frenchman said to me that my "mother's message would be remembered by him to all eternity." This testimony was given twenty-five or thirty years after her visit.

Quakerism, as held to and practiced by George Fox, William Penn, Robert Barclay, Isaac Pennington, Joseph John Gurney, Elizabeth Fry, Priscilla Gurney, Stephen or Etienenne Grellet and Susan Howland, is almost extinct to-day. As a friend of my mother's wrote me recently, "Friends now want the crown without the cross. The belief in Christ as the one only head of His church; in the universality of the priesthood of the believer in the church as being a community of believers and not a sacred house; that enough knowledge is granted every human being to enable him eventually to realize salvation through Christ, or in other words, that no one is condemned without a failure on his own individual responsibility, that no service is to break in upon the silent, soul-adoration and worship, but such as on that occasion feels itself impelled of the spirit, sent from the Head and only competent Leader of His services; that the Holy Spirit, to the humble child who is punctilious to obey the gentlest intimations of the Inward Light, can be a Leader in all things, even the most secular or financial; that all the varied gifts in Christ's church are enduements from on high and all the people are to be moved upon, as the spirit on each occasion dictates.

Were Quakerism lived up to in all its vital points, a few would, indeed, be a power to shake mightily the things of earth.

Would woman suffrage demand more than my mother went through? I trow not. She lived to be about eighty-four years old.

Woman, God's last creation, when working in harmony with His will, can do more and subtler work than man: she is the last creation, the highest evolution.

God speed the right, God speed the church of Christ embodied in the W. C. T. U., God speed woman suffrage and then we will see Probibition.

Philadelphia.

GOD is over, under, behind and in front of every circumstance. In these later years I am ceasing to deal with second causes. They are a blessed study as God's means of working, but it gives me unutterable peace to realize that the cause of all that comes to me lies in God's mind and power. To deal with anything less than God, is, to me, now, only a waste of time. It is as if a man insisted upon seeing all the under-clerks in an establishment, when only the proprietor could give him what he sought. Everything that can oppose my plans and purposes shall be but "a school-master to bring me to Christ." When Christ is received in that thing, whatever it may be, then I have harmony and peace. Then the action agrees with the will, and my will with God's very own. And so life teaches me, by what it takes as well as what it gives, that to "seek unto God," is to reach the root of every problem soonest. ELIZABETH I. SCOVEL.

THE duty of doing, not great things, but what we can, is the very top and sum of human obligation. One can't get beyond it; one ought not to stop this side of it. It means the doing of everything you can, and chiefly it means the doing of things that issue out of the heart toward God and man. It means the setting aside of the self, and laying out one's best energies in unselfish, not to be requited, service. It means not merely occupation, industry, attainment, but noble industry, occupation, attainment; not merely busy hands, but busy affections, sympathies, purposes. You cannot sum its almost limitless significance.—J. F. W. Ware.

TEMPERANCE IN THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY-SCHOOL CONVENTION.

A friend asks why we made no mention of temperance when announcing the topics to be discussed at this meeting in Pittsburg, June 24–27. Simply because in the program we received—one of the earliest edition—there was no temperance. It is due to the indefatigable efforts of Miss Lucia Kimball that temperance had a distinct place on the program. As our readers will remember, through great and long-continued effort, which secured the indorsement of sixteen state Sunday-school conventions to the petition asking for our temperance lesson each quarter in the list of International Lessons, the Triennial Convention of 1884 by a vote well nigh unanimous, declared in favor of such lessons.

This wish, so emphatically expressed, was carried out only in part by the lesson committee. A temperance lesson was mentioned for the thirteenth Sunday of each quarter, but it must stand its chance in competition with a missionary lesson and the review, with the preponderance of influence against it.

Although this was not what most of us felt the urgency of the case demanded, we accepted it thankfully and for six years have worked faithfully to reap all the advantage possible from this concession. At the International convention of 1887 the W. C. T. U. asked nothing, Miss Kimball feeling that it was better to work along the line already secured until the next triennial convention. This is now at hand, and the growing conviction of many successful Sunday-school workers is that it is high time to take an advanced step. Temperance sentiment has advanced wonderfully during the last six years, and convictions have been deepened that one lesson a quarter wholly devoted to temperance, without being divided between three or four subjects, is none too much to guard our pupils against the deadly temptations that await them. Accordingly Miss Kimball has prepared a memorial to the International Convention, asking that the temperance lesson shall be placed on some other than review Sunday, in order to have it receive the attention its importance demands. This memorial will come backed by the indorsement of some thirteen state Sunday-school conventions and thousands of leading temperance workers in other states.

Miss Kimball has personally visited churches and Sunday-schools and secured the signatures of over fifteen hundred pastors, Sunday-school superintendents, and teachers. The quiet campaign she has been conducting in Chicago, almost single-handed, has produced wonderful results, and this she attributed to the fact that so much solid work has been done here years ago. She is now reaping the harvest from that seed sowing. She has personally presented the memorial to the Methodist and the Congregational ministers' meetings and to the Central W. C. T. U., and they have indorsed it. Pastors of churches in nearly all the leading denominations in the city have written in the strongest terms, expressing their belief in the wisdom of the plan proposed by the memorial. Among those who have thus expressed themselves are Drs. Noble, Withrow, Henson, Bristol, Bishop Fallows, Drs. Bolton, Allen, Wallace, Williams and Herrick Johnson. Dr. Gilbert, editor of the Advance, Dr. Edwards, of the Northwestern Christian Advocate, and Dr. Gray, of the Interior, have all given it editorial indorsement. Pastor McCord, of the Armour Mission, when some of his brethren in the ministers' meeting spoke doubtingly concerning the need of special temperance teaching in Sunday-school, told them to go with him into the homes of some of his mission scholars and they would learn a convincing lesson as to its necessity.

The International Convention and its lesson committee cannot afford to disregard the wishes of such a large part of its constituency. The temperance question is the supreme question of the hour, and, as the Advance says, "It will never make great headway until the Sunday-school takes it up specifically and in earnest." Well may it thus take it up, for the drink habit is the greatest foe Christianity has; it annually robs the Sunday-school of thousands of young men and boys, and is largely responsible for the small per cent of young men in the churches and the large per cent of them in the penitentiaries.

THE NATIONAL TEMPERANCE CONGRESS SEEN THROUGH MR. HALL'S EYES.

[Our business manager, Mr. George C. Hall, represents THE UNION SIGNAL in the Congress, and we are glad to give here his report of its first day's session.—ED.]

The first day of the Congress on Temperance is over. It is a gathering of the old standbys after all. It is true Robert Graham was there, the high license temperance worker, of the Church of England Temperance Society, but he was exceedingly lonesome, about as much so as a strong Prohibitionist would be in a Northern Democratic convention! One or two others of whose talks I will give short digests, differed from the rest of us, but it looked and acted exactly as a genuine, very partisan Prohibition convention, listening respectfully to opposing views, but going wild with enthusiasm over every reference to ideas that had any square up and down "fight it out on this line" sentiment expressed. The church where the sessions are held is a beautiful one; will seat probably a thousand persons, and was comfortably filled, when at five minutes of ten the Congress was called to order. Dr. Charles Deems, a strong and lovable man, was quickly chosen as permanent chairman, two secretaries elected, and Dr. Deems commenced his speech, which, as he said, "was something expected from every president of any kind in any place of the United States, no matter how elected." He gave the genesis of the Congress, how a few gentlemen, differing radically as to methods of temperance work, but very much united in hating the saloon, met together and talked the matter over with such sweet accord that a second meeting followed and a committee was appointed, and the plan set going. He pleaded that all should "keep sweet" (a request just made by the Silver Lake Quartette in song) and begged that the only platform to be considered should be "Hatred of the saloon."

The audience caught the enthusiasm and all together shouted "Down with the saloon—down with the saloon!" with vigor and earnestness that did abate one moment when Gen. Neal Dow, as the first speaker, was announced, on the question, "Is State and National Prohibition Desirable and Feasible?" He was greeted with cheers, then with the Chautauqua salute, and then with more cheers. He told what Prohibition had done for Maine, and when meeting the old, time-worn chestnut, "Prohibition don't prohibit," said to the president, "Mr. President, can I say what I really think?" "Yes, you may, firmly but kindly." "Well, then, my Christian friends, I kindly but firmly say, that's a lie! that's a lie!" His "firm but kind" statement brought down the house. He showed the difference between Maine of 1850 and Maine of 1890. Told how many breweries and distilleries had left the state, and averred that the traffic is not now one-twentieth of what it was in the days of license. He was followed by Robert Graham, who trembled with excitement, and with pale lips at once went in medias res, because, as he said, he had been called a liar. After having fitted the shoe on he proceeded to say why he had done so—that he had personally investigated Portland and Bangor and found them full of shameless violations of the law; also Providence, R. I. The chairman cooled him off in a conciliatory way, and Mr. G. went on to tell why such a policy as Prohibition would not do. "1st. It is unscriptural; Who gave any one the right to add this eleventh commandment? Our Lord used wine—John the Baptist did not, and the lesson clearly taught is that it belongs to man's volition entirely, whether he will or will not use intoxicants. No organizations can be found that will care for the saloon-made widows and orphans, and few of the third party people will touch a drunkard with a pair of tongs," etc. (My! my! I thought to myself, I never tried tongs! I have tried money, and time, and pleadings, to no avail. If we only had some big, big tongs where the drinkers could be caught up and held tight till they would pledge themselves to let whisky alone, it might be a good idea! Licensed, public tongs, you know!) Mr. Graham spoke earnestly, and is evidently honest in his opinions, but after assuring his "enemies," as he once called the audience, that the third party cranks had hindered and nullified all temperate restrictive laws, he gave way to Judge Moulton, of Washington, D. C. With some exceptions I will have to confine my letter to giving the arguments "ferninst" our position. So only can we learn. There is too much truth in the statement that nine-tenths of the temperance speeches are made to the folks who don't need them.

Mr. Parse, of Rhode Island, conceded all Mr. Graham had said as to the failure of the law in Providence, because he said, "in all cases the penalties were wholly inadequate. Amend this error and also amend the jury system so that a unanimous verdict will not be necessary for conviction in liquor cases." He claimed that a national constitutional amendment was not necessary—the power of Congress to deal with the traffic was ample. The Supreme Court has said, "a power to levy a tax involves the power to destroy." He predicted that the tariff issue would soon have a rest (peace be to its ashes) and that now is the time to energetically push the whole matter. Mrs. Bittenbender followed, and of course energetically differed as to the need of a constitutional amendment, giving an outline of the amendment work proposed in her manual.

Dr. N. S. Davis' paper, although full of words hard to be understood, was met with enthusiasm for it had the true ring to it. Dr. Boocock followed, and in his remarks said that sunstrokes never come to total abstainers; commended the W. C. T. U. for its magnificent work in the line of scientific temperance education. Another New York doctor followed and said, that within a year the treatment of pneumonia by whisky had received a hard blow at the hands of Dr. Bull who found that in the New York hospitals sixty-five per cent of the pneumonia patients die with alcoholic treatment, while in London at the Object Lesson Temperance Hospital, only five per cent die. So the experiment of thus treating the disease here was tried on five people—four of whom got well.

At close of the morning session I looked around and saw who was there—of W. C. T. U. folk not a few. Mrs. Lathrap, of Michigan; Mrs. Downs, of New Jersey; Miss Tobey, of Massachusetts; Mrs. Forbes, of Connecticut; Mrs. Burt, of New York; Mrs. Hammer, of New Jersey, and a lot of others. Among the men, Robt. Rae, of London, England; Drs. Funk, Crosby, Buckley, Mr. Joseph Cook, Mr. Demorest and many other temperance notables.

In the afternoon session the church was filled, galleries and all. Many are the folks who feel moved "to say something" in such assemblies, and when they get up before the audience their speech, and, in a case to-day, the breath also is gone! This case was a lady—not a W. C. T. U. woman, but when Mrs. Lathrap soon after came to the front I felt relieved. She followed a Mrs. Chandler, who represented the Non-Partisan Woman's Temperance Alliance of Chicago, also our breathless friend referred to, and cleared up all doubts that might have been in the mind of the audience as to the ability of women to cope with the question. Dr. Funk's paper on "How to Unite Opposing Elements" was the first of the afternoon. He defined the position of the temperance army as consisting of three great sections: 1. The great majority of all voters who are in favor of restricting the saloon by way of keeping them closed on Sundays and election days, and prohibiting sale to drunkards and minors. 2. A large number out of this majority who were willing to prohibit use of distilled liquors, and 3. The Third Party people. His argument was that all license laws should be done away, and let class No. 3 go as far with classes 1 and 2 as they can, and then go on from there alone. For all violations of the laws concerning liquor selling, let there be fines and imprisonment, or both. These three classes united would be resistless. Dr. Huntington, of New York, followed, and said Dr. Funk's position reminded him of the definition of Russia as "under an absolute monarchy tempered by assassination!" Dr. Funk's would be "free rum tempered by fines and imprisonments, or both!" The country would be scandalized as even it is not now by unenforced statutes were the government's tax taken off whisky. He begged us to come back to purely personal and social grounds, to leave the allurements of politics and bring all our influences to bear on the drinkers.

A substitute for the saloon must be provided, also, before it can be destroyed. Great is the man who will find it and bring it forward. Improved homes for the poor must be built; dismal homes make drinkers as well as the converse. Good cooking must be taught in the public schools, and all ardent spirits must be prohibited.

General Nettleton's leading idea was, an "American Temperance Alliance," its membership subject to no partisan tests; for actual warfare the methods of the Alliance should be:

1. Secure enforcement of present laws.
2. Secure enactment of new laws.
3. Fix up public sentiment in good shape—not the General's words, but the idea. He conceded that a high tax was not a finality, even in Minnesota, where he had been the means of getting one put through, also that the word "license," rightly or wrongly, had come to have a meaning that brought the thought of disrepute, but said that the whole present situation can be changed within six months if the people who, within hearing of his voice, would heed, if they did not it would be their sin. I suppose he meant if his advice—under six heads—was not taken. The world must breathlessly wait for the particulars till the record of the Congress is printed in full, and the six months—we presume—will not commence till that date!

Major Bright, editor Christian at Work, protested against working up any public sentiment except against the fifty-five per cent alcohol distilled liquors, but he was very lonesome in that assemblage. A minister from South Dakota was then introduced, and he completely captured the whole audience, not so much by what he said but by his wild enthusiasm of look, actions and words. He was cheered over and over again after he took his seat. Mr. Albert Griffin's paper was read as he was not present. He argued that the present great increase of drinkers could be ascribed entirely to the fact that there are no more crusade or blue-ribbon movements—concentration on legal lines has been a failure. The habit must be fought, not an appeal made to the law. The paper made the astounding statement that fully one-half the entire population of our country, drink wine, beer, or liquors. The Mrs. Chandler, of Chicago, already referred to, followed in much the same strain.

Joseph Cook's words were listened to eagerly and rapturously applauded. He said the church of God was pushing against the rock of the liquor traffic a cask that had no hoops to it, the forces were all in disorder and disagreement, and gave seven propositions or hoops.

1. The church ought at least to rise to the level of the attainments now made necessary in the public schools—pointing significantly to a map showing the twenty-seven states and territories under scientific temperance. That Sunday-school scholars should be taught morally what the school children are being taught scientifically, and if teachers have to abstain from liquor and tobacco to be effective teachers, so should preachers and all church members. Mr. Spurgeon used to drink wine and think it all right, now he says, "Grape juice has killed more people than grape-shot."

2. No rumseller should ever be accepted as a church member.

3. If so, then all churches should rise to the declaration of the M. E. Church and declare that the traffic can never be legalized without sin.

4. If these two last propositions are true it follows inevitably that church members ought never to vote for or with any one in favor of licensing the traffic.

5. Church members should work for the enforcement of all laws, as they stand against the traffic.

6. There should be visitation from house to house; personal contact with all tempted ones.

7. Church members should unitedly insist on Sunday and election day closing and for the prohibition of sales to habitual drinkers and minors. If there is unanimity along these lines there will be victory!

THE MEMBERSHIP CRUSADE.

"Ten times one are ten" has developed a mighty army of Look Up Legions, Lend-a-Hand Clubs, King's Daughters, King's Sons, and like organizations. The same rule of multiplication will realize Miss Willard's grand ideal for the W. C. T. U. It is said that Caroline Herschel never could learn the multiplication table, but in all her astronomical calculations kept a copy of it by her for ready reference, lest she should make a mistake. Not so with W. C. T. U. women; they have learned it thoroughly and know the power of multiplication, be it only twice one are two. Now for applying this knowledge. If each member of every union would bring in only one more member, presto! an hundred fifty thousand become three hundred thousand, and the power of the National union is not only doubled, but quadrupled, for influence, like gravitation, increases according to the squares, not in simple ratio. If each also brings in one honorary member, the power of multiplication will be even more strikingly demonstrated.

A wonderful increase in membership through organization of new unions is going on in many parts of the country; we have never known this work to progress so rapidly. This is well; but while these vigorous young shoots are springing up, do not neglect to nourish the mother stem. There is a constant drain upon the membership of old unions by deaths and removals; make it your individual business to see that this drain is more than made up by new additions.

In every town there are women outside the union who would greatly help it if they were inside, and to whom it would be a blessing. Each one of you has such friends; make it your business during the next month to persuade them to join. Use consecrated common sense in this work, do not go at it hap-hazard. Take time to think what phase of our many-sided work will most appeal to your friend's sympathy and present that to her. Show her that there is work for her to do just along that line, and if she be of the right kind of stuff, the attraction of service will be strong.

As a union, develop different departments of work thus opening fields for the labor of more women. The union which does little systematic work is always a weak union spiritually, and will soon become so numerically. With women worth having time is always too precious to be frittered away in do-nothingness; if they come into the union and discover that there is nothing for them there to do, they will leave it and their experience will deter others from joining. But if, when you invite them to join, you can point to some definite work which you know them well fitted to do, and say, "Your help is needed just here," you will be much more likely to secure and retain them.

It would be a good thing if every union would make the membership crusade the topic of a meeting; carefully and prayerfully look over the field and decide according to that wisdom which is always given when asked for, whether it is carrying on all the lines of work it ought, what woman in the community not yet interested in our work can be interested in special lines, if rightly presented, and who among the membership is best fitted to rightly present them to each one. Let these then go out, not as a committee, but as friend to friend, while the prayers of all call down the blessings upon each one. Such a crusade would be "twice blessed," blessed to the union in enlarged membership and increased efficiency, and blessed to the new members in bringing them into the fellowship of service for God and home and humanity.

JUNE MAGAZINES.

THE ATLANTIC clearly heads the list bringing, as it always does, a well-balanced array of solid and light reading. General Walker's discussion of the eight hour question will claim the careful attention of thoughtful people as coming from the man best fitted to speak on this subject of any one in the country. Charles Dudley Warner has this, and much more that is timely, to say concerning excessive newspaper reading: "An increasing number of people read nothing except the newspapers. Consequently, they get little except scraps and bits; no subject is considered thoroughly or exhaustively; and they are furnished with not much more than the small change for superficial conversation. The habit of excessive newspaper reading, in which a great variety of topics is inadequately treated, has a curious effect on the mind. It becomes demoralized, gradually loses the power of concentration or of continuous thought, and even loses the inclination to read the long articles which the newspaper prints. The eye catches a thousand things, but is detained by no one. Variety, which in limitations is wholesome in literary as well as in physical diet, creates dyspepsia when it is excessive, and when the literary viands are badly cooked and badly served, the evil is increased. The mind loses the power of discriminations, the taste is lowered, and the appetite becomes diseased." Oliver Wendell Holmes, in "Over the Tea Cups" talks of cranks as sensibly as though he were a Prohibitionist: "Do you want to know why that name is given to the men who do most for the world's progress? It is because the cranks make all the wheels and all the machinery of the world go round. I suppose the first fool that looked on the first crank that was ever made, asked what that crooked, queer-looking thing was good for." Hannis Taylor's consideration of the "National House of Representatives" points out a national danger and suggests a remedy. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston.

THE YOUNG WOMAN'S MAGAZINE, Brattleboro, Vt., opens with a beautiful picture of flowers, encircling a sweet poem, "Blooms of May," by the editor, Mrs. Housh. K. D. Forgeron, in "Where May-day Still Lingers," gives a vivid picture of this festival, preserved in its pristine beauty, but gives us no closer clue to its location than that it is in "a remote British parish, thousands of leagues from London;" "Homing of London Working Girls," tells of nine Homes in the West End where five hundred and two working girls can find safe, pleasant shelter; Mrs. Keever continues her story, "Nothing but Leaves," of which an excellent judge says: "It is the finest exposition of the social purity question I have ever seen. I wish every girl in America could read it." Mrs. Knox gives her fourth paper on Hannah Moore, and the editorial pages sparkle with many bright bits, as well as many helpful suggestions.

CHRISTIAN THOUGHT for June completes the seventh volume of this evangelical magazine, of which Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., is editor. The contents of this number is up to the standard. Among the articles are Christian Pantheism, by Bishop Samuel Fallows; Immortality in the Old Testament Scriptures, by Dr. Charles D. W. Bridgeman; The Beauty of Nature, by Lord Grimthorpe; Human Ability, by Rev. George S. Payson; Social Life in the Church, by Dr. John T. Dobbins; Concession to Science, by Dr. G. Macloskie, etc., etc. Single copy, 40 cents. $2 a year; clergymen, $1.50. Wilbur B. Ketcham, publisher, 13 Cooper Union, N. Y.

DEMOREST.—Its leading article is part second of Frances B. Johnston's "The White House," illustrated by a full length portrait of Mrs. Harrison and many views within the house. "A cobweb party" gives hints to the Y's for a unique entertainment. Sarah Doan La Fetra is the W. C. T. U. woman chosen by Miss Coleman for this month's illustration and sketch, and W. Jennings Demorest strikes his usual sturdy blows for prohibition. Office of publication, 15 East 14th Street, New York.

The Watch-Tower.

A stanch New England woman transported to the plains of Iowa bears this testimony: "I joined the first temperance society I ever heard of in 1833. Then we could not get men to work in our fields or women in our factories unless we gave out liquor, but look how it is now, when decent people are ashamed of the bottle."

The average of human life is lengthening. Old men and women are far more common than they once were. In England, from 1838 to 1881, the death rate dropped from twenty-two per thousand to nineteen, and this stands for an average addition of two years to the lives of men, and three years and four months to the lives of women. Early hours are the rule among those who live to old age, and a dinner in the middle of the day. Out of fifty-nine French centenarians whose occupations were known, thirty-two were farmers and eight landholders; and, the world over, the chances both of death and birth seem less in the modern city than in the country. Farmers are about forty-five per cent of the whole list. Out of a thousand old men in this country, 461 were farmers and nearly all began life on the farm. If the question is asked what civilization has really done to increase human happiness, we can unhesitatingly point to a green old age as one of its best outcomes.

Pacific Grove Summer School of Methods opened the season, commencing June 17. Its beautifully gotten up program announces such a feast of good things as would produce dyspepsia in a less healthy organization than that of W. C. T. U. women. Mrs. Churchill is in charge assisted by twenty-eight instructors; Mrs. Bateham, of Ohio; Mrs. Wells, of Tennessee. Rev. E. D. McCreary and Rev. T. B. Stewart are the lecturers; then this school luxuriates in a poet, A. J. Waterhouse, of Stockton; an official organ, The Pharos, Mrs. Mary Frank Brown, editor; an official reporter, Mrs. M. G. C. Edholm; a glee club and a course in vocal culture. As a rule, only fifteen minutes are devoted to each exercise. On the Sabbath, the morning service was conducted by Rev. M. C. Briggs, and the evening service by Mrs. L. M. Wells. Mrs. J. C. Bateham conducted a gospel temperance meeting in the afternoon. She sails for Honolulu soon, to carry on her work for Sabbath observance in the Sandwich Islands for a season.

Mr. George Blaiklock, of London, is in Chicago, and preached at Winter Street M. E. Church on Sunday morning and evening. Arrangements will probably be made for him to lecture in Chicago before he leaves for the East. Mr. Blaiklock is willing to stay and lecture at Detroit, London, Hamilton, St. Catherine's, Toronto, Montreal, Buffalo, Rochester, Utica, Syracuse, Albany, and New York. He will leave for England on July 28 or August 5, so that applications for his vacant dates should be sent at once to Mrs. Emmons, the secretary of the Women's Lecture Bureau, 161 La Salle street, Chicago. He has made several very pleasant calls at our office, giving much interesting information concerning work in Queensland and other countries which he has been visiting. Our foreign exchanges speak in the highest terms of Mr. Blaiklock as a Ch....an gentleman, speaker and reformer.

The event of the year at Bay View, Mich., Assembly is the opening of Evelyn Hall, the W. C. T. U. headquarters, given by Mr. and Mrs. R. G. Peters. A cut in the Bay View Herald shows that it is a thing of beauty with broad piazzas and balconies, many windows overlooking the lake, and everything to make a delightful summer home for the W. C. T. U. On the first floor are the public reception room, lecture room for use of the W. C. T. U. School of Methods, and committee rooms. The second floor has two parlors for use of white-ribboners, a suite of rooms for our National President, and twelve sleeping rooms; in the third story are sixteen more sleeping rooms. All these are for members of the union, from whatever state they come, and all will find a hearty welcome. Bay View gives the right of way to the W. C. T. U. for the first ten days of its Assembly, commencing July 23. Mrs. Benjamin has charge of the School of Methods, as she has had for the past four years. Thursday evening, July 24, Evelyn Hall will be dedicated. July 29 is especially set down in the program as W. C. T. U. day, and Mrs. Livermore gives the principal address. The work planned in the School of Methods is full and interesting, including physical culture, scientific temperance, young woman's work, White Shield work and others. Miss Guernsey, editor of publications of the W. T. P. A. has charge of an hour each day. Mrs. Benjamin occupies another hour daily, with a parliamentary drill. Professor Delos Falls gives illustrated scientific lectures, and many other attractive features will draw unusual crowds to beautiful Bay View this year.

ON DUTY.

World's W. C. T. U.

CANADA.

ANNUAL CONVENTION.

The Dominion W. C. T. U. held its annual convention this year in Montreal, May 28 to 30, and it was a notable gathering of representatives from every province and friends from other countries. Miss Willard was the center of attraction after her arrival and we looked to her for advice and counsel.

A reception brought the members together and the first day's work was one of great interest. The platform of Erskine Church was decorated with plants and flowers, the work of the flower mission. The chair was occupied by Mrs. Foster, Dominion president, who read with fine expression, that beautiful old hymn,

"How sweet the name of Jesus sounds
In a believer's ears!
It soothes his sorrows, heals his wounds
And drives away his fears."

After reading the 145th Psalm, and prayer by Mrs. Middleton, honorary president for the Province of Quebec, a pillar of strength and a benediction to the workers who are within her sphere, the roll was called and regrets read from Mrs. Youmans and Miss Scovel.

Mrs. Tilton conducted the Bible reading, speaking particularly of opportunity, and in the course of her remarks said that God tested our faithfulness sometimes; He also tested our work.

During the afternoon, Mrs. Cook, of Melbourne, Australia, told of the work there, and how she was led to take an interest in it by Mrs. Lucas, while she was in Australia, and said that they were working for local option, and the outlook was hopeful. Miss Tilley read the annual report of the work done during the year, giving details of the various departments, and showed that in our vast new territory of British Columbia, to which the eyes of the civilized world are turning as a land of promise, the work of temperance is progressing. It was the general feeling that there would be total prohibition in Manitoba before long.

Mrs. Foster, the president, then gave her address, and was listened to with marked attention, for we all enjoy her deliberate, finished elocution, the deep research after truth, and heart-felt pathos of her "talks" to us, and this surpassed all previous efforts. Speaking of Canada, she said of the temperance work: "Not twenty-three years old, it has the largest area, for the seven provinces and vast Northwest territory contain 3,470,257 square miles, and have five millions of precious souls scattered over its broad domain. What," she asked, "are our responsibilities as Christian women in this country when the following quantities of liquor have been manufactured and imported during the past year:

"Proof spirits distilled, 5,847,508 gallons; malt liquors made, 14,786,285 gallons; foreign imported liquors, 1,785,689. Total 23,415,935.

"Canada's drink bill amounts to sixty million dollars a year, and yet neither political party will prohibit its manufacture, nor protect the innocent. The temperance sentiment is steadily increasing in the Dominion, and it was said by a noted man, 'With public sentiment nothing can fail, without it nothing can succeed.'

"In every civilized country the traffic is restricted and regulated as a foe to be feared. The churches are prohibitory in precept and practice, while some of the United States have made it a crime, and laborers are making a stand that it is not just that they should be taxed to support the drunkards. We of the Dominion stand as white ribbon women 12,000 strong, and with that ribbon are helping to belt the world."

Mrs. Foster spoke tersely of lotteries, and their shameful results, and hopefully of co-education. John Bright has said that "the future of a country will be secure when men and women alike are trained to intelligent understanding of the laws which govern them, of the law for the protection of women and children." She urged attention to the subject, and discussed feelingly the position of railway men, who should have stations where temperance refreshment can be procured in winter, and temperance literature distributed. The young women's department and the press were remembered.

Then there were fraternal greetings, and we were told that the Odd-fellows of Missouri would not permit a member of their order to sell liquor, and after a paper by Mrs. Fawcett on "Sabbath Observance," one on the "Franchise," and another on "Conference with Influential Bodies," the meeting adjourned. It was the young women's meeting in the evening, and Miss Scott, of Ottawa, presided. Mrs. Williams gave the address of welcome very pleasantly for the Y's, and Mrs. Woodbury responded. Others spoke very much to the point. Miss Barron sang and Miss Gordon made happy allusions to the Y's, who were present in large numbers. Among the speakers was Miss Wright, of Ottawa, a young lady who was stoned and injured at a meeting last winter, while speaking for Christ. Mrs. Middleton gave the young women a mother's blessing, and the meeting closed with hand-shaking and cordial feeling.

Thursday morning we had word from the president that Miss Willard was expected, and a committee was appointed to meet her at the door. Mrs. Fawcett gave an account of efforts to place unfermented wine in the churches for communion purposes, and urged each member to make it her special province in her own church. Mrs. Turnbull was reading her report on social purity, giving an urgent appeal on behalf of those who were led astray, when Miss Willard appeared, leaning on Mrs. Middleton's arm, mothered by our dear and respected honorable president. To suspend proceedings and rise with waving handkerchiefs and much enthusiasm, was the work of a moment, and dozens of hands were put out to grasp hers as she was introduced to the smiling audience, whose welcome was in their faces. With a smile that is her own, she answered, "Well, I'm glad to get here; seems like coming home." She listened with deep attention to Mrs. Turnbull's paper, and roused a spirit of enthusiasm in the audience by the magnetic power of her words and presence. Miss Phelps then spoke of the speech of Dr. Douglass on social purity, that made such a stir last winter. He is a blind clergyman of Montreal, whose clarion tones are ever heard foremost to condemn the social vices of the day. After more discussion, in which Mrs. Dr. Rugg and Mrs. Tilton took part, Miss Willard gave a Parliamentary drill. It was a pleasant episode, and conducted in the way of a mock parliament, taking a subject, and giving the amendments, to teach women who are ignorant of this usage how to conduct meetings in the smaller circles.

In the afternoon we had an address by Miss Leavitt on the degradation that follows the liquor habit, and then Mrs. Noyes gave her report upon "Scientific Instruction," and spoke at length upon the introduction of temperance text-books into our schools. One needs to reside in the Dominion, especially in the Province of Quebec, to understand how difficult this work is, the French Canadian element being in the majority and ruling in our legislature. Some discussion came up as to whether American or Canadian books should be used, but we have not as yet a National temperance literature.

Mrs. Watkins, of Mexico, told how in the city of Mexico, $10,000 a day was spent in drink; that the children drank an intoxicant made from the century plant, as freely as we drink water. Then Mrs. Lucas, the superintendent of hygiene and heredity, gave a clear and instructive account of her work. A bright and interesting paper was read by Mrs. Rudd, of Quebec, on "Fairs and Exhibitions." This lady was full of quiet enthusiasm, and must be a power for good in helping to do away with the evils that always attend the fair ground.

In the evening Erskine Church was filled to overflowing with an earnest, thoughtful audience, who listened to Miss Willard with willing attention. The lecture was a brilliant one, indeed, and in speaking of Dr. Barbour who introduced her, she said, "There is nothing so dear to a woman's heart as a good man's praise; indeed, if we had more from them we should be the better for it." She explained that she was called the head of the movement, but we did not know, perhaps, how near she had been to losing her head, for it was the turn of the Dominion president to supersede her, and Mrs. Foster declined the position. Then she asked, smilingly, "Can you men in your politics show anything like that? 'in honor preferring one another.' " In fine language she spoke of the temptations to which men were exposed, in smelling the liquor after they had signed the pledge, and of the allurements to evil.

On Friday morning Miss Willard gave the young women a lesson in parliamentary practice, asking them if they had "Roberts' Rules of Order," or Mrs. Benjamin's "Parliamentary Usage." The drill was another "mock parliament" well sustained. Then followed a report on parlor meetings and one from Miss Rutherford on sailors and raftmen. Mrs. Trenholme, of Nova Scotia, stirred the convention by an impassioned speech in which her voice trembled with emotion. We had a glimpse of the sailor, as the speaker portrayed him, manly and brave, generous to a fault and tender-hearted. With pathos she told of a sick sailor who was brought to God by the work of the W. C. T. U., and of vessels when the women were saved and the men went down with the ship. She thought women would not have been equally courageous. At the close of Mrs. Trenholme's talk, Miss Willard said earnestly, "You forget Grace Darling, and Ida Lewis, and hosts of other heroines; there is chivalry in women, too." Mrs. Fawcett, of Toronto, was elected president; Mrs. Foster declining to be reëlected. The new president was welcomed and escorted to the platform.

During the morning session a vote was taken as to whether the meetings should be annual or biennial; an animated discussion was followed by a decision for the annual. Mrs. Steadman was elected vice-president, Miss Tilley corresponding secretary, and Miss Rutherford recording secretary. One of the pleasant features of this last day was the presentation to Miss Willard of two volumes of "Picturesque Canada," "a token of love from her Canadian cousins." It was a genuine surprise, and showed that quite a large convention of women can keep a secret. Miss Willard said she would carry the books with her on the cars, and learn more about Canada as she went through it, till she got to those far-off maritime provinces; "but not 'cousins,' we are 'sisters,'" she said earnestly.

The question-box was full of interest. We had each day, spread in the church parlors, an elegant lunch, provided and attended by the Y's.

One afternoon the tramp of the children was heard, and with temperance banners they marched around the church and were then seated in the center aisle, when Miss Anna Gordon addressed them. Miss Barnjum, of Montreal, welcomed them, and Miss Lizzie Evans led in a prayer of pure, simple diction that went to many hearts. They then sang "Dare to be a Daniel," with wonderful fervor, and there was a fine recitation by a little girl whose play upon the word "cur-tail," was remarkably good. The little infant brigade of the Band of Hope, of Christ Church Cathedral, of Montreal, went through a motion song, and Miss Gordon entranced the children by her sweet, winning manner and beautiful language. It was an inspiriting sight to see so many little temperance workers, who will be the voters in the twentieth century, standing by their colors, and pledged to abstain from the evils of intemperance, and so from vice. God give them grace to keep it!

A change of churches for Friday evening found us in the church of Rev. Dr. Wells, American Presbyterian, and the packed building was a magnificent manifestation of the sympathy felt for Miss Willard and her great cause. The pulpit was hidden by flowers, and Dr. Wells, in an eloquent speech, introduced the lecturer.

Needless for me to repeat Miss Willard's noble utterances—how she speaks of purity and goodness, of the sacredness of home, and the beauty of holiness. She was particularly happy in the allusions made to the marriage relation, and spoke of co-education as being the chief factor to mutual development of the sexes. "The highest commendation an Arab gives to a young man is, 'He is a brother to girls,' and we want more brotherly men and sisterly girls. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is doing its best work in raising the standard of womanhood to become the counselor of man, not his toy."

One of the resolutions made in the afternoon was that home should be made so attractive that our young people should be contented there, and not seek the saloons; that it is a duty of all mothers to see to it that their children have innocent amusements, and the pleasures of home life for themselves and their companions.

The White Cross and social purity work were explained during the earlier part of the evening, and when the splendid choir arose and sang, "Home, Sweet Home," we felt that much good must result from such fervid, eloquent appeals. And so with many a hand shake, and hopes of meeting again, we parted at the vestry door, each and all encouraged by our union, for it did, indeed, give us strength and power to battle against wrong; and so good-bye, and "God be with you till we meet again," dear sisters from the far northwest, from the maritime Provinces, with your sailors who are mothered by such stanch women; friends from fertile Ontario, we wave you adieu; sisters of Quebec, we hope to catch glimpses of you now and then; and the uncrowned queen of Temperance, with her earnest "God bless you," will ever be enshrined in our hearts, a pleasant memory of the Dominion W. C. T. U. as held in Montreal.

CONVENTIONS AND WORKERS.

"Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it." If the wise man who said this had been a resident of the Buckeye state the past winter and spring, he might have said, "Many waters and floods cannot quench the zeal of Ohio white-ribboners, neither can Ohio mud keep them from attending their conventions." How prayer, push and perseverance can carry a good cause right on in spite of difficulties! For instance, Trumbull county, Miss C. S. Burnett, president, held its mid-year convention April 30. Its fourteen local unions, five of which have been organized during the year, are carrying forward twelve departments of work. Miss Burnett, county superintendent of press work, has secured a W. C. T. U. column in six of the nine papers, for which she has furnished seventy columns of temperance matter, besides many items, notices and reports to other papers. Miss H. F. Brown, superintendent of scientific temperance instruction, has placed four hundred bulletins in the hands of the teachers, and done much other work in her department. Money has been donated to the fund for Miss Willard and Mother Stewart, also to South Dakota and W. C. T. U. headquarters at Lakeside. Letters, signed by the county officers, have been sent to Ohio congressmen urging the passage of the Blair Educational Bill and the Sunday Rest Bill. The Ohio enrollment for equal suffrage has been sent to all unions. Papers on the subject have been presented at conventions, and literature has been distributed. The sentiment in favor of franchise is growing. Social purity is receiving special attention; the petition is being circulated, and articles in harmony with its spirit are furnished the press. Ten columns on narcotics have been printed, and large cards giving the law forbidding the sale of tobacco to minors have been put up in public places. It has been made a misdemeanor for one under fifteen to use tobacco in any public place or street in Warren, the county seat.

Twenty-six Demorest silver medal contests have been held, nine by the president, and nine by the county superintendent. Gold medal contests have been held at each county convention. This has been found the easiest way to raise money and interest the people. At the last gold medal contest fifty copies of THE UNION SIGNAL were distributed. Eighty-five UNION SIGNALS are taken in the unions. The state paper is also taken. The superintendent of the mercy department has spent four dollars in the work, and supplied the press with articles on the subject. The Y's hold monthly dime socials. Crusade Day was observed, with one exception, in all the unions. Sermons on Sabbath observance preached at every point, also papers read and literature distributed. Banners for county, and most of the unions, are being made. A W. C. T. U. booth provided with literature will be a feature of the coming county fair. The president has been kept at home by sickness in her family, but has held the work of her county in heart and mind, writing more than five hundred letters in its interest. Another notable convention, that of Hancock county, was held in Findlay. The annual address of the president, Mrs. W. W. Criley, was peculiarly helpful. She exhorted the unions to pursue the work with love, to study it carefully, and to strive for the best results; emphasized the importance of press work, and the distribution of literature, and urged the unions to subscribe for THE UNION SIGNAL and the Ohio Messenger. Reports of superintendents were encouraging. Plan of Work committee recommended special attention to organization, press, fair, Sabbath-school work, social purity, parliamentary usage in the unions, and a crusade against tobacco in all its forms. Resolutions were adopted reaffirming loyalty to the National W. C. T. U., favoring the enforcement of the state law against the sale of tobacco and cigarettes to minors, Sabbath observance, the ballot for women, and special efforts in the interest of W. C. T. U. press work in the city. Miss Barr, superintendent of UNION SIGNAL work, suggested a canvass of the county unions to ascertain the number of subscribers, with a view to increasing the list. Mrs. Strother gave an excellent address on "Franchise." Mrs. M. L. Detwiler was elected president, and Mrs. M. C. Nurry, secretary for the ensuing year. Sixteen departments are carried forward with energy and success.

The annual convention of Cuyahoga county was held May 15 in Brooklyn village, that most desirable "suburb" which Cleveland covets. The president, Mrs. J. T. Foote, was not present, owing to the recent loss of a dear sister. Mrs. T. K. Doty was called to the chair and ably presided during the session. The fourteen unions were well represented. Reports of secretaries and superintendents were gratifying. Good work is being done in the county. We missed Mrs. Foote's annual address which we had come to anticipate as an intellectual treat as well as an inspiration in our work. A letter written in the shadow of her affliction, in which she declined a reëlection, was read. It was rich in loving counsel and wise suggestions in the interest of county W. C. T. U. work. She commended to our thought the 124th Psalm, which was read by the secretary, after which Mrs. Sweet led in a tender prayer for our bereaved sister. Mrs. H. B. Hammond, well and favorably known for her work's sake, was elected president, and Mrs. J. M. Chandler, secretary; the other officers were retained. Press work was added to the departments, and Mrs. Nellie Miner was appointed superintendent. The following resolution was passed, and ordered forwarded for publication: That this convention tender our retiring president our heartfelt thanks for her faithful performance of the duties devolving upon her during the many years that she has so carefully and efficiently worked for the interests of the great cause that is so dear to all our hearts, and we ask that God may bless her future work in whatever direction she may in His providence be led.

BITS FROM THE COLLECTION BASKET.

The Y's of Hillsboro have outgrown their old quarters, Methodist parsonage, and are fast filling their fine room, situated on one of the best streets of the city.

Miss Mary Henry, National superintendent press work, is about to issue uniform question lists for the use of her superintendents, state and local. Better reports will result from this better plan.

Mother Stewart's birthday was very generally observed in the Ohio local unions. Her home city, Springfield, honored itself in doing honor to our brave, venerable standard-bearer. Long live Mother Stewart!

Mrs. H. E. Hammond, state organizer, recently spent a week in Guernsey and Tuscarawas counties, where she organized three unions and added to the W. C. T. U. force one hundred and nine new members. This grand worker is in demand.

The W. C. T. U. School of Methods, at Lakeside, this summer, in charge of Mrs. Mary B. Ingham, Cleveland, will undoubtedly prove a success. Every state superintendent is invited to take part, and every one interested in any phase of reform, from Ohio and elsewhere, is urged to be present. A season of rare profit and enjoyment is predicted.

WORK AT CELINA.

Our annual meeting was held Tuesday, May 20. After the report of the secretary, Mrs. T. G. Tonvelee, the especial pleasure of the meeting was the address of our retiring president, Mrs. S. A. Riley, which was strong and beautiful and was appreciated most fully. The heart of every woman present was warm toward her who had for two years honored us with her womanly presence in the chair, and about whom tender recollections will always gather as we think of her in after years.

The treasurer read an encouraging report of work done during the year. Aside from paying membership dues, twenty-three in number—up to October 15, 1890, we have contributed to the lines of work as follows: Local literature, $2; educational work, $3.44; National Temple, $5; Lakeside Temple, $3; Dakota Suffragist, $1; Scientific Temperance Bulletin, $4; lectures, $25; sixteen subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL; total collections, $52.39.

In April of this year we called Mrs. Frances T. Leiter, state superintendent of scientific temperance instruction, for two lectures. Her topics were, "Shall we Save the Children?" and "Esther's Call." Her eloquent and touching themes kindled in the breasts of her hearers the knowledge that, under Christianity, the golden age lies in the hands of our children. Both lectures were marked by great simplicity and naturalness of expression, and especially by the unction of a thoroughly surrendered soul. During the last year we have encountered many discouragements through sickness and death, and we feel that we are weak in numbers but strong in faith, standing true to the W. C. T. U., so signally blessed of God.

WORK AT HARRIMAN.

Although the town of Harriman has been in existence less than three months it already has an organized W. C. T. U. Among its pioneers were a few earnest white-ribboners who quickly saw that there was work for them even in a prohibition city, and through their efforts a W. C. T. U. was organized, with seventeen members and the following officers: President, Mrs. James McDowell, from New York; vice-presidents, Mrs. A. C. Joy, from New York, Mrs. Gordan, from Kentucky, Mrs. W. A. Lake, from Wisconsin; treasurer, Miss Flora Gordan, from Kentucky; recording secretary, Mrs. R. W. Gates, from New York; corresponding secretary, Mrs. F. L. Wing, from Massachusetts.

We have held two interesting meetings, and at one Mrs. Gen. Fisk and Mrs. Kent, of New Jersey, Mrs. Condon, of London, and Miss Crosby, of Maine, were present and talked most earnestly to the ladies about the several kinds of work in which each are especially interested.

Taking advantage of the presence of the directors of the East Tennessee Land Company, and other prominent Prohibitionists, a public meeting was held under the auspices of our union, which was largely attended and pronounced a grand success. Among the speakers were Dr. Frederic James Tomkins, of London, Rev. C. H. Mead, of New York, Gen. Clinton B. Fisk, of New Jersey, and Rev. C. E. Nash, of Akron, O. Mrs. Alice J. Osborn, of Boston, and the Silver Lake Quartette were present, and with their delightful singing added greatly to the interest of the meeting.

At its close a collection was taken amounting to over fifty dollars. We feel that our union has been organized and started under most promising circumstances, and we hope to be able to do work that shall win for us a place among our earnest, active sister unions, and to be a power for good, here in our own community.

DELAWARE.

Y. W. C. T. U. CONFERENCE.

At a conference of the Y delegates at the annual convention of the W. C. T. U. of Delaware, last October, Miss Mary H. Mather, state superintendent of Y work, suggested that a state conference be held in Wilmington sometime during the year, which should consist of delegates from each union in the state. This suggestion was adopted, and May 6 was fixed as the time. There were delegates present from Milford, Camden, Dover, Middletown, Hockessin, Newark, Newport, and members of Wilmington Y's No. 1 and No. 2.

The conference was held in the Central Presbyterian Church, Miss Mather presiding. Sprays of dogwood in blossom, lilacs and other shrubs and blossoms, made tasteful decorations in the room; large vases of blossoms stood on the superintendent's desk, and on tables at either side. Each Y wore a bunch of ivy leaves tied with white ribbon. Quite a number of visitors were present.

The session began at 2:30 p. m., with singing the Y. W. C. T. U. hymn and the superintendent reading a part of the fifteenth chapter of St. John, after which prayer was offered by Miss Margaret S. Hilles, state president of the W. C. T. U. A devotional exercise followed, which was taken from an old copy of the Oak and Ivy Leaf, entitled "Our Life a Ministry," and consisting of selections, which were read by different members of the Y's. Solos were sung and good music was furnished by a glee club of some fifteen ladies, members of the Wilmington Y, No. 1, the hymns being all taken from the "Y Song Book."

Instead of the usual formal address of welcome, Miss Mather gave all a very cordial greeting, and then called upon each union represented to report briefly the progress of its work. These were, for the most part, encouraging; new work having been successfully taken up in some places.

Papers were read on "Juvenile and Social Work," "Distribution of Temperance Literature," "Scientific Temperance Instruction," "Flower Mission," and "The Financial Basis of the Y. W. C. T. U." These papers were full of practical thoughts and suggestions, as well as recitals of successful experiences; Miss Mather made suggestive comments on nearly all the papers. The one on "Temperance Literature" showed that Wilmington Y No. 1 has quite a live committee, not only doing good in distributing temperance literature, but also in making scrap-books for railroad men, one of which was exhibited, also "comfort bags," filled with bandages, and other things useful in case of accidents. These were placed in machine shops in the city.

An interesting part of the program was the exercises by one of the "Cheerful Home Societies" of Wilmington. This work is being carried on very successfully, there being twenty-six teachers and one hundred and sixty-six pupils. The object is to teach the girls sewing, table-setting, and habits of cleanliness and neatness, to make home cheerful and attractive, so that fathers and brothers may be induced to stay at home rather than seek pleasure in frequenting saloons. These societies are being started elsewhere in the state with good promise of success. The exercises consisted of singing, answering questions, and recitation of texts and the health alphabet; all were well done. Interesting and helpful remarks were made by members, on the several papers. We were glad to have with us Miss Campbell and Mrs. Harris, of New Brunswick, New Jersey, who added helpful words from their own experience.

At the evening session Miss Campbell spoke of evangelistic work, giving an interesting account of the opening of a rescue mission in New Brunswick, where, despite many discouragements, the hearts of the Y's had been made glad by the conversion and reformation of a number of men who had been drunkards. After reading a message from Mrs. Frances J. Barnes, the conference adjourned with the singing of a benediction song by the glee club. Lemonade and cake were then served by the parlor-meeting committee, and an hour was spent in enjoyable conversation. No special canvass was made for new members, but Miss Mather announced that the pledge book was on hand and the union would be very glad to have additions to its membership. Several persons joined.

A consecration meeting was held the next morning in the rooms of Wilmington Y No. 1, led by Miss Campbell, and although few were present, the hour was profitably spent. The conference closed with renewed determination on the part of the members to do all in their power to hasten the final victory for temperance.

ST. JOSEPH COUNTY CONVENTION.

This was held in South Bend, April 29 and 30; was the largest and most enthusiastic of its kind ever held in the county. Eight unions were represented by fifty-two delegates; true, earnest women, whose coming together meant a more determined opposition to the liquor traffic.

The convention was called to order Tuesday morning by the president, Mrs. H. L. Rowell, after which followed the roll-call, appointment of committees, prayer and adjournment. The afternoon session was devoted mainly to reports of the corresponding secretary, treasurer, and local unions, and the annual address of the county president.

The evening meeting was unusually interesting. Very pleasing words of welcome were spoken by Mrs. Mary E. Ozmun, and responded to by Mrs. H. M. Simpkins. Then followed a gold medal contest, the contestants being from Mishawaka, South Bend, and Walkerton. Sherman Jernegan, son of Editor Jernegan, of the Mishawaka Enterprise, carried off the medal.

The meetings of Wednesday were full of interest. Reports of superintendents of departments, papers representing different phases of the work, and the election of officers was the order of the day. Able papers were presented on "Sabbath Desecration," by Mrs. Hattie Robins; "Temperance Literature," Mrs. Lee; "Young Women's Work," Miss Mary Mooma, and "Social Purity," Mrs. Ellen Baxter. Mrs. P. J. Perkins, of Mishawaka, presented a most excellent paper on, "Do we believe that the W. C. T. U. came into existence providentially?" Mrs. Ella Moore, of Lakeville, told of the "Advantages of a W. C. T. U. to a Community." The convention ordered 1,000 copies of this paper to be printed for general distribution throughout the county.

The election of officers for the ensuing year resulted in the choice of the former president, Mrs. Rowell; Mrs. A. Bugbee, corresponding secretary; Mrs. H. L. Shurts, recording secretary: Mrs. P. J. Perkins, treasurer.

A club of thirty for THE UNION SIGNAL and the Organizer, our state paper, was made up. This shows that the women of St. Joseph county desire to keep themselves informed in the work of the organization.

Mrs. Josephine R. Nichols, our state president, was with us through nearly the whole session, and rendered valuable assistance. Wednesday evening she gave an address which was listened to with rapt attention. Her description of Eiffel Tower, and its application to woman's work in temperance reform, was very fine.

The report of the corresponding secretary showed a marked increase in membership during the year, and the report of the treasurer convinced us of the wisdom of our finance plan, which is this: Each union in the county is to give one entertainment a year, and the net proceeds, whether much or little, are to go into the county treasury. This, with ten cents per member, county dues, enables us to carry on our work to advantage.

H. L. ROWELL.

CONNECTICUT.

GLEANINGS.

That the unions are persevering in the work is evident, for from all quarters come reports of work commenced or accomplished. Plantsville union sends the following items from the annual report of the secretary: This society closed its second year's work March 18, and now numbers fifty-one members against thirty-three of last year. During the year they have held meetings alternate weeks, and but two meetings were omitted, their average attendance being eighteen. They took no summer vacation, and have been using Mrs. Smith's Bible Readings; they add to this a Psalm read responsively. During their work for the amendment it was helped and encouraged by aid from many, and these included some not connected with the union.

They have held or participated in five public meetings, and have given $100 toward a free reading room and gymnasium, and also were active in soliciting furniture and reading matter for it. They use literature wisely and have distributed twenty-one hundred leaflets, besides many papers. The Chrysanthemum Club of Plantsville gave the generous amount of $100, and the union has handled over $200 during the year. The report closes with these words: "This has been a prosperous year for our union. We are in good condition for further work. We believe we have set in motion many influences for good which are likely to be far-reaching."

The Loyal Temperance Legion, in connection with the Hanover union, is in a flourishing condition, having over forty members. Goshen union has been especially active in holding medal contests and in introducing scientific temperance teaching into the schools. They have supplied the schools with Blaisdell's series of physiologies to supplement the state book. Sherman union reports work and renewed efforts to keep temperance sentiment alive, as do other societies that have nothing special to chronicle, but continue to hold meetings and labor in quiet ways. South Norwalk is working for a Temperance Hall, and held during Easter week a "Business Man's Carnival," the proceeds to go toward the building fund.

Our White Ribbon Banner continues to wave, and we were pleased to receive a request for a copy of this, our state paper, from Manchester, England. Middlefield has a large and growing Loyal Temperance Legion. The union has recently been engaged in special work of an evangelistic character.

WORK AT WESTBROOK.

The W. C. T. U. held a birthday thank offering service in the M. E. Church on Tuesday evening, March 4, which was well attended by an appreciative audience. A banner bearing the motto of the order was placed on the altar and tasteful little white ribbon baskets were prepared to receive the offerings, after a timely address from Miss M. Belle Smith, on "The Mission of the White Ribbon," which evinced much thought and care in its preparation and held the attention of the audience for thirty or forty minutes.

Two young ladies kindly favored us by reading the "Birthday Poem," and "Collection Speech," and a little girl gave a very pleasing recitation.

After a closing address by the pastor, Rev. A. McAllister, and a final rendering by the choir, which furnished other fine music for the occasion, the meeting was dismissed with the benediction by the pastor.

FIFTH DISTRICT CONVENTION.

This was held in Holland, April 22-25, and was a very profitable occasion. Convention opened at 2:30 p. m. Tuesday in the Methodist Church, with a good representation; seating of convention, appointing of committees and parliamentary drill by Mrs. A. S. Benjamin, our district president, who is also the N. W. C. T. U. parliamentarian.

In the evening the address of welcome by Mrs. J. C. Post, of Holland, and response by Mrs. J. H. Brownell, of Grand Rapids, and the annual address of Mrs. Benjamin, were all very instructive and entertaining.

Wednesday morning we met at the Hope Church; the day was very full of reports and papers. "Why we Work," and "What Can a Local Union Do?" were ably read and discussed. In the evening, Volney B. Cushing, of Maine, held the closest attention of a large audience, while he told of the effects of high license in his earnest manner. Thursday we met in the First Reform Church, and passed another busy day, while papers were read and discussed, and reports commented on. "Temperance work in Sunday Schools," "Who are Called?" "Does Literary Work make Mothers less Motherly?" etc. All were participated in with interest. Three little girls sang some kindergarten songs, and six children under five years of age were dedicated to the Froebel Loyal Legion. The memorial exercises occurred on this day also, eight sisters having crossed the river of death. The exercises were very appropriate.

The church was crowded in the evening to listen to our much loved state president, Mary T. Lathrap, who in her usual eloquent manner told "Why women had gone into politics." "As they were fighting the saloon, they had to go where the saloon was intrenched," etc. She handled the subject logically, as she does all similar subjects.

Convention met at the M. E. Church Friday morning and proceeded in the order of the program. Music was furnished by choirs of several churches, and a chorus of twenty-four small boys each evening was heartily appreciated. Meals were served in the dining rooms of each church by their respective committee most bountifully. The pastors in the several churches rendered kindly assistance. Many good resolutions were adopted, conversions to the work were made, and all feel much encouraged to go forward in the battle of right. The election of officers resulted as follows: President, Mrs. A. S. Benjamin; corresponding secretary, Maggie L. Smith, recording secretary, Clara M. Wheeler; treasurer, Mrs. P. B. Whitfield. Convention adjourned to meet in Lowell.

SECOND DISTRICT CONVENTION.

This was held in Hudson, April 22–24. This district comprises four counties, Hillsdale, Washtenaw, Lenawee and Monroe. Mrs. Julia D. Stannard, president, and the four county presidents attended throughout the convention. We were also cheered and encouraged by the presence of our beloved state president, Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap. She delivered addresses to crowded houses two evenings, holding the audience spellbound by her eloquence. She also entertained us one afternoon with a lesson on physical culture, both profitable and amusing, with directions for dressing, standing and breathing properly; advised us to put our whole soul into whatever we do, and cease to think of the flight of years. "Don't celebrate your birthdays, but just imagine yourselves forever young," etc.

The convention was called to order by the president at 9 a. m. Tuesday, and devotional exercises, conducted by Mrs. Malvina Martin, evangelistic superintendent, were a sweet consecration to the work to which the Father has called this band of earnest, praying women. The same trustful, pleading spirit was shown in all the devotions throughout the entire session, and business was conducted most harmoniously.

The district engages in seventeen departments of work. Most of the superintendents were present and gave encouraging reports, showing activity and progress. The treasurer's report contained interesting statistics. Balance from last year, $75.85; total receipts for the year, $149; expenditures, $80.49; balance in treasury, $144.36.

Some exceedingly interesting papers were read on "Flower Mission," "Those Shadowed Lives," "Social Purity," "The Needs of the Hour," "Suggestions to Mothers," and last, but by no means least, "Franchise" was handled most ably by Mrs. Ann W. Bassett, superintendent of that department. Her arguments for equal suffrage were forcible and convincing. The president's address was unusually interesting, touching along the lines of department work.

We were entertained by the people of Hudson with unstinted hospitality, both in their homes and at the church, where dinner and tea were served each day for delegates and visitors. The clergy of the city attended most of the meetings, and with cheering words bade us "Godspeed." One unusually pleasing episode was an address of welcome, on behalf of the citizens, delivered by a young gentleman, editor of one of the city papers. Excellent music was furnished each evening by local talent. Mrs. Stannard was reëlected, almost unanimously, and thus entered upon her third year as president of the second district.

FREEBORN COUNTY CONVENTION.

The W. C. T. U. held its first convention in the Presbyterian Church of Albert Lea, April 29. Rev. S. Gorman, honorary member of the W. C. T. U. gave the delegates a cordial greeting. The response was given by Miss Cook. The reports from seven unions and one Y were interesting. Report from departments were as follows: Evangelistic, Mrs. T. W. Purdie; missionary work, Mrs. A. L. Fisk; Sabbath observance, Mrs. Scott; work among foreigners, Mrs. Barc.

Papers of interest were read by the following: Miss Ella J. Cook, "Juvenile Work;" Mrs. E. M. Preston, "Social Purity;" Mrs. Green, "Influence of Mothers;" "Minorities in Reform," Mrs. Newcomb.

Much of the interest and success of the convention were due to the efforts of Mrs. Newcomb, state organizer, who was with us, and of Mrs. Marion Baxter, of Michigan. Her address to the convention was a source of inspiration to all who heard her. She gave two popular evening lectures, both well attended and highly appreciated.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

THE Petoskey, Mich., W. C. T. U. is greatly encouraged in having secured a pleasant room for headquarters during the coming year, where besides regular meetings they may hold gospel temperance meetings, mothers' meetings, etc. A Loyal Temperance Legion has been organized which promises well. On the evening of April 22, the room was opened with appropriate exercises. The Ladies' Quartette of Petoskey gave fine music, and an interesting literary program was furnished by members of the union. Short speeches were made by the pastors of several churches expressive of their sympathy with W. C. T. U. work. Mrs. Barnes, county president, was present and made a few remarks which were highly appreciated.

RESOLUTIONS of thanks and appreciation were passed by the W. C. T. U. of St. Augustine, Florida, concerning the help given by Mr. and Mrs. A. P. Kelley, of Chicago, and their daughter, toward a delightful concert, held April 9, which brought into the treasury of the union, over and above expenses, $53.30. Miss Kelley sang at this concert, to the great pleasure of all who heard her. The Rev. Dr. H. M. Field addressed the meeting, adding much to its success, and Mr. Flagler donated the use of the Casino in which the concert was held. An unusual pressure upon the columns of THE UNION SIGNAL has prevented this notice appearing sooner.

MRS. C. M. KNAPP, president of Brooklyn W. C. T. U. No. 15, writes thus: "Our union consists of thirty-five members, having our headquarters at the Atlantic Avenue Chapel. We are only about two years old, but we have a membership of boys and girls forming Loyal Temperance Legion Co. F, Kings county. Miss I. F. Tooker, president of No. 1 Y, made us a visit, bringing friends to give the children an instructive and interesting entertainment, without fee or reward. On Saturday evening, May 10, in the audience room of the chapel, Mr. T. Leeds Waters with his phonograph, illustrated its wonders in bringing forth the music of various bands and church chimes, and also a laughing chorus, previously 'bottled up,' so to speak, in the hidden recesses of the phonograph. Mr. Hunt performed upon the zylophone, and the Misses Mackay and Hart gave us some very acceptable vocal and instrumental music. Of course the children were delighted, as well as the room full of friends who were present. We think that our most promising work is among the children. We are expecting to introduce into the Loyal Temperance Legion the plan suggested by Mr. Hall, of sending our boys with copies of THE UNION SIGNAL, delivering them at three cents weekly."

A DEAR W. C. T. U. worker in Iowa, urges the wearing of the badge most earnestly thus: "I wish all the sisters of the W. C. T. U. would wear the white ribbon when traveling. If it is ever of importance I think it is when we are facing the world. Men of every order can be recognized by the badge they wear. Then why not let the whole world know where we stand? In traveling some five hundred miles I only saw one white ribbon. I wish we might in some way impress upon all our W. C. T. U. women the importance of carrying out the principles of our order. We certainly are not ashamed of the cause."

STRONG resolutions were unanimously adopted by the third district, Mich., W. C. T. U., regarding the wrong of all temporizing methods in dealing with the liquor traffic, and urging its complete prohibition; claiming the franchise for women; declaring loyalty to the National and State W. C. T. U., and heartily indorsing the resolutions passed by the last National convention. The Girard union, in this district, has thirty-five members, and these are zealous workers. They have recently organized a Loyal Temperance Legion.

As Mrs. Hattie Findly, the efficient treasurer of the Greenville, Pa., union, was about leaving her old associations for a new residence in New Mexico, the W. C. T. U. and W. F. M. S. tendered her a most delightful farewell reception; she was also the recipient of some very handsome presents from her many friends. "A large club of subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL receive its weekly visits with pleasure," writes one of the Greenville W. C. T. U. members. Miss Mary Dumar, the corresponding secretary, has recently returned from a winter's stay in Chicago, and is heartily welcomed by her friends.

THE following comes from a Tennessee correspondent: "I desire to express through your columns the thanks of the Dayton W. C. T. U. for literature sent in response to the call of Mrs. Meriwether. I trust much good is being done by the constant supply of literature in public places. The following was found written on the edge of THE UNION SIGNAL in a wall pocket in the depot: 'While having a weary waiting at Dayton depot, my heart was cheered to find the dear UNION SIGNAL in the cozy case. God bless the good lady who has the courage to put it there! Saloons on every hand, as every one may see.' Signed, 'A Stranger.' I wonder the dear sisters of the unions do not keep well-filled pockets of temperance and religious literature in depots, barber shops and all public places for weary, waiting ones. I believe a vast amount of good might be done in that way. The lady who gave us the thought said she was converted to our work by reading some of our leaflets in the depot. One of the officers of our railroad expressed the wish that all depots on this road might be supplied with good reading matter. Our union is preparing for our third medal contest. Our corresponding secretary says the work is moving forward all over the state; the unions seem to have renewed their strength."

APPROPRIATE and beautiful resolutions were adopted by the Allendale, Michigan, W. C. T. U., concerning the death of their beloved president and sister, Mrs. H. C. Finster, who was foremost in all reforms for purity and right. A friend writes the following beautiful tribute: "Many times during the past few months has she grown very weary in the work that lay so near her heart, yet she never faltered till the Master said, 'It is enough.' Old and young, the children, the burdened, and especially the 'shut-in' ones, each and all felt that in her they had a tried friend. Two days only she battled with disease, and the life so short, so full, ripened into life eternal."

MRS. W. P. KUHL, president of the twelfth district of Illinois, spent a week in Adams county, recently, and accomplished very earnest work, showing always the spirit of love which "thinketh no evil." She organized a union of sixteen members at Coatsburg. The town has been heavily burdened with saloons for sixteen years. This year an anti-license board was elected, and the saloons had to go. Mrs. Kuhl also organized a new union at Ursa, of ten members. At Mendon she greatly encouraged the union, and secured seven new members; these, with four at Camp Point, makes a total of thirty new members gained within a few days.

THROUGH the good work of Miss Vandelia Varnum the union at Plum, Pa., gained a number of new members during the winter. The W. C. T. U. has had several entertainments this spring in which it has been quite successful. It is loyal to the National W. C. T. U.

ON the first of March last, the union at Morse, Kansas, commenced work on their W. C. T. U. Hall for the use of the society, and for all educational and moral assemblies. The work was completed May 8. On the evening of the 9th it was dedicated to the use of prohibition. Miss Elizabeth Raymond, state superintendent of juvenile work, had been secured to deliver the dedicatory address. At an early hour the hall, 22x40, seating two hundred persons, was filled, and a good program was carried out to the satisfaction of all present.

THE W. C. T. U. of Franklin, Neb., mourn the loss of their faithful and valued president, Mrs. Ruth A. Dickey, who passed away from earth Sunday, April 13. The funeral was held in the parlors of the Ladies' Hall, where Mrs. Dickey had lived for three years as matron of the Franklin Academy. The pall-bearers were students. The W. C. T. U. attended as a body; each member carried in her hand a spray of evergreen tied with the white ribbon, and these were dropped into the open grave, as the W. C. T. U. passed around it. Mrs. Dickey was deeply interested in the work of the coming campaign for the prohibition amendment. The union will greatly miss her as friend, leader and counselor. The tribute closes thus: "At our last county convention she gave the greeting of welcome to the sisters from abroad; now she is ready to greet us as we pass over to the other side. And may we all be as ready to go at a moment's call as was our dear sister"!

MRS. L. E. BAILEY has recently closed the canvass of Cass and Saline counties, Nebraska. In Cass she gave twenty-three lectures, also holding ladies' and children's meetings, building up old unions and organizing new ones. She is working up bands for the Temperance Temple, and obtaining subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL, and Nebraska state W. C. T. U. paper, The Union Worker. At Wabash, Cass county, Mrs. Bailey organized a union with the following officers: President, Mrs. Marcia Wood; vice-president, Mrs. L. B. Gordon; recording secretary, Miss Nellie Williams; corresponding secretary, Miss Rosy Clark; treasurer, Mrs. C. O. Edgar. In Saline county, Mrs. Bailey gave twenty-five lectures, and she reports this as the best organized county in the state. Under the efficient management of Mrs. S. T. Corey, president, Mrs. I. A. Troyer, and Mrs. M. Miller, secretary and treasurer, most active and energetic women, a union has been formed at every town in the county, and Mrs. Bailey found organization complete, but new members were added at every place.

THE semi-annual convention of the Louisa County, Iowa, W. C. T. U., met in Wyman, May 8, 1890, adopted the following resolutions without one dissenting voice:

Resolved, That we, the members of Louisa County W. C. T. U., now in convention, consider the withdrawal of the Iowa delegation from the National Convention at Chicago last November, as unjustifiable and unwise, and that we deplore the division that has thus taken place in the ranks of the Christian temperance women, and trust that better counsels will soon prevail, and the unhappy breach ere long be healed.

Resolved, That we cannot help feeling that a new National organization will be regarded not as an auxiliary, but as a rival of the original union, and that the result of such a course will be a hindrance to the common cause and an encouragement to the common enemy.

Resolved, That we recognize the old National W. C. T. U. as the only true non-partisan organization, inasmuch as it acts on the principle of giving its "approval of any and all National parties that shall incorporate prohibition in their platforms, embody the principles of prohibition in their candidates, and enforce it with all their executive powers."

FRANCHISE.

I trust that my sisters of the white-ribbon army will pardon the shrinking that arises from a recognition of the importance of the work to which you have called me. To convey to and impress upon the minds of the Christian womanhood of this country the lofty place it occupies in the economy of God for the elevation, progress and prosperity of this favored land, is a commission so important, a duty so imperative, a privilege so great, that in accepting your call to it, I most earnestly desire your coöperation and your prayers. I shall welcome and carefully consider any plan or method of work suggested. The expressions of sympathy and Godspeed which have already reached me are helpful and inspiring.

It would be a pleasure, indeed, to reach the ear and grasp the hand of every member of our grand organization, but as that is impossible, I am glad to be informed that the two lecturers for this department, Mrs. Z. Wallace and Mrs. M. E. Haggert, are women of great ability. I hope that each state will arrange to have this important department presented by one of these able speakers at a state convention.

I shall hope that nearly every state will appoint a superintendent of franchise before the close of the year. In so doing, I urge that great care be exercised in the selection of the right woman. This department should be represented by women of refinement, of judgment, of self-control; any others would jeopardize and retard the work.

I hope we may add greatly to helpful literature in the department, and that this may be well and widely circulated. All that is needed is to arouse thought, and we shall soon see the enlargement of womanhood, the banishment of the belittling idea of subordination, free scope for the use of all God-given talent, much of which has long been laid up in a napkin because of the traditions of men.

Shall There Be one strong, mighty

Effort in the next two weeks whereby 15,000 new names shall be sent us? Surely we have done our part in offering you as a reward for your efforts a picture of Miss Willard which shall be in all ways entirely satisfactory? We have before stated that Miss Willard knew absolutely nothing of the plan till it was published, and now comes a postal from her which says:

"Do state that I knew nothing about the picture—was not consulted at all. It looks now as if I was pushing my own phiz, which would be miserably stupid and wrong."

Our friends know Miss Willard too well to think such a thing of her, while our claim is that a fine picture of her will certainly help the cause, and be a lasting inspiration to all good effort.

Is not this so?

We have had a great many responses to the call for this particular effort but nothing in numbers approximating the 15,000 mark. A great many will say nothing, but quietly go about getting the names. Another great many will lay the paper down and forget all about the offer,

A Statement.

We do not want our friends, i. e., our subscribers—to think it has been a matter of indifference to us that the paper has, for the last five months or more, been so late in reaching them every week. In January a $12,000 fast press was ordered with the promise from the manufacturers that the press would be finished in April. It is not ready yet nor anywhere near it. Having been subjected to this delay we have now put in an electrical motor and will hereafter run a double force night and day. We naturally did not want to go to any unnecessary expense but have been obliged to do so with the hope of hereafter mailing our entire edition by 6 a. m., Friday of each week. All the mailing is done with the view, as far as possible, of getting the paper to the subscribers by Saturday night of each week.

American Scenery.

There is probably not another ten-mile stretch of railroad in the world more varied and majestic in its surroundings than that from Point of Rocks to Harper's Ferry. The Valley of the Potomac narrows, the hills on either side rise to the stateliness of mountains, and the river flows swiftly in ripples and eddies. Just below the ferry, the river, increased by the Shenandoah's volume, becomes a torrent. On the opposite side is London Heights, a sentinel of the Blue Ridge, dark and frowning. Beyond Virginia and into West Virginia, the base of the two States and ending in the swift flowing stream which separates them, Bolivar Heights start abruptly up with Harper's Ferry at their feet. The train, still upon the opposite side, winds beneath Maryland Heights, thirteen hundred feet high. The meeting of these three mighty forest-crowned masses, the two rivers becoming but one, the long vista up the Potomac, in the foreground the steel bridge and behind it John Brown's Fort and the old-fashioned houses of the town, the ruins of the arsenal whose two tall chimneys alone remain, Jefferson's Rock high on the heights, and over all a September sky—expression fails the theme.

The scene described above can be viewed from the windows of the Vestibuled Trains running between the great cities of the east and west via Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. All B. & O. trains run via Washington.

A W. C. T. U. Trade Mark.

A few weeks ago the publisher was in Baltimore, and having heard of a firm in Easton, Md., that is getting out a washing powder under the name of "W. C. T. U. Cleansing Powder," decided to go and see them. The trip down Chesapeake Bay was a beautiful one. Easton is a delightful village near the Bay, embowered in trees and fragrant with roses. We found the firm to consist of three energetic young men with an idea. Ideas on the substantial things of life; results show that. Their idea is to give the W. C. T. U. a subsidiary profit in all their sales. Their "W. C. T. U. Cleansing Powder" is guaranteed to be most excellent—note particularly what Miss Willard has to say about it in the advertisement elsewhere. The plan is a most excellent one. We do not see why it should not bring money to any W. C. T. U. treasury, for who can get along without soap—so why not use the offer to pay for all wrappers returned? Isn't it far better than the "million canceled postage-stamp" craze? We hope so many of our readers will apply for samples that the "Easton Mfg. Co." will be astonished at the response their advertisement receives. Write to this Company.

DO YOU LIVE IN GREASE?

As a true patriot and citizen you should naturalize yourself by using the best inventions of the day for removing such a charge. To live in Grease is utterly unnecessary when SAPOLIO is sold in all the stores, and abolishes grease and dirt.

PRESS NOTICES

GLIMPSES OF FIFTY YEARS

However much we may differ with Miss Willard in some of her plans and views, as expressed in her addresses and reports, and however much we may wish she and her co-laborers had held to their first grand work of Christian temperance and personal purity, we must give her credit for fidelity and unflinching adherence to what she conceives to be right and duty; and no kind of opposition has prevented her from moving on these lines with unabated confidence of ultimate success.—The Advocate, Richmond.

The large volume of over seven hundred pages is not too voluminous for such a busy career. Every page reflects the energy, perseverance and ambition of its author.—Boston Journal.

It is an unpretentious, albeit a discursive book, written with slight art, but everywhere in touch with the facts of which it relates. . . . There is a little of everything—in the way of personal experience—in this book and it might have been edited to much better advantage. In its present form it throws together descriptions and documents of all sorts in a way that suggests a state history or a campaign biography.—Chicago Evening Journal.

This is an extract from the only negative criticism yet given. Doubtless the editor leaned very strongly toward one political party.

If to write a book that will thrill the heart of every man and woman who reads it with the earnest desire to work for humanity—if to have made the record of a life for fifty years so clearly representative of noble, unswerving, unselfish labor to do God's will for the good of his creatures that all who see it upon the printed pages shall be seized with a longing to go and do likewise, each in his own appointed way—then may Frances E. Willard have this glad consciousness with regard to "Glimpses of Fifty Years."—Toledo Blade.

The whole book teaches one simple lesson: Reject nothing because it is new. New ideas, new and startling propositions, all these must be investigated and reasoned over, not conservatively condemned. Different minds take things in different lights. To minds at all like mine this book will be instructive, helpful and interesting.—The Pioneer.

The volume is not only the picture of the life of one of the most remarkable women of our time, but enshrines some, and indeed, we might say, most of the vital, organizing, redemptive, reformatory ideas of the century.—Our Day.

Never have we seen an autobiography that revealed more completely the inmost thoughts and purposes of a life, and the influences that shaped it. In the record of her childhood, school-girl and schoolma'am days, one traces the same characteristics and sees the same vim and hard work that make her to-day the leading temperance worker and organizer.—Chautauquan.

DR. WILFORD HALL'S

Hygienic Treatment is being used and indorsed by thousands of the leading physicians, lawyers, clergymen, and thinking people throughout the country, many of whom have given us letters.

It takes directly hold of the worst cases of constipation, dyspepsia, liver complaint, headaches, heart disease, incipient consumption, diabetes, and Bright's disease of the kidneys, rheumatism, fevers, and inflammation of the lungs, and of other internal organs, not by attacking these so-called diseases directly, but by radically neutralizing and removing their causes, thus allowing nature herself to do her work unimpeded.

For further information regarding this medicineless treatment call upon or send a 2-cent stamp to A. T. BATES, Room 46, 161 La Salle St., Chicago.

MRS. CLARA C. HOFFMAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MISSOURI W. C. T. U., WRITES:

MR. A. T. BATES, Chicago;

After trying every remedy, for years, to remove constipation and hemorrhoids, and all without avail, I have found a complete cure offered by Dr. W. Hall. I recommend his treatment to all suffering from the hundred ills arising from these causes.

Kansas City, Dec. 24, 1889. C. C. HOFFMAN.

WE WANT 1,000 BRIGHT BOYS OR GIRLS. To whom we can give employment in a way that will be easy and pleasant. The preliminary work can be done after school hours—an hour a week after that will suffice to bring in a profit of from 20 cents to $2.00 a week. SEND FOR PARTICULARS TO The Woman's Temp. Pub. Ass'n 161 LA SALLE ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

We shall surely read every word, even to the Child's Daily Journal, and every word of the detailed Home Talk. . . . The book is eminently a home book. It contains the most inspiring heart convictions during two or three years of foreign travel and of historic scenes to be photographed on the minds and hearts of myriads of children, men and women, by Miss Willard's pen, and her personal presence, which is augmented by the description of her every-day life from her birth to her fiftieth anniversary.—The Church Union.

We have no space to print extracts from letters this week. One letter tells how the paper is passed from one person to another till it is actually worn out. Another writes of how eagerly her husband reads it, and still another of how it has built up their union. All are ready to work for the paper that stands for so much to them. Won't you join their number, and say you will send in one or more new names before July 4th? We certainly offer generous pay in case the 15,000 names are reached, viz.: the picture of Miss Willard.

A Word for Girls of To-day.

BEAVER TIMBER, IND.

"Girls of To-day," from the W. T. P. A., was received some two weeks ago, and after a careful perusal thereof, "the spirit moves me" not only to speak for it very hearty words of commendation whenever occasion offers, but to send to its publishers practical praise (and thanks) in the shape of an order for more. As for the copy sent me, I will try to see that it goes into home after home of those for whom it was written. If I am privileged to be at our county convention next week, I hope to secure some subscribers for THE UNION SIGNAL, for truly, it ought to be on more "center tables."

The directors of the Columbian Exposition have decided on the Lake Front as the site.

More than five hundred speeches a week will be made in the Nebraska campaign during July.

The California W. C. T. U. tendered a reception to Dr. R. H. McDonald, on his seventieth birthday, June 20, at Pacific Grove.

The new constitution of the Brazilian Republic has been signed by President Fonseca. France gives the first official recognition to the new republic.

West Virginia has started a new prohibition paper, The Quest, at Wheeling. It is published by a stock company of which James W. Boadley is president, and Thomas Carskaddon is one of the directors.

The Quinquennial catalogue of Harvard University is for the first time printed in English instead of Latin. It records the names of 16,930 graduates, of whom the oldest is George Bancroft, the historian, who graduated in 1817.

Miss Willard and Mrs. Buell, as President and secretary of the National, have sent a protest against the lottery bill to the legislature of Louisiana, and a letter to Governor Nichols expressing appreciation of the stand he has taken against it.

The Kansas Chautauqua Assembly in session at Ottawa subscribed $3,000 to fight the original package dealers, and appointed a committee to capture each such dealer, tar and feather him, and ship him back to Missouri labeled, "An original package from Kansas to Missouri."

THE price of "Looking Backward," paper bound, has been given in this paper and in the list of books for our reading circles as twenty-five cents; the statement was made on what we supposed good authority; but dealers assure us that the price is fifty cents, and that it can be no lower. Will those ordering it please take notice and govern themselves accordingly?

WE labor under the very great disadvantage of being unable to read Swedish and thus judge of the character of papers published in that language. But of this we feel sure, the Svenska Amerikanska Posten has, since its establishment, six years ago, stood up for God and Home and Native Land, and advocated straight out prohibition with a party to enforce it. We are glad to learn that its subscription list is steadily increasing, and thus it is becoming more and more a felt power for good.

WILLIAM T. STEAD, through the Review of Reviews offers a £300 scholarship tenable at any woman's college in England, to the lady between the ages of eighteen and twenty-three who passes the best examination in Character Sketches and articles on Progress of the World, in the Review from July to December. His object is to stimulate an interest among women in current history. The examination will take place at South Kensington, early in January, that the successful contestant can go up for the entrance examination in March.

MRS. CURRY, of the Boston School of Expression, writes that the Vacation Class for Clergymen and Speakers, at Newport, is open to temperance workers upon the same favorable terms as to clergymen, and that if any such ladies desire extension of time for paying tuition, it will be granted. The class opens July 5, 1890, and includes in its curriculum vocal training, development of correct mental action in speech; training of the body; hymn-reading and Bible-reading.

MRS. CLARA HOLBROOK SMITH, well known to W. C. T. U. women as one of their "own," has won an enviable reputation East and South, where she accompanied Mrs. Jenness-Miller, by her lectures. She is now in Chicago, and will address the ladies in Recital Hall, Auditorium, Saturday afternoon at three o'clock upon artistic and healthful dress. Mrs. Wilmarth, president of the Physical Culture Club, and other leading ladies of the city, take a great interest in this lecture, and we trust Mrs. Smith will have a full house. She is a very interesting speaker, understands her theme, and handles it in an entertaining, sensible way. Admission, fifty cents.

THE annual convention of the Young People's Methodist Alliance will be held in Columbus, Ohio, July 15, 16 and 17, 1890. All Alliances are expected to send delegates and all members of the Alliance and friends are invited to attend. Bishop Taylor, of Africa, Dr. L. W. Munhall, Dr. Jackson, of Columbus, Mrs. S. A. Kean, of Evanston, Miss Frances E. Willard, Rev. C. S. Bullock, of New York, and Miss Isabel S. Leonard, of England, among others, are expected to be present and appear on the program. Reduced railroad fare has been secured between Chicago and Columbus. Correspondence regarding the convention should be addressed to the general corresponding secretary, Miss L. Higgins, Evanston, Ill.

THE Personal Rights Advocate declares that the enemies of personal liberty are gaining ground everywhere; that the Senate has just succumbed to them, being more intolerant than the Secretary of War, Proctor; that Speaker Reed is using his arbitrary power everywhere; for example, when "appointing a committee on alcoholic beverages he selected as all members except one, rabid Prohibitionists;" Southern Senators, notably Colquit of Georgia, are suffering from the contagion; "The president of the Columbian Exposition, Mr. L. J. Gage, is treasurer of the Woman's Temperance syndicate" (Temple); "Alderman Pond introduced into the Chicago City Council an ordinance practically establishing a Puritan Sunday." And so the wail goes on, and we are hard-hearted enough not to sympathize with the Advocate's sorrow.

MISS PUGH, the National treasurer, is to be at the School of Methods at Mountain Lake Park, and will have an hour in which she will tell many things which ought to be known about finance and book-keeping. The program of this school will appear in the Mountain Lake Park White Ribbon, a little paper which Mrs. Buell is preparing, ten thousand copies of which will be sent out. Send a two-cent stamp for a copy to Mrs. Buell. Round-trip tickets to Mountain Lake Park for the School of Methods will be sold from all stations on the B. & O. road and the branches it controls east and west of the Ohio river, for the price of one fare. They will be on sale July 2, and are good till August 4. Season tickets, at reduced rates, good from June 1 to October 31, are also on sale.

THE W. C. T. U. is well represented in the International Sunday-school convention, Miss Willard is upon the program, Miss Kimball, National superintendent of this department, is one of the delegates at large from Illinois, Mrs. Mary T. Burt, president of New York, is a delegate from that state, Mrs. Chase, state superintendent of Pennsylvania, is, we believe, the only lady delegate from that state, and other of our women represent other states. Strong indorsements for the proposed change of Temperance lesson to some Sabbath other than review day are continually pouring in. The great states of New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio stand solid for this measure, as do a dozen other states.

SATURDAY, June 12, is to be a great gala day for the juveniles at Lake Bluff. Another day had been devoted to the juvenile department in the W. C. T. U. School of Methods there, but this was changed to Saturday because that is the only day Miss Gordon can be there, and of course, no children's meeting would be complete without her. The commander-in-chief of juvenile forces, Mrs. Helen G. Rice, of Boston, is to be there, as well as Miss Gordon and Addie Northam, and they are planning delightful things for the Loyal Temperance Legions. Those of Illinois have a genuine surprise in store for them, and it is hoped that all Legions within reach will plan to picnic at Lake Bluff July 12. Come prepared to spend a day in the woods, with an hour's most delightful children's meeting sandwiched in between. At the School of Methods, on that day, Mrs. Rice will occupy the hour from eleven to twelve in teaching how to conduct Loyal Temperance Legions.

THE immense anti-compensation demonstration at Hyde Park, London, was a sight to remember a life-time. In spite of Government efforts to prevent it, the parade was an imposing sight; 100,000 men and women, an hundred bands and four hundred banners were in it. There were thirteen speaking stations in the park, from each of which strong speeches were made. Station 3 was held by the British Women's Temperance Association and the Women's Council of the United Kingdom Alliance; Miss M. E. Docwra presided, Mrs. Pearson, Miss Phillips, "Mrs. Forster, barrister-at-law, of Ohio," as the Chronicle gives it, and Hannah Whitall Smith were among the speakers. A telegram was read from Lady Henry Somerset expressing hearty sympathy Miss Julia Ames, of our staff, was an honored guest. Sir Wilford Lawson presided at station 2; Mr W. S. Caine at No. 4; Prof. Stuart at No. 7; Mr. James Rowlands at No. 8; Mr. C. E. Schwann at station 10, all M. P.'s, and Cardinal Manning at station 10.

MR. ROBERT RAE, of London, who attended the New York Temperance Congress, and is now visiting Canada, has well earned the name of Great Temperance Educationalist. He it was through whose efforts the first temperance sermon was preached in Westminster Abbey; through him Dr. Richardson entered the ranks of temperance workers and led the advance which conquered science for temperance; Mr. Rae was also largely instrumental in starting temperance work in the British army and navy. His greatest personal work has been done through the press. As a writer he is clear, argumentative, sound; the Temperance Record, which he edits, is the paper to which people go for information which can be relied upon, and they are never disappointed. For half a century he has studied the temperance problem and no one understands it better than he. As the Canada Citizen well says: "He is a giant at work, and a wonder because his quiet, genial, 'real goodness' has given him in the United Kingdom such a hold on men and the leaders of men that the hand of Robert Rae, —ah, and the head and heart, too,—is back of almost every good move made outside the direct parliamentary temperance work among adults."

MISS AMY T. MACE, whose article was the basis of Miss Lathrop's attack on the orthodoxy of the W. C. T. U., writes to some of her critics that she had no thought of the question (of orthodoxy) when she wrote the article, but that if they wished her belief, here it is: "I believed the best test of the Lord's call to preach was that He called hearers to hear, and souls were saved. That if the promise was fulfilled to pour out alike His spirit on His sons and daughters, that they should prophesy, or in other words called preacher and congregation, I should not want to meddle. And now it is held up, you say, as a denial of the Bible. You cannot deny too emphatically that such was not my meaning. I believe God will guard His word of revelation for all time, so that none need err therein. But when we hear, as I have among the Mormons, Bible quoted to support polygamy, read of slavery and witchcraft, the burning of heretics, all under the cloak of the Bible, it is time we learned to separate the historical and inspired part of the Bible, to guard against getting a belief and hunting Bible, regardless of context, to fit it. Nor do I consider it sacrilege to regard the epistles as designed sometimes for the needs of the church and hour for which they were written. Doubtless the cloak left at Troas has perished."

"THE LORD LOOKETH ON THE HEART."

BY META E. B. THORNE.

I SAM. XVI: 7.

"Not he who loudly calleth 'Lord,'
But he that doth My will,
He shall be Mine, to dwell with Me
Upon My holy hill;

"He shall be Mine, in that glad day
When I my jewels make,
Who walketh humbly with his God,
In meekness, for My sake;—

"He who upon life's thorny way
Presses with courage on,
Yet vaunteth not the sacrifice—
By him the crown is won.

"Not lofty word nor look, to win
My favor can avail,
But love sincere wrought out in deed
And life, shall never fail."

Thus taught the meek and lowly Christ
In far-off Palestine.
Speaks He not thus to-day to thee?
O listen, heart of mine!

"YE HAVE DONE IT UNTO ME."

BY MINNIE B. FENWICK.

It was an August afternoon. The hot winds were sweeping over the Kansas prairies. Not a green thing was to be seen. The earth was parched and dried up and the heavens were brass. Everything seemed to be crying, Water! Water!

Rachel Dawson stood in the door of the rude cabin on the claim, and shading her eyes with her hand looked far out over the prairie.

"Why don't father and mother come?" she said, "there—I guess that's them now."

No, it was only an emigrant-wagon, but it was following the trail that would bring it right by her door.

Two half-starved horses, drawing a dilapidated wagon —a drunken driver, a sick woman and four children, were what Rachel saw when they drew near.

"Any water?" asked the driver, "whisky ain't as coolin' as some other things on a day like this."

For an instant Rachel hesitated. A bucket of water stood on the bench behind the door, but it was the very last they would be able to draw from their well, and when that was gone where was more to come from?

A thin, white hand lifted the cover, and a pale face looked out.

"God will bless you, my child, if you will only give us a little water."

Rachel hesitated no longer. She quickly took the dipper from the nail on which it hung and carried the bucket to the wagon. The half-famished creatures soon emptied it, and the dog came and licked it dry. "Remember, child," said the pale woman as they drove away, "who it was that said, 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto Me.'"

Rachel stood and watched them out of sight, and when she turned and entered her humble home she felt very happy in spite of the fact that she knew not where the next drop of water was to come from. All the afternoon a still small voice kept saying, "Ye have done it unto Me, Ye have done it unto Me."

It was dark before her father and mother returned. They had gone several miles beyond the village to a well where they heard water was to be had, and brought back two barrels full. The little family on the claim suffered many privations during that year of drought, but the needy were never turned from their door.

The years passed by, and the desert began to "blossom as the rose." Fertile fields, thriving villages, and populous cities were to be seen upon all sides. It was then that the brave-hearted people began "a peaceful war for God and Home and Native Land."

Rachel was no longer a bare-footed girl, but had developed into a comely matron, and was one of the most valiant soldiers in the great struggle. She had been the means of securing a well-known speaker to deliver a lecture in her town.

"I love Kansas," said the speaker, as he looked over the large audience. "I shall always love it, for it was on the plains of Kansas that I took my first temperance pledge. When I was quite a small boy my father settled in the western part of the state, but during the summer of the great drought we were literally starved out. Packing our few effects into the wagon we started back East. For days we traveled over the parched desert, through scorching winds and drifting sand, with scarcely water enough to moisten our burning lips.

"Finally we came to a house. It was only a poor little shanty standing alone out on the wide prairie, but it was the home of the angel of our deliverance. A sweet girl brought out a bucket of water, and gave us all we could drink. I have been afraid since that it was all she had, and how often I have wished she could know just how much good her 'cup of cold water' did in our family. We held a praise meeting right there in the old wagon. My father threw away his whisky bottle.

"'That is my thank-offering,'" he said.

"'Mine,' said my mother, 'shall be my boy.'

"I promised her then for the remainder of my life to be a soldier in the cold water army."

Rachel bowed her head to hide the tears that were coursing down her cheeks, and she heard the still, small voice say, "Ye have done it unto Me! Ye have done it unto Me!"

BALLOT REFORM.

BY B. V. CUSHMAN, M. D.

The demand for more perfect safeguards around the ballot-box is not a partisan clamor. It is an accepted fact that fraud, bribery and intimidation figure more or less openly in every political contest. When it becomes apparent that the corruption, in special cases, is understood, and about to be opened up to the public by the press, parties run over one another in their efforts to be first in the discovery, disclosure, and condemnation of fraud at the polls. Honest men of widely divergent political views unite in the call for ballot reform, and very few bad men are bold enough to persistently and openly oppose it. Governor Hill, of New York, is a notable exception, having twice vetoed the reform measures adopted by the General Assembly of that state. He yielded, however, on its third presentation, reluctantly signing it. This bill was supported by an imposing petition containing the autographs of 70,000 citizens, contained in a book eight feet square, and weighing half a ton.

The subject of election laws has received unprecedented attention in Congress during the present session. Charges of violence in the South, and counter charges of forgery in the North, have forced the issue. Radical measures have been proposed. The chairman of the committee on the election of President and Vice-President urged Congress to take national elections quite out of the hands of state officers, and place them wholly under Federal control. This extreme proposition ought to rouse the states to some action, which will take away the excuse for such interference with the franchise, that has always been held to be a sacred domestic affair of the state.

The Australian method of balloting, born of the necessities of a mixed and turbulent population, furnishes the model upon which the representative governments of the world are reforming their election laws. There are many modifications, but all insure secrecy to the voter, limit the number of ballots issued according to the number of voters, and require the municipality or commonwealth to provide such ballots and keep them in the hands of officials appointed to hold them, until delivered to the voter. An idea of the practical working of the system may be gained by visiting a polling place in Boston, under the law which was approved in May, 1888, and became operative November 1, 1889. Whether premeditated or not, the prohibitory amendment election was the last act in the drama of bribery and fraud. It was an appropriate climax. But we are at the polls. It is more lonesome than it used to be. The notable absence of the ticket peddler, whose name was legion, leaves the wavering man to grope in the darkness of his own mind, and decide for himself, who he "wants to vote for." The ward politician and his "crowd" do not appear. The men who "worked quietly all day," in the old regime, get through in a few minutes under the new, and move sadly on to make room for the next. There is a deserted look about the door, and the feminine passer-by is not compelled to cross over to the opposite side of the street as of yore. We pass into the room fitted up according to the requirements of the new system. A railing in the form of the letter L protects the election apparatus along the side and end. Six feet inside this rail is the voting shelf or counter, divided by screens into ten compartments, each provided with the necessary materials for preparing a ballot. Two poll clerks are on guard here. The judges' tables containing the ballot boxes are at the end of the room, also behind the railing.

A would-be voter approaches the rail and gives his name to the polling clerk, who announces it in a loud voice. If such name be found upon the check list—made from the report of the registration clerk—the officer in charge repeats the name, the voter enters the booth, his name is checked from the list, and he receives a ballot from the poll clerk, upon which is written the names of all the candidates, with blank space opposite each name, for the cross which indicates his preference. He retires to one of the compartments, where full instructions are posted, remains not longer than five minutes, as the law limits, fills out the ticket, goes to the judges' table, drops it in the box and passes out at the exit gate at the side of the table. If any one declares he was a voter prior to May 1st, 1857, when the educational limit was placed upon suffrage in Massachusetts, and cannot read, or that because of blindness, paralysis, or any other physical defect he is unable to mark his ballot, he will be assisted by one or more of the election officers. If he allows his ballot to be seen under any other conditions, or if he makes a false statement of inability to mark his ballot he is liable to fine, within the limits of five and one hundred dollars. The police officer in charge of the booth is required to see that any one so charged is duly brought before the proper court. Narrow is the way of the Hub politician, under the new order of things. How he will find means of broadening it remains to be seen.

The New York bill allows a disabled voter to take a friend with him to assist. This opens a loop-hole for the political trickster, whose genius turns small opportunities to great account. While we have been watching the male voter pursue his privileged way, two fledglings have entered. They approach the high altar of citizenship, their names are announced, they are admitted to the sacred circle, and receive the ballot specially prepared for women's use. They represent the balance of power which preserved the freedom of the schools in the famous municipal contest upon the educational issue. Boston praised the bravery of her women, and protested her gratitude. Some of the sanguine believed she would prove her sincerity by inviting them to all the privileges of franchise; but Boston has other interests. Of course women understand schools, but what do they know about saloons?

The details of the system vary greatly in different states and countries. In South Australia, Great Britain and Belgium, for instance, and in Louisville, Ky., the public are excluded from the entire polling room. The voter enters a closet and shuts the door, and brings forth his ballot in an envelope. This admits of the substitution of an unofficial for an official ticket, and is not on the whole as good as the arrangement which leaves the person in sight of the polling officers, and the public outside the rail. The New York and Missouri forbid "electioneering" within one hundred feet of any polling room. The Missouri law which prevails in all towns of the state having five thousand or more inhabitants is one of the most specific and stringent yet adopted. Any tampering with certificates of nomination, or with the official indorsement of a ballot is deemed a felony. Any elector desiring assistance in the preparation of his ballot is required to declare his illiteracy or physical disability under oath. The judges are selected from the parties which polled the largest and the next largest vote at the preceding election. This might allow great unfairness to independent candidates, representing a moral issue, which the two leading parties might agree to defeat. Parties are not to be born in Missouri without labor hereafter. No political convention, or primary election will have power to make nominations for public offices, unless at the last general election before such convention the party represented polled at least three per cent of the entire vote cast in the state. The certificate of nomination of a candidate, not selected by an accredited convention, must be signed by electors resident in the district or precinct for which the candidate is presented, equal to one per cent of the entire vote cast at the last preceding general election of the state, in the political division represented, provided that the number does not fall below fifty nor exceed one thousand.

The point which all have in common is the compulsory secrecy of the ballot. An individual who will sell his suffrage cannot be trusted to deliver the same in the dark. No one knows this better than the purchaser. Wherever tried it has operated more effectively against bribery than all the direct laws against it ever enacted. It has had but brief trial in the United States, but it promises to do here what it did for the country in which it originated, where the testimony is that "the very notion of exercising coercion or improper influence has absolutely died out of the country." Scarcely less to be desired is the deliverance from the ticket peddler, and the "machine" he represents. This is effected by relieving the parties of the expense of printing and distributing their tickets. Under the new rule no ballots will be counted except those issued by the state or municipality, and stamped by the proper officials. The movement is swinging forward rapidly, especially in western states. It is one of the three matters upon which the Governor of Nebraska has lately called for a special session of the legislature to take action. Illinois has called a special session to make necessary provisions for the World's Fair, and strong pressure was brought to bear, to include ballot reform among the subjects to be considered by the extra session. It should have the active support of all temperance people, as it is unquestionably one of the most effective agencies in clearing the track for the prohibition car.

OPIUM AND IMMORALITY AND OUR DUTY CONCERNING THEM.

BY W. E. ROBBINS.

(Concluded.)

From what has been said it will be seen that not only are these dens of iniquity licensed and regulated by English and Americans, but the property must be in their names also; and this no doubt will partly account for the opposition manifested against any interference with this state of affairs. A few years ago the Taotai, or Chinese prefect of Shanghai, seeing the demoralizing influence upon the people outside the settlement as well as inside, asked from the authorities to have the terms of the treaty carried out; but it was of no avail. Two years ago some noble Christian ladies took the matter in hand to protest, and the question in a moderate form was brought before the annual rate-payers' meeting, but it was promptly voted down. A stronger protest has just been made with a similar result, every American rate payer (whose names I forbear to give) voting against it, except four missionaries, two of whom, with two English ministers, were the movers and seconders of the resolutions. One resolution was to the effect that the municipal council should at once discontinue the toleration and regulation of immorality, and to treat the keeping of houses for such purposes as "an unlawful occupation, convicted and condemned by the Christian religion, by all Chinese codes of morality, and by the jurisprudence of Great Britain and America, and as a dishonorable violation of a covenant with Chinese Imperial authority." The second is,

"Resolved, That the Municipal Council be, and is hereby instructed to put an end to the [opium] traffic in the settlement, and to prohibit all opium shops and places for the sale of opium."

And this is what English and American people here boast of as the "model settlement," a veritable Utopia found at last, strongly resenting the appellation, "a sink of iniquity" given to it some years since by an English nobleman, who had been visiting it.

If the shameless patrons of these dens of infamy are not all Chinese, so the female inmates are not all Chinese. I have not been able to get the number of European and American women at Shanghai and at Yokohama, but in the neighboring colony of Hong Kong the registration is more perfect. In behalf of the agent of the Austro-Hungarian government, who is expected in India soon to look after girls of his own country who have been decoyed away under false pretenses, I called upon the Acting Registrar General there, and what was my surprise and sorrow to find that there were more American girls in the shameful business there than of all European countries together. I fear they had not the same excuse of being there under false pretenses, and I fear, too, it was not because they have not the opportunity of plying their awful trade in the home land, judging from what I have recently heard about San Francisco and other American cities. The attempt to license and regulate the vile business a few years ago in St. Louis and St. Paul shows how necessary it is for the Christian people of America to be on the alert.

These iniquities, too, sad to say, are perpetrated right here on these great thoroughfares into China and Japan, where so much of the consecrated treasure and Christian manhood and womanhood of America are being poured out on God's altar for the extension of the gospel to these millions of people in heathen darkness. We wonder how it is that no more results of all this expenditure are seen. We should rather wonder that any results at all are seen. Lieut. Wood might have had a reply to his letter on the spot, not far from his own door. The regret has been expressed here that so many of the children of Chinese Christians do not turn out well, but it does not seem difficult at all to account for when we consider the example set them by foreign Christians so-called, and the whole moral atmosphere of the place.

God forbid, however, that I should indorse the opinions and expressions of such croakers as Lieut. Wood, for I have seen and heard enough, in the few weeks I have been in the country, to repay amply all that has been expended on the evangelization of China. But oh, how much more there might have been but for these many untoward circumstances; and how much more there will be when they are removed and all the barriers swept away!

What, then, is our duty in the case? For it seems to me there is something more required than merely to pray, as has been proposed. Let us insist that our legislators see the terms of our treaties duly carried out by our countrymen, ample provision for which is made in the Act of Congress, of June 22, 1860. As the case in Shanghai is considerably mixed up with Great Britain, let the statesmen of the two countries put their heads together to solve the problem of the government of the place, which our consul admits is not satisfactory. We can also demand that the importation of opium into the United States be prohibited, and thus an end be put to those underground ante-chambers to the infernal regions in San Francisco, New York and elsewhere. We would then be but following the example of France in prohibiting its importation into Annam last year, and setting an example to England, which may yet get ahead of us in this, as she is in some other things. And may I not suggest that while we copy the vigilance of the ladies of St. Louis and the mayor of St. Paul, we also cultivate a simpler style of living, so that our young people may not be deterred from marriage on account of the expense of housekeeping, and thus excuse themselves for resorting to narcotics, stimulants and immorality.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE CONGRESS.

BY HESTER M. POOLE.

The National Temperance Congress gives emphasis to the fact that the tendency of the latter portion of the nineteenth century is toward unity and associated action. Here gathered men and women of every shade of opinion concerning methods, yet all agreed upon the one important point, viz.: that the liquor traffic must cease.

It was a notable occasion. Over the vast assembly brooded that earnestness of purpose which at times gave to those faces of strongly marked individuality which characterized most of the audience, a look of grimness worthy of the Puritans themselves. This was no light work for which they had come together; it was for the destruction of the most gigantic evil now cursing the face of civilization. As might be expected those interested in the work ranged above ordinary attendants at public meetings. High heads and faces full of purpose and force were the rule, yet there was a fair sprinkling of young men and women who gave token that vital questions are not ignored by those now coming upon the stage of life.

The presiding officer, Rev. Dr. C. F. Deems, proved an admirable president. From 9:30 a. m. of the sultry opening day till six p. m., with the exception of a brief intermission, the interest never flagged while the proceedings never lagged. In addition there were mass-meetings at eight o'clock on each evening. Among those present were those advocating high-license, local option and prohibition, but, from the first it was evident that believers in the latter method of dealing with liquor by far outranked all the others put together. This fact was evinced both by the arguments of the majority of speakers and by the loud and long continued applause which greeted them. Yet the Congress was not called in the interest of any party or policy. It was simply a tentative effort toward the adoption of union measures.

At the opening the Silver Lake Quartette sang a number of beautiful temperance songs and others delighted the audience at various times during every session. In his opening address the unanimously elected president declared that there might be a time to fight but it was not when the generals of the army are gathered in the tent for consultation, and most of the speakers seemed to bear this adjuration in mind. After the opening prayer by Dr. Parkhurst, of Boston, Gen. Neal Dow opened the discussion of the question, "Is state and national prohibition desirable and feasible?"

The impassioned eloquence of this veteran, prefaced by long applause, was never more forceful than when he told of the increased prosperity of Maine under prohibition, which has swept from the state every distillery and brewery, and brought in its wake affluence in place of misery. He declared that high-license men alone stood between prohibition and the grog-shop.

Robert Graham, secretary of the Church Temperance Society, took exception to the arguments of Mr. Dow, and declared that what may be a success in certain localities is not feasible for the entire nation.

He was followed by Judge Moulton, of Washington, D.C., and then by the Hon. E. C. Pierce, of Providence, R. I., both of whom strongly advocated prohibition. Then came Mrs. Bittenbender, of the legislative committee of the W. C. T. U., who pleaded for a united effort to push the proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, which has been so long pending, to a final vote. She was followed by W. Jennings Demorest, of New York, urging united efforts against the saloon, by Dr. Wilkinson, of Tarrytown, and by Mr. Hammond, of Syracuse, all earnest Prohibitionists.

The topic, "Alcohol a Poison—Never to be Used for Beverage Purposes," was introduced in a paper from the pen of N. S. Davis, M. D., of Chicago, which, in the opinion of many beside your correspondent, deserves to be published in a tract and scattered broadcast. It was a dispassionate scientific statement of the nature of alcohol according to the latest experiments and analyses, in which the fallacy was exploded that liquor of any kind retards waste, and so promotes strength. Medical men, he says, have labored under a great mistake in this regard. Alcohol is an anæsthetic which lessens no pain or weakness, but merely lessens the consciousness of them. While not arresting waste, it arrests the power to throw off dead material. Dr. Wright, of New York, followed in the same vein.

Prof. T. S. Lambert, the well-known physiologist, said that leading physicians are beginning to see their errors in the use of alcohol in medicines, instancing the leaving off the use of stimulants in pneumonia.

The fifteen minutes allotted to each opening address with five minute talks following proved a success, and were continued in the afternoon. Discussion on "The Line on which all Enemies of the Saloon may Unitedly do Battle whether they be believers in Restrictive Measures or in Radical Prohibition," began by an able paper by I. K. Funk, D. D., who proposed mutual concessions, followed by W. R. Huntington, D. D., of Grace Church, N. Y. This speaker emphasized the power of personal influence and of public opinion in favor of temperance. He has the honor of being the first who strongly advocated the improvement of homes as a center of attraction, and of lessons in cooking in public schools. He believes that often abnormal love of strong drink is caused by abnormal hunger following poor food.

After these speakers came notable appeals for prohibition by A. B. Nettleton, of Minnesota, and A. J. Kynett, D. D., of Philadelphia. Rev. Henry B. Hudson, of New York, was followed by John Carroll, of Alabama, testifying to the efficacy of prohibition among both white and black in that state, by the Rev. Mr. Bright, editor of the Christian at Work, and by Mrs. Washington. The Rev. W. D. Fielder, of South Dakota, fairly carried the audience by storm in describing the efficacy of prohibition in the West, and elicited three startling rounds of applause. Then came a plea for moral suasion in a paper by Albert Griffin, of Kansas, upon "The Systematic Prosecution of the Total Abstinence Work essential to the Overthrow of the Liquor Power." It was followed by Mrs. Lucinda B. Chandler, of the Non-Partisan League,

"How may Churches aid most effectively in the Destruction of the Liquor Traffic," was most effectively dealt with by Rev. Dr. J. M. Buckley, of the Christian Advocate, and Rev. Joseph Cook, who believed that only temperance persons ought to be admitted to church fellowship. Then followed the persuasive voice of Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap, Edwin Higgins and Rev. C. H. Payne. The lengthy proceedings ended with a discussion upon "The Coffee House and other Substitutes for the Saloon," by several speakers.

In the evening "The Bearing on the Temperance Reform of the Unbroken Package Decision of the Supreme Court," brought out Hon. W. B. Hill, of Georgia, and Gen. O. O. Howard, who rejoiced that temperance had at last become a national question. The closing addresses were by Dr. A. A. Miner, on "High License as a Remedy," followed by Dr. Howard Crosby, who advocated strong restriction as a necessary monopoly. "Take hold with us in putting down the saloon, and we may go with you to prohibition," said he.

With unabated interest the audience assembled on the second and last day of the Temperance Congress. The first speaker, the Rev. H. K. Carroll of the Independent, represented the negative side of the assigned topic, "Should there be a Political Party whose dominant Idea is the Prohibition of the Liquor Traffic?" Dr. Carroll declared that prohibition is not, except in a very limited sense, within the scope of the powers confided to Congress in the Constitution of the United States. Congress, said he, has no power to legislate on prohibition within the boundaries of any state. It can tax, but it can not license, regulate, or prohibit the manufacture or the sale of intoxicants within the states. Now, he continued, while it is within the power of three-fourths of the states to add an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, vesting full power to enact and enforce Prohibition in the states as well as in the territories (over which of course it has full jurisdiction) it is inconceivable that the states will ever do so. First, because they would have to surrender a large part of their police power to the general government; second, because the exercise of this police power would be difficult if not impossible to the Federal Government; third, because it would necessitate two sets of magistrates and police in every town, village and city in the country; and fourth, because, there would arise conflicts between the state and the Federal police. Your correspondent gives this condensation of Dr. Carroll's arguments as the most forcible, in fact, the only real arguments brought forward against a constitutional amendment in favor of prohibition.

Ex-President John Bascom, of the Wisconsin University, on the contrary, favored a political Prohibition Party because no help can be expected from those already in existence. Among other declarations was this, "At the present moment the Republican Party is under the leadership of the most unscrupulous order and allows itself to accept and create issues with no deep, underlying convictions."

He was followed by E. C. Heath, of Texas, and Henry Clay Bascom, both thorough Prohibitionists who elicited much applause. Miss Julia Coleman, National superintendent of literature, also gave an effective address.

Upon the topic of "The Relation between Temperance Reform and Improved Dwellings," R. Fulton Cutting spoke concerning the attractions between the tenement house and the saloon. This gentleman who has done a noble work in building improved dwellings for the poor in New York, believes that to keep them away from saloons they should have decent, tidy places to live in. This was his message to the convention. Robert Rae, of Glasgow, Scotland, then made a brief speech about the condition of the temperance movement in the British Isles. This reformer, whose work is well known to all interested in the subject, is the one to whose influence so much is owing in regard to the spread of information on this topic in England and Scotland, the attitude of such men as Cardinal Manning having been favorably changed by his arguments. A. G. Lawson, of Boston, spoke in favor of improved dwellings for the poor, like those built by Octavia Hill, in London.

The first topic of the afternoon, "To what causes is to be attributed the failure of the Prohibition Amendments in the late contests in Massachusetts, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island?"—was discussed by H. H. Faxon, of Massachusetts. He said the failure was due to high license; corrupt use of money by the rum power; a venial press; apathetic politicians and the lack of means on the part of Prohibitionists. General Palmer, of Pennsylvania, and Henry B. Metcalf, of Rhode Island, practically covered the same ground and Colonel Hadley, of New York, who in years past, knew the power of strong drink, believed in warring against it to the death.

"Temperance Work Among the Young," opened with an admirable paper by Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, who pleaded for skillful, organized efforts to secure temperance men and women on school boards and superintendents and teachers in sympathy with our movement. She advocated focalizing public sentiment against alcohol and the saloon into the utmost law against them that public sentiment will bear.

Ex-President McCosh, of Princeton, followed, emphasizing the necessity of right impressions upon the young. "I say use all means to put it down, but the best of all means is to educate the young." Then came Rev. James H. Darlington, of Brooklyn, who spoke of the order of Knights of Temperance of the Church, which has 2,500 members pledged to total abstinence.

At the closing mass-meeting in the evening Mrs. Mary A. Hitchcock, of Nebraska, said she had been credibly informed that the liquor men of that section had a fund of $4,500,000 to draw upon to defeat prohibition. A collection thereupon taken up to defend it, netted about $1,000.

"The Appeal to Philip Sober," by Rev. Joseph Cook, was startlingly eloquent. He believed there was more money behind the liquor traffic than behind the slave power, and the musket may be needed to destroy it. Rich church members were interested in it, and the lips of many ministers were shut. As for license he repeated the epigram, "Low license asks for your son; high license for your daughter also."

"No Sectionalism in Temperance Work" was debated by Green Clay Smith, of Kentucky, and the eloquent colored preacher, John H. Hector. And so closed the Congress without a resolution on record. All speeches and addresses will be put in book form and sent, postage paid, to subscribers, for one dollar. Address J. A. Bogardus, secretary.

On looking over these notes I find that mention of a brief and excellent address by A. M. Powell, editor of The Philanthropist, is wanting, and perhaps one or two others. These will all be found in the forthcoming report.

During the Congress nine state presidents of the W. C. T. U. were present, and held several meetings. As usual in all good works the attendance of women at every session of the Congress was very large. Those who were in doubt concerning the preponderance of prohibition sentiment among temperance workers are in doubt no longer. The Congress has established the fact that four delegates out of five there present are firm in their belief that through prohibition alone can our country be saved from the greatest evil from which it suffers.

"THE VILLAGE OF GRAND PRE."

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Yesterday, Anna Gordon and I visited the scene of "Evangeline," Longfellow's immortal poem, embodying the tragedy that war-times introduced in 1749 into "Acadia, home of the happy."

Away back in Forest Home days, my sister Mary and I had read the pitiful story aloud with my mother, whose exquisite modulation had set the poet's delicious words to the music of the dearest voice on earth, and with the first money ever earned as a district school-teacher I had purchased the engraved picture of Faed's "Evangeline"—my earliest venture in finance as related to the fine arts. Indeed, it was woven in the fibers of my heart, this lovely poem of manhood's loyalty and woman's faith. Away on the Wisconsin prairies Evangeline had seemed like a being whose saintly sweetness had caused her transplantation from the flowers of her beloved old village into

"The infinite meadows of heaven,"

"Blossom the beautiful stars,
The forget-me-nots of the angels."

But going out from Halifax, along the pleasant valley of Annapolis, where we held temperance meetings in the college town of Windsor, we determined to extend our trip seventeen miles, and to materialize the dream of that sweet life so far as the poet's "vision and faculty divine" could, at this distance, be brought down to terra firma.

We crossed the terra-cotta colored Avon, the daily reservoir for the rushing Bay of Fundy tides; our slow train trundled past Hautsport with its ships upon the stocks. "They are built here, and floated out with the tide, but they never come back—because there is nothing to come for," explains Mrs. Thomas Smith, the stanch white ribboner who shares our pilgrimage. "They are like the human soul," my heart replies, "built upon earth; launched on eternity's pulsating sea, and 'never coming back' because all its real treasures will follow after, and all its costly cargoes are to be shipped on other shores."

Our slow train bears us on past pleasant orchards, billowy with blossoms, wide strips of lowland, winding roads and comfortable cottages. At last the brakeman calls "Grand Pree," and we step off, thinking how, in his very mispronunciation of the French words for "Great Meadow" the triumphant Anglo-Saxon race condenses history.

The station master, Mr. Borden, is a character. Some of the old Acadian gentleness seems stored up in his heart, for he gives himself wholly to our interests without fee or reward. The little lonely station he leaves alone, saying as we stack our bags and bundles, "They are quite safe, for nobody is here and nobody will come in two full hours." He brings out a book of blank forms for his official report and shows us the autograph of the great poet's brother, Samuel Longfellow, who with two ladies visited the spot a few years since.

"The author of Evangeline never saw the old place," said the kind depot master as we stood upon the platform and took in the sky, land and water scope, of which the Acadian village was a feature once. We saw the fair, soft heavens; that distant inlet from the sea, still known as the "Basin of Minas," and the beautiful promontory of Blomidon, four hundred feet high, stood, sentinel fashion, at the head of the valley—two thousand acres of dyked land, level and luxuriant, which the minute industry of the French farmers had saved, little by little, from the sea. Huge willow trees, stocky in bulk and waving their tender branches like an embodied psalm of praise, still stand as faithful friends of the home-loving peasants who brought them in little slips from their homes in Normandy. A few mounds in the earth, now well concealed by the thick greensward, mark the site of some sweet cottage burned when the Acadians were driven so suddenly away, and our guide told us that from father to son had descended the tradition giving validity to the site of the old church where for four days the Acadian farmers were shut up in the endeavor to make them take an oath of allegiance to England as against their own nation with which the English were then at war upon the continent. How holy is the sentiment of loyalty to "Native Land!" None of these single-minded men would yield and so their homes were burned before their eyes and the ships crowded with exiles, marching at the bayonet's point. Thus were separated Evangeline and Gabriel, whose sorrow and whose search make up most of the famous poem. There is prophetic insight in the poet who sends the gentler nature out over the desolate world seeking to find the (physically) stronger. Even thus in these days does she go, to bring man back from the Inferno of temptation!

It is little to the credit of our country that Colonel Winslow who commanded and conducted this breaking up of a happy and peaceful community was a Bostonian, the grandson of our famous Governor of the same name. New Englanders came at once and settled on the lands thus vacated, our guide himself being one of their descendants. Tourists in large numbers visit this beautiful valley of Annapolis, as it is called, and villages with names familiar to New England ears are all about. We walked a mile up the railroad track, tramping after "a square meal," which was set for us at "Springfield Farm," to which summer boarders are now received, and where the old-fashioned country fare tasted so strong of Forest Home memories that I have hardly had so keen an appetite since we left my girlhood's home. A bright young woman, daughter of the farmer, showed us her copy of Evangeline, given as a "prize for neatness" in the public school at Wolfville not far off. Her brother was a sea captain and would arrive next day after a year's absence, South Africa having been his destination. His pretty wife and child were at the old farm-house awaiting him, and he had sent word of his great impatience to arrive. So here was a Gabriel who found his loved ones!

Thinking of Evangeline, reading the poem yet again as we sped back to Windsor, these words of good Father Felician staid in our hearts:

"Patience; accomplish thy labor; accomplish thy work of affection; Sorrow and silence are strong, and patient endurance is Godlike."

Yours by Christ's grace, for "the patience of hope, and the labor of love." FRANCES E. WILLARD.

A PROPHECY OF GOOD.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—During a holiday season it was my good fortune to visit Richmond, that proud old Southern city which so abounds in relics and memories of the late "contest between the states." An incident which came to my attention while there may be of interest to the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL, as it was to me from the standpoint of true politics.

The vicinity abounds in battle-fields. Among these, that of Seven Pines lies seven miles east of the city. There is a railroad station at the place, and an effort is being made to induce picnic and pleasure parties to enjoy its shade and quiet. Of course Nature has been assiduously covering all traces of the battle for many years. The trace which she cannot soon remove is the National Cemetery, where thirteen hundred and fifty wearers of the blue sleep their last, long sleep. It is located where the hottest of the battle was fought, and is a model "home of the dead." The keeper, Mr. Barrett, after showing our party through the grounds, related some incidents of his stay, one of which was the following: During the last summer the inmates of the Confederate Home at Richmond visited the place to enjoy an afternoon of pleasure, and wished to have their pictures taken in the midst of the cemetery. Mr. Barrett consented on condition that they would sit in front of the flag. This was satisfactory, and the group was arranged. When all was ready they called for Mr. Barrett, saying they must have a Yankee in the group, and he was taken standing next to the flag he had followed on the field. The picture shows in front the gray-haired and crippled veterans of the "lost cause," wearing that benign expression which comes only to the tried and triumphant, the Yankee in the background, and behind and over all the glorious stars and stripes, symbol not of victory or defeat, but of union, power and dignity among the nations of the earth. It is kept at the cemetery office, and I count myself fortunate in having seen it, for it was to me a prophecy of the good time coming when misunderstandings shall be cleared up and enmities laid aside, when there shall be no North and no South in these re-united states.

A SHOUT IN THE CAMP FROM TENNESSEE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Eight years ago in an upper room of the court house in Nashville, Tenn., twelve men met and organized the Prohibition Party of that state. Does any one deny that it takes courage of the highest type to thus stand out in the front rank of reform? But the front rank of moral reform is unlike the front rank of other battles. Ordinarily the front ranks of contending armies are thinned out by sharp-shooters. But in this moral contest the hotter the fire from the enemy's guns the larger and stronger our ranks become, so that instead of a vacancy naturally looked for, lo! a living man and hero stands upon the very spot where the enemy thought to see a dead man. The other day five hundred strong, heroic men met, not in the court house, for it was too small, but in the state house on "Capitol Hill" and the sound of victory rang out over the city from the height. It is likely that not in the history of the nation has there been held such a convention for enthusiasm and consecration of purpose to the redemption of the state and the uplift of the down-trodden. But of whom was the convention composed? The very best of the sons of Tennessee. Every profession seemed represented there. The judge from the bench, the preacher from the pulpit, the farmer from his plow, the business man from his office—no other party can match it. But it is to the nominee I call attention, who was placed at the head of the host as the leader of the battle.

The Rev. Dr. D. C. Kelley has no peer on the platform in Tennessee. In debate, no enemy dare measure blade with him. But his manifest call of God to this work none will deny. In his address on the occasion of his nomination he said: "I yet hesitate. I should feel compelled, from a number of circumstances, to absolutely decline, but the most marvelous things I have ever known came to me just as I was entering the hall to-night. The gentleman standing before you said: 'When we went into the committee this afternoon, for the purpose of selecting a standard-bearer, we knelt upon our knees, and before Almighty God asked to be guided in this matter.' From my earliest childhood until now, I have said to my Father and my God, if there be ever any place where you need a man for duty, and the call is made clear to me, there I am willing to go, and whatever I may have of devotion, there, to Thee, and Thy cause, and for humanity, I go. I give all I am, and all I have. That prayer forbids me, at this moment, to say no." Certainly here is the element of conscience which is the element of courage and strength.

I was once speaking of possessing a Christian conscience in this matter, when at the close a prominent gentleman criticised my use of the phrase "Christian conscience." Some said he was a peculiar man and held skeptical notions. He said to me, "There is no such a thing as Christian conscience, but it should be spoken of as the conscience of Christ." Though it appears only another way of expressing the same thing, yet the remark set me thinking. I said there is something in the remark. If Paul says, "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me," I wonder if by the same principle and law it is not correct to say, "I have a conscience in this matter, yet not I, but Christ's conscience in me constraineth me thus and so," and thus we get at the infallible truth of the whole matter. In other words, whose conscience are we to reflect in our stand for reform? Ours, frequently weakened and erroneous by ignorance and false education, or the conscience of Christ? If Christ is all and in all, then is he our mouthpiece and example in all things.

If Dr. Kelley voices the conviction of his church, and I believe in my deepest heart that he does, then let other denominations have a care to their laurels. "Let no man take thy crown" may here apply to a rivalry for splendid conquest and victory. Among his closing remarks are these burning words: "I am just back from the General Conference in St. Louis. They wrote a paper on temperance up there, and they said: 'We are a prohibition church.' When it was read a shout went up in the house (after the form of an old Methodist camp-meeting) and when a vote was taken there was not a voice to say no! Get out of the way with your small quibbles, get out of the way with your small machines, for party and not for patriotic purposes the Church of God has armed herself for the conflict, not as a political party, but in the name of God, and in the cause of humanity."

These words are certified truth in the faithful remark preceding: "Not only do we fight for the man who drinks, but if there could be a tenderer behest it comes within the home where the wife, with bowed head and flushed cheek and aching heart, kneels and prays God's blessing upon you, sir, and upon this convention, saying, 'Save my husband from the saloon and dram-shop.' Oh, sir, there are ten thousand women in the state of Tennessee, who to God are saying, 'God help the convention! God close the saloon!' Shall we retreat? Shall we fear? Shall we hesitate?" His closing remarks give full answer to these questions:

"Victory is close by. I feel her thrill in the breeze. I recognize her voice as she charms us on. We will meet any champion that the enemy may produce. With new faith, new strength, and new arms, with the promise of Almighty God and the prayers of Tennessee women, we will, under the arrangement of the Executive Committee, meet any champion on any platform in Tennessee. Our sling carries but a stone. We meet parties of giant strength; while they honored God and blessed the country, God gave them life and power. Now they in advocacy of license laws dishonor God and curse humanity. I come seeking no office for its own sake, in advocacy of any questions of ordinary political interest. I would not leave my chosen work for any office in the gift of our people. I have no ambition to gratify; every habit and taste shrink from the contest. Only duty could lead me to a work so little to my liking. As David said to Goliath, so we say to all parties who claim to oppose the saloon, yet advocate license high or low: 'Thou comest to me with a sword (that pierces to the souls of womanhood) and with spear (on which hang the quivering forms of little children) and with a shield (the old parties), but I come to thee in the name of the Lord of Hosts, the God of the armies of Israel, whom thou hast defied. This day will the Lord deliver thee into mine hand.'"

Thus closed a most thrilling and inspiring speech. The mountains, hills and valleys of Tennessee are to reverberate the eloquence, power and influence of this great man as he stands forth fully panoplied with truth, learning, influence and eloquence, all of which are placed on the altar consecrated to the overthrow of the rum power, and to the enthronement of righteousness in state and nation. Results tremendous for good will prove the wisdom of the choice of Tennessee Prohibitionists for their standard-bearer. I. VILLARS, D. D.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE HOSPITAL.

Temperance experts and specialists throughout the country take a deep interest in the systematic efforts being made to demonstrate that alcohol is not needful in medicine.

The following letters prove this, and are but specimens from a big bunch in the hands of the corresponding secretary of the hospital board:

This one from the standard-bearer of our late campaign speaks for itself:

SEA BRIGHT, N. J.

I am already so overwhelmed with enterprises that I am very reluctantly dropping out of some, but if you think my name would be of value to you in the board of managers, I shall not object, and all possible good I will do you. I am in most hearty sympathy with the movement, and think we should keep our flag flying from the highest peak on that one question, "that alcohol is not necessary as a medicine."

Faithfully your friend, CLINTON B. FISK.

LA FAYETTE, IND.

If I can be of service to you in becoming one of the managers of the Hospital, you may count me in. I will learn all of it I can, and win friends for it when possible.

Cordially yours, HELEN M. GOUGAR.

PARKERSBURG, W. VA.

Your communication in regard to the National Temperance Hospital has been received. I have made mention of it in our state paper and recommended its support.

Dr. Hattie B. Jones, assistant physician at the insane asylum located at Weston, is our superintendent of hygiene and heredity. She is an earnest worker and would be quite an acquisition to your honorary medical staff, I should think. Yours respectfully,

JANE A. JOHNSON,
President W. C. T. U. of West Va.

KANSAS CITY, MO.

I met Mrs. Hobbs en route to the South who told me something of the new status of the Temperance Hospital. I am glad to see how differently you have organized from the former arrangement. Of course, I will do all I can for the hospital. I think now that if a call is made donations will come in from unions. No call has been made to them for more than a year. CLARA C. HOFFMAN,
President Mo. W. C. T. U.

OLATHE, KAS.

While I am not prepared just now to give financial aid to the Hospital, I shall gladly do all in my power to create public sentiment in its favor, and after awhile, hope to be able to do something more substantial.

I am rejoiced to know that peace and harmony once more reign supreme in the institution,

Very truly yours, JOHN P. ST. JOHN.

Our Book Table.

THE DALZELLS OF DAISYDOWN, by E. Vinton Blake, is one of the brightest, breeziest books that has come to our table in a twelvemonth. The story is of conquest—how city-bred Molly conquered the prejudice of three grand country boys, convinced them she was no "dudess" by rowing, riding and doing all sorts of other country things as well as they could do them, and being her own sweet, true, womanly little self through all. In many things she reminds us of Miss Alcott's "Rose;" is higher praise needed? The story ends somewhat as does "Rose in Bloom." It is published by D. Lothrop, Boston.

From the National Temperance Publishing Depot, 33 Paternoster Row, E. C., comes BRITISH RESTRICTIVE AND LOCAL OPTION LEGISLATION, by Joseph Malins. This pamphlet, which sells for a penny, is packed full of very valuable information, giving in compact form, for ready reference, just the facts concerning temperance legislation in England, which the student of that subject wishes to know. Mr. Malins adds to the debt all temperance people owe him for his previous work, by giving these facts in such portable form.

THE ARENA, in a sketch of Henry W. Grady, by Dr. Lee, has this passage: "His next notable speech was in his own city. An awful curse, the liquor traffic, had been prohibited by law in Fulton county. Two years of peace and prosperity had come as the result. More coal was sold to warm the poor; more hats and bonnets were sold to gladden the wives and children of working-men; more furniture was sold to make comfortable the homes; more children were in school; more worshipers were in church; fewer inmates were in the poor-house; fewer criminals were in jail and lockup; fewer men were sent to the penitentiary. There was more hope and happiness in the hearts of children, more safety in the streets. Most of all that was real and good and useful was in Atlanta because of prohibition. But love of gain led those whose business had been the destruction of love, and the ruin of men, to call another election with the hope of again inaugurating the awful work. With all his might and enthusiasm he threw himself into the opposition. His friends were on both sides of the conflict, but he had a conception of a city redeemed and moving to wealth, without the blood-money of the weak. This conception he desired to see abide in the city of his love, a perpetual benediction. The conflict was raging, the parties were massed and strictly defined; meetings and processions were held, first by one and then by the other side. On a certain night it was announced that Mr. Grady would speak for prohibition; six thousand people assembled to hear him. Such a speech on prohibition, measured by the enthusiasm it awakened and the applause it called forth, has never been delivered on this earth before or since. He said just before he died that his work in this campaign he desired to be known as what he regarded as the best of his life." Here is one of those touches that make "the whole world kin": "He had a deeply religious nature, a strong faith in God. On a visit to his mother in Athens, he told her he wanted to be a boy again. She toasted cheese for him, tucked the cover around him at night, and breathed to heaven a prayer for him as she had for her little boy in the years departed. She went with him to the Sunday-school, and when the children sang, 'Shall we gather at the river?' he covered his face in both his hands and cried. When his mother came to see him in his last illness, the first words he said to her were, 'Mother, my feet are in the river.'"

The CHAUTAUQUAN in the article by Albert Shaw on "The Greeks of To-day," gives these interesting facts:

"The present king, George I., is a brother of the Princess of Wales, and a son of the King of Denmark. He was elected King of the Hellenes in 1863, when eighteen years old, and he married Olga, the daughter of the Russian grand-duke Constantine. They have a family of seven children, the eldest of whom, Prince Constantine the heir-apparent, was twenty-one years of age last summer, and was married at Athens to a German princess, in the presence of Emperor William and other royal guests. The eldest daughter, Alexandra, nineteen years old, was also married last summer at St. Petersburg to a Russian prince, with great éclât." Of the government he says: "Greece is a constitutional monarchy, similar in its government to Belgium. . . . . .

"The legislative power is vested in a parliament of a single chamber, called the Boulé which meets annually. The representatives are elected for four years, by universal manhood suffrage. The body numbers 150 men. The ministers, who are the heads of seven executive departments (Interior, Finance, Justice, War, Marine, Education, and Ecclesiastical and Foreign affairs) are responsible to the chamber, as in England and other European countries. The system of law in vogue is practically identical with the French code."

The WOMAN'S RECORD comes out this month in a new dress of "robin's egg green" or blue, which is it? with broadened pages and otherwise greatly improved. Besides the record of women's work at home and abroad it gives a great variety of interesting reading matter. Its whole make-up shows that when they undertake it, women can not only edit a paper but can carry on the business part successfully. Miss S. B. Beals is managing editor, Miss Rose G. Russell, office editor, and nine ladies of acknowledged literary ability act as contributing editors. Mrs. E. R. Gillman, 41 West Fourth street, St. Paul, is business manager. Terms, fifty cents a year.

THE KINDERGARTEN has for its frontispiece a farm scene; in its opening article, Miss Emily A. Kellogg gives an exhaustive sketch of "Public School Kindergartens" as they exist in St. Louis, Philadelphia, Milwaukee, Des Moines, La Porte; Fort Collins, Colorado; San Jose, Cal.; Rochester, New Rochelle and other towns in New York; Portland, Me.. Ann Arbor, Mich., and many other places. Anne E. Allen tells a delightful story of "Bluster, Bright and Sprinkle." "Julie's Birthday" puts the "occupations" to a charming practical use, and the whole number is as bright and helpful as can be. The "Kindergarten" has just entered on its third volume; henceforth it will take a vacation through July and August, and lower its price to $1.50 per year. Alice B. Stockham & Co., Publishers, 161 La Salle St., Chicago.

BABYHOOD, always on the lookout that children's rights are not infringed upon, calls attention to the proposed tax on milk-sugar, and the assertion made that it is used chiefly to make homeopathic pills, and asks: "Have you not overlooked another and more important use which clearly points to the propriety of making it free—namely, in the preparation of cow's milk for infants not nourished by their mothers? It is surely bad statesmanship to tax a substance of such importance in the feeding of infants while they die yearly by the tens of thousands simply from improper food. Humanity calls upon us to do all we can to save the infants, and let the industry take care of itself. With a national treasury so full of unneeded lucre as to be a constant temptation to unscrupulous politicians, BABYHOOD humbly suggests that the tax on this all-important commodity can be spared." A magazine so watchful over the interests of the baby should be in every household blessed with a baby. Babyhood Publishing Co., New York and London, $1.50 per annum.

TEMPERANCE TEMPLE ITEMS.

MATILDA B. CARSE.

Dear white-ribbon sister, brother, boy or girl: Have you a Temple mite-box on your table? If not, write to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, 145 Ashland Boulevard, Chicago, inclosing a two-cent stamp, and it will be promptly sent you on condition that you will drop into it a cent a day, or its equivalent, during the next twelve months. Mite-boxes in quantities will also be sent to unions for the cost of transportation.

Among the myriad helpers that are sending their gifts for the building of the Temple, none are doing more than the dear children. The Loyal Temperance Legions in many localities are fully alive to the importance of the undertaking, and are enthusiastically at work. Mrs. N. F. Coloer, superintendent of the Marengo, Ill., Loyal Temperance Legion sends $2.50. She says: "Pennies were given to those who thought they would like to increase them by their own labor. One little boy sold papers till he made his penny earn sixty-five others. Some girls sold wild flowers they had gathered. Some made candy and sold it. Others knit articles and disposed of them. Some earned money by washing dishes. By all these methods it was earned by the little hands for the Temple."

Mrs. A. Seeley-Spencer, New York, writes: "Six months ago I sent for fifteen mite-boxes, which I put in the hands of as many little girls of the Loyal Temperance Legion. I have called them in, and send the inclosed check, $7.12. The three who had the most in their boxes were Grace Seeley, $1.17; Susie Ryder, $1.05, and Nellie Wood, 90 cents." Miss Eliza Hume, superintendent Loyal Temperance Legion, Eau Claire, Wis., sends a check for $9. Four dollars of this is from a Baby Band, $4.50 from the Loyal Temperance Legion. She writes: "Our boys and girls have been very much interested in the building of the Temple, and have a Temple bank. The first Saturday in each month we call Temple Day, and all the pennies which the children have either saved or earned, they bring and put into the bank, telling us how they earned or saved them, the teachers doing the same."

Mrs. Caroline B. I. Wilcox, of Chicago, Ill., sends $10. She says, "This is the contribution of a little parlor Band of Hope I organized. Miss Hattie Smith is the President. We call ourselves 'Temple Builders.' The amount of our contribution hardly justifies our title, but our thought included the temple of the body, which we seek to encourage each other to build in temperance, purity and love." May such Temple builders increase!

The following Loyal Temperance Legions, which we have not before reported, are at work for the Temple, and have sent in the following amounts: The Tamah, Wis., Loyal Temperance Legion sends $10.71; the Bridgeport, Conn., Loyal Temperance Legion, $1; the Stockton, Kan., Loyal Temperance Legion, $5. The Loyal Temperance Legion of Palmyra, Neb., sends $5 for names on autograph list. The Loyal Temperance Legion of South Hadley Falls, Mass., send $3.55; the Loyal Temperance Legion of Galesville, Wis., $2; The Shiloh, N. J., Loyal Temperance Legion, $2. Rising, Neb., Loyal Temperance Legion, $1.30 for autographs. The Loyal Temperance Legion of Dixon, Ill., $3,30; Little Britain Loyal Temperance Legion, Fairmount, Pa., $2; Strasbury, Pa., Loyal Temperance Legion, $2; Salem, Pa., Loyal Temperance Legion, $1.30 for autographs. The Loyal Temperance Legion of Ashland, Ill., through their energetic superintendent, Miss Lottie A. Hagden, are busy at work filling three dozen mite-boxes; the returns from them are to be in Sept. 1st. She offers a book as a prize to the one that has the largest amount in their box. Mrs. M. E. Rugelby, superintendent of the Loyal Temperance Legion of Kalamazoo, Mich., has distributed two dozen mite-boxes among her children. She is, beside, getting up an autograph list. Mrs. R. H. Harriss, of Duluth, Minn., sends for 100 mite-boxes to be distributed among her Y. W. C. T. U. and Loyal Temperance Legion of Duluth.

We promised to tell the children something more this week about bright little Ethel Stout, the eight-year-old editor of The Midget. Ethel keeps bright by going to bed every night at seven o'clock. She sets most of the type herself for her cute little paper, as well as writes all her editorials. She keeps a Temple mite-box on her desk in the office, to catch all stray pennies in for the Temple. We had a letter from her two or three days ago; she said she had now one hundred subscribers for The Midget, and inclosed $1 of the proceeds for the Temple Fund. You know she gives one-tenth of all she receives for subscriptions to the Temple. By sending ten cents to Ethel Stout, Delaware, Ohio, you will receive The Midget for one year

The Galesburg, Ill., W. C. T. U. sends a check for $100. Jane Weeden, the indefatigable, helped them to gather it in. Mrs. L. H. Russell sends $1.70 for the Elk Creek, Neb., Baby Band; this is on a pledge of $100 for the Temple fund, from Johnson county, Neb. Mrs. Russell writes: "Nebraska can do but little until after November, but I think our state can be depended on to do her share towards building the Temple."

The W. C. T. U. of East Rockford, Ill., has sent in a pledge of $100 for the Temple. This union was only formed last March; they have but twenty-seven members. All honor to this new union that nobly says: "We will do our part towards the National building." Mrs. N. K. Fite, of Tahlequah, Indian Territory, has just sent in a pledge of $100 for the Indian Territory. She has been appointed superintendent of Temple work.

There are some noble souls that sow beside all waters. Such an one is Mrs. Mattie Patterson, of Danville, Ill. She has been spending the past winter with her husband at Eureka Springs, Ark. While there she helped the union (which is quite small in numbers and has great opposition to contend with) to raise a little money for the Temple. They have sent in a check for $5.45; part of it is for a Baby Band. The good work thus started will no doubt continue.

Our Children.

THE SWALLOW-TAILED HEN.

BY AMANDA T. JONES.

Two dear little girls went out to play,
And mamma said, as they skipped away,
"Don't go to the barn, now mind!
For we've shut up the chickens that came to-day,
From the nest old Swallow-tail hid in the hay
That nobody ever could find;
And the mother is clucking with all her might,
Clucking and strutting and ready to fight;
Why even the men
Are afraid of the hen!
Don't go to the barn, I say."

"No! no!" cried the good little girls; "Not we!"
So out they scampered the world to see;
Such a great big place for play!
The bird and the bee flew far and free,
And the children followed, so full of glee
They never noticed the way;
They leaped the logs near the buzzing mill,
Went over the fence and under the hill,
Waded the pond
To the barn beyond,
And the grand old "acorn-tree."

Oh, and the sun was warm that day!
The dear little girls were tired of play,
So down they sat in the shade.
"Just hear old Swallow-tail cluck!" said Fay;
"Come on! Let's go in the barn," said May,
"It's silly to be so 'fraid!"
So up she ran and took out the pin
From the staple that fastened the chickens in;
"Oh, oh!" cried she;
"Do come and see!
Come into the barn, I say!"

Right in went the bold little girlies then,
In spite of the fowl that fought the men—
That grave old, brave old bird.
They counted the little ones, "eight, nine, ten."
They kissed them over and over again,
But the hen said never a word.
Puzzled and bothered and filled with doubt,
She walked and stalked and circled about
All 'round the floor,
Till she reached the door,
Then off went the swallow-tailed hen.

"Good-bye! good riddance!" quoth May with a frown;
And she tucked the birdies all up in her gown,—
Wee roosters and comical pullets!
Such dear little, queer little balls of down,
Puffy and fluffy and yellow and brown,
With eyes as round as bullets!
Set a thousand like them up in a row
Not one could cackle, or cluck, or crow;
But out they'd pop,
And away they'd hop,
Just cunning from claw to crown!

"But Swallow-tail's gone, she's gone!" sighed Fay;
"She'll never come back, she's gone to stay,
The poor little chicks will die!"
'Oh, ho! what a goose to be frightened away
By two little, kind little girls!" laughed May,
"That never would hurt a fly.
We'll just run out and shoo her back in,
And shut up the door, and put in the pin,
So nobody'll know,
Then off we'll go
To the saw-mill yard and play."

Now where had Swallow-tail gone, oh, where!
They hunted here, and they hunted there,
But the fowl had hidden well;
"We can't go 'way, it wouldn't be fair,"
Said May, half crying; "I do declare
I never should dare to tell!"
"I wish, I wish," wept sorrowful Fay,
"We'd minded mamma, and kept away!
No use to talk!
Some terrible hawk
Has carried her up in the air!"

But that was a great mistake of hers,
For still as a mouse when Tabby stirs,
From the roof she peered below;
And a mother, as all the world avers,
Whether in satin, or feathers, or furs,
Is a match for every foe.
But the very minute they came in sight
She pounced on May, like a flash of light;
Like the teeth of saws
Were the sharp, sharp claws,
And they clung to the child like burs.

Oh, the hen had whetted her horny beak!
And she pecked and pecked the pretty red cheek
Till down the red blood rolled.
All the birds of the air heard little May shriek!
Looked down, and saw how a maiden meek,
Could fight like a soldier bold!
For Fay, with her little fat hands doubled tight,
Yet the hen stuck fast,
Till over at last
Fell May, all blinded and weak!

Away to her chickens, "eight, nine, ten,"
Went the terrible bird that scared the men,
And whipped disobedient girls;
And the children, safely at home again,
Owned all their naughtiness there and then,
While mamma smoothed the curls
And bathed the wounds all swollen and red;
But though not an angry word she said,
To see her so sad,
Hurt 'most as bad
As the beak of the Swallow-tailed hen!

A NEW KIND OF FUN.

BY JULIA H. THAYER.

There was a great racket out in the backyard; cries of distress, shouts of merriment and loud laughter. Mrs. Harley rushed to the window in time to see Joe rolling on the ground, kicking his heels in the air, and fairly roaring with delight, while Bennie, the picture of mortal terror, was running toward the house as if all the witches were after him.

"Why, my poor little mouse, what does this mean?" was mamma's astonished inquiry to the funny object that appeared on the threshold a moment later.

"It means, mamma," Bennie gasped, as he bent a dripping, yellow head forward, and stuck out his arms akimbo, means—that—I'm almost drowned," and a righteous stream of indignant tears joined the others that were running to the ground.

"Drowned! where could you drown, dear?" and mamma's alarm took flight in a hearty laugh.

"It isn't anything to laugh at. Joe did it!" while sobs and groans followed at the recollection of his wrongs.

"Tell Joe to come here."

"Now that sounds like business," thought Bennie, and wiping his eyes with alacrity, he started on his pleasant errand.

"Here he is, mamma," was the triumphant announcement as he shortly re-appeared in the doorway, holding his elder brother by the arm.

"My son, what have you been doing to your little brother?" but Joe only hung his head. "Tell me instantly; what have you been doing, I say?"

"Why—I was—only having a little fun, that was all." The voice was very meek indeed for Joe.

"Having a little fun? You may tell me what you call fun, if you please."

"Well, it wasn't anything, only the cow's water-pail was standing out in the yard, and Bennie came and stuck his head in to take a drink, and I only stepped up behind him and gave him a little dip, that was all," and Joe looked up into the stern face inquiringly.

"It wasn't all; he pushed me clear to the bottom of the pail," objected Bennie, indignantly.

"If I can't have a little fun I think it is a pretty thing," sulked Joe.

"It seems to me you have had a good deal of fun lately," said his mother gravely. "It is quite time for me to have mine now. Come into the kitchen."

Joe humbly obeyed, wondering what his mother could mean, and Bennie followed, determined to miss nothing.

"Fill that wash-dish full of water." Matters began to look a little serious. "Now I want to see how you enjoy the kind of fun you are continually having with others," and Mrs. Harley, as she spoke, plunged Joe's head once, twice, three times into the water, giving it so generous a "dip" each time that even Bennie could ask for no more.

"Now, Joe, how do you like the 'fun'?" asked his mother quietly, standing off a few steps and looking at him fixedly.

"I wouldn't have minded it," gasped Joe, "if you had ducked me only once, but it seems to me that three times running is a good deal."

"I intended it should be," replied his mother with decision. "I was settling up a little back pay that was due you. I have discovered that your fun is always at the expense of some one else. Do you remember the fun you had at your sister's lawn party last summer when you turned the hose on her new white dress and spoiled all her pleasure? Then when you were sent into the house, do you remember how you amused yourself by stretching a string across the hall and seeing how many persons would trip over it? You enjoy chasing your little brother with the poker, and occasionally giving him a 'dif,' as you call it; and in the winter, when you can think of nothing else to do, you find pleasure in snow-balling the hens down from their warm roosts and driving them out into the cold."

"O mamma, don't tell any more things. I can't bear to have you speak to me in that way. It doesn't seem one bit like you," and poor Joe hid his burning face in his hands and began to sob in good earnest.

"I do not believe you have realized how cruel these sports of yours are, at times, nor how this selfish habit is growing upon you," said his mother soothingly as she stroked his bowed head.

"I never will do so again, never," came back in smothered tones. "Oh, I never knew how mean I was before; indeed I didn't!"

Bennie, quite satisfied by this time with the justice meted out to the culprit, drew near, and thrusting his little hands into his pockets, concluded the scene by saying, with a lofty air, "Boy, I'll forgive you this time, but remember you might have drowned me!"

THE LONGEST DAY.

It is quite important, when speaking of the longest day in the year, to say what part of the world we are talking about, as will be seen by reading the following list, which tells the length of the longest day in several places. How unfortunate are the children in Tornea, Finland, where Christmas Day is less than three hours in length.

At Stockholm, Sweden, it is eighteen and one-half hours in length.

At Spitzbergen the longest day is three and one-half months.

At London, England, and Bremen, Prussia, the longest day has sixteen and one-half hours.

At Hamburg, in Germany, and Dantzig, in Prussia, the longest day has seventeen hours.

At Wardbury, Norway, the longest day lasts from May 21 to July 22, without interruption.

At St. Petersburg, Russia, and Tobolsk, Siberia, the longest day is nineteen hours, and the shortest five hours.

At Tornea, Finland, June 21 brings a day nearly twenty-two hours long, and Christmas one less than three hours in length.

In New York the longest day is about fifteen hours, and at Montreal, Canada, it is sixteen hours.—Exchange.

The Still Hour.

FOR THE WEEK BEGINNING JULY 6, 1890.

BY REV. C. C. HARRAH.

DAILY BIBLE READING NOTES.

(Luke 13; Philippians 2-4; Colossians 1-3.)

Sunday, 6; Luke 13. Verse 9, The one purpose of God in all His gracious dealings toward us is that we bear fruit. There is no mistake so great that man can make as to spend his life in this world as a cumberer of the ground. Verse 15, Hypocrites cover up their hatred for the good by a pretended zeal for God's law. The witnesses for God's truth have always had among their foes those who strike at them under the pretense of a superior devotion to religion. They are just the ones to work upon the prejudices of the ignorant, so as to make the work of God's reformers difficult. Verse 19, Whatever hindrances may be put in its way, the kingdom of God will continue to spread and fill the earth with its blessings.

Monday, 7; Phil. 2. Verse 5, The example of our Lord shows us that we must have self-denying love and humility. We cannot be disciples and go in a different way from that in which our Master walked. Verse 12, Salvation is man's work and it is also God's work (verse 13). The farmer works diligently in order to get a crop; but he is as dependent on God for the harvest as we all are upon Him for salvation. In all matters no one should ever lose the feeling of dependence on God. Verse 16, Every Christian has a mission, and should rid himself of the darkness of this world, and then live out, in his life, the light that dwells within him.

Tuesday, 8; Phil. 3. Verse 2, The severe language of the apostle shows how deeply he felt the injury done to the church by those who neglect the spirit and work of vital Christianity, and become disturbers among believers. Verse 13, As one comes near to Christ in an advanced Christian experience, he thinks less of himself: he sees more clearly his faults and short-comings; but there are blessed views of the Saviour, and intense aspirations of soul to come nearer to Him. If it was needful for one so good as Paul to thus reach forth to "things before," how much more should we do so!

Wednesday, 9; Phil. 4. Verse 3, Women were the first converts at Philippi (Acts 16: 13), and they were prominent workers in that church. Verse 4, One who studies the characteristics of a true Christian experience, as brought out in this epistle, will not fail to note the prominence given to joy in the Lord. The Christian's joy may not appear in violent outbursts, but it is ever present in the soul, leading it into gentleness, resignation and peace. Verse 8, Pagan morality is a poor thing compared with that of Christianity, which begins by purifying the heart and inclining the affections toward good things, and works out into a life in which there is every virtue and everything praiseworthy.

Thursday, 10; Col. 1. Verse 4, In this epistle Paul writes of the church's glories and fullness in Christ her Head. It would be well if every church had a reputation like this one at Colosse, for faith in Christ and love to all the saints. Verse 6, Where the gospel is rightly received it never fails to bear fruit, and it is always good fruit. Verse 12, If we are not saints on earth, we have not the meetness for heaven that is necessary in order that we may be saints there.

Friday, 11; Col. 2. Verse 2, The kind of prosperity that is lasting, and which we all should most earnestly seek, is a prosperity of the soul. Great knowledge, strong faith, and a sympathetic love which knits us together with all who love Christ, make the soul rich. Verse 4, Every one needs to be on his guard against false teachers. Verse 6, There are some things in which the heart judges better than the head, and, as a rule, it is safe for a Christian to hold on to the great truths of religion by which he was led to yield his heart to Christ.

Saturday, 12; Col. 3. Verse 1, The risen life in Christ climbs upward, while the unrenewed life of the world gravitates downward. Verse 3, We dwell in the flesh like all others, but we do not live in the flesh, since our lives are hid with Christ in God. Verse 5, Every sin has its concealed beginning in the heart, and it will have its public issue in the judgment of God, who regards the heart.

THE PRAYER MEETING TOPIC.

(The lonely and unnoticed workers. Heb. 6: 10–12.)

1. Too much credit for work done is given to the professional leaders and persons who get the notice of the public; and too little credit to the great body of workers who actually do the most service. We hear so little about the man that carried the musket and did the fighting, and so much about the "general." Praise is sometimes heaped upon a minister which ought to go to the faithful men and women in his church who do most of the labor, and who cheerfully bear every burden in order that the church work may be successful.

2. It is one of the things to which many of the very best Christian workers must make up their minds, that they will endure the solitude of unnoticed labor. Their names will not be printed in the papers or noticed in the public reports. They may feel at times that hardly any one knows them, or notices them. At the same time, what they are doing is God's service, and is exceedingly useful.

3. No lonely worker need ever feel that God overlooks him. He will never "forget your work and labor of love." God is with you in the work, and trouble not yourself about success and a name, but seek to be faithful. Rev. 22:12.

The Household.

THE AMERICAN SABBATH.

BY MRS. J. C. BATEHAM.

Like chimes of sweet music, like perfume most rare,
Like bread to the hungry, and hope to despair,
Is the Sabbath of God, the sign from above,
Of covenant mercy and unceasing love,
To the toil-worn and fainting it speaketh of rest,
To the sin-cursed of pardon, and Heaven at last.

Of our free institutions, the source and the base,
For man's elevation the hope of the race,
The American Sabbath! united we'll stand,
As Christians and patriots loving our land,
And in faith that our Father, the hearer of prayer,
Is making our country and Sabbaths His care,
With our voice and our vote, we will do all we can,
To save this rich blessing—the Sabbath, for man.

MRS. BARKER'S LACE CURTAINS.

BY LAURA J. RITTENHOUSE.

So the little contract in which she promised to take the curtains at the time specified, was signed, the affable gentleman's trunk was packed and he was gone, almost before Mrs. Barker realized what she had done.

She felt somewhat ill at ease afterward. What would dear old Wallace think of such extravagance, just after he had given her what he considered elegant curtains? It would hurt his feelings, too, to know she was not satisfied with the ones she had, so she would tell him nothing about it till the new ones came. By that time he would not feel it so much. So the little woman began carrying around her first secret from her husband.

She economized in every way she could after that, but it was hard work laying aside money. It seemed to her the children had never worn out so many shoes and stockings, and that there had never been so many extra demands on her pocketbook. She even tried cutting down the amount of milk and fruit used by the family, but the restless, feverish nights for the little ones that followed this attempt soon frightened her into giving up all efforts at economy in that direction.

Then she bought a membership in the Woman's Exchange, and baked delicious cakes that sold rapidly every day, but the extra work always left her so completely exhausted and used up when evening came, that she could not tell the children their accustomed story, nor sing with Wallace after tea as usual.

The little ones missed the hour that had always been the pleasantest of the day, and went off to bed with a vague feeling of unhappiness, while her husband silently wondered what had wrought the unhappy change in his wife, and became much alarmed lest she were suffering from some illness. Indeed, the whole family missed the sweet, cheerful, sunny spirit that had always before pervaded the household, and Mrs. Barker felt this not less keenly than they.

At first it was comforting to think of showing Mrs. Windom her real curtains when they came, but it was not long before even that lost its solacing power, and she hated the very name of lace curtains, wishing most fervently her friend had never mentioned her name to Mr. Burton.

Then visitors came—cousins, of whom she was very fond—who stayed several weeks, and she was ashamed to acknowledge, even to herself, how glad she was to have them go, because their stay increased her expenses. Indeed, it took more than half the money she had hoarded up, and as the weeks flew rapidly by, she became almost desperate.

She eagerly accepted an order for some fine drawn-work, in addition to the burden of cake-making, and every moment of her evenings after that was spent upon it. She worked with feverish haste, scarcely pausing to look up or to speak, lest she should make some mistake, so she became less and less a companion for the home brood. Her husband remonstrated, but without avail, so at last, as he was of a social, genial nature, he began spending his evenings in the public library, or occasionally joined a friend down town in a game of billiards.

Mrs. Barker felt rather relieved at his absence, at first. It lessened the guilty feeling that oppressed her as she sat silently stitching away, instead of singing with him or reading as had always been the custom before.

The feeling of relief suddenly changed to one of great alarm, however, as she detected the smell of liquor on her husband's breath, one night after he came home. It horrified her beyond measure, for she was a strict temperance woman, though of late she had been too busy to attend the meetings of her society.

That her Wallace—her sober, industrious husband could be tempted to drink, was something she had scarcely thought possible, and that he had done so now, filled her with terrible self-accusations. She knew that her foolish pride had caused her to make herself and her home so unattractive that she had driven her husband away, and her remorse was intense, yet in spite of all her regret remained the fact that the contract had been signed, and the curtains must be paid for. She might even be sued and brought into court if she failed to have the money ready, and she felt as if she could never survive such disgrace as this.

All night long she lay with wide open eyes, too wretched even to find relief in tears. She prayed for help; mechanically, hopelessly at first, but finally with the feeling that God could and would show her some way out of her trouble. She was determined to give her evenings to her family at all hazards, yet the drawn work she was engaged upon lacked a good deal of completion, and of course she could not send it home unfinished.

Suddenly she remembered a young lady friend who was an expert hand, and she resolved to prevail upon her to finish it. Even after she had paid her for doing this, quite a little sum would remain for herself, as the work was very difficult and elaborate, and the price a large one.

This plan lifted quite a load from her heart, and she was so bright and cheerful at breakfast that her husband felt sure she could not have suspected the true state of affairs the night before.

Something impelled her to go to the temperance meeting that afternoon, though she felt she could not really spare the time. She had a vague feeling that somehow help would be sent her. All through the meeting she sat with the one all-absorbing prayer in her heart, that she might prevail upon her husband never to touch another drop of liquor.

After the meeting was over she walked down the street with one of the members, a grand, noble woman whose great wealth had not spoiled her nor lessened her sympathy for others.

"We have missed you so much at our meetings, Mrs. Barker," she said, kindly. "Why were you away so long? I am sure it must have been something serious to detain you."

As if compelled by some unseen force, Mrs. Barker told the real reason, the whole miserable story of the curtains.

"I don't know why I've told my wretched secret to you, I'm sure, but somehow I just couldn't help it," said Mrs. Barker tremulously.

"I know why, my dear. The Lord put it into your heart to tell me, because I am the very one to help you out of your trouble. I need those very curtains. I intended ordering three pairs for my library as soon as I reached home, and now I shall be saved the trouble. I'll be only too glad to take them off your hands, for I know your taste well enough to be sure I shall be pleased with them."

Can you imagine poor little Mrs. Barker's gratitude, and the weight that was lifted from her heart, sending a soft pink to her cheeks and the elasticity of girlhood to her feet? That evening found her bright and smiling, with a new, sweet story for the children that sent them to bed with happy little hearts.

"It seems as if our own sure enough mamma had been gone a long time and just come home again," said little Ralph, throwing his arms around her as she tucked him in bed.

"She's come back to stay always, now, my darling," she said as she stooped and kissed him tenderly, the tears bedewing her eyes.

Then there was a new duet to sing with her husband, and a good new book to read aloud afterward—luxuries bought with some of the money she had earned—and no thought of going down town entered her husband's brain. He drew her to his side and looked in her face with loving eyes.

"It makes me very happy to see you like your own sweet self, once more, dear Helen. It seems like a foretaste of heaven, almost, to pass such an evening as this has been. I don't half deserve such a wife, either, because I took a glass of wine last night with a friend. I've fairly hated myself all day for doing it, and finally this afternoon I hunted up a pledge-card and signed it, so with God's aid you need never fear that I shall yield again to such temptation."

"God has been very good to us, dear heart," she said, and then with loving penitence she made her own confession. And so the darkness lifted from their lives, and the brightness was not dimmed for her, even when she looked upon the imitation lace curtains, for they had suddenly grown beautiful again.

HOW DO YOU TREAT YOUR HIRED GIRL?

BY FRANCES E. WILLARD.

The Hon. Carroll D. Wright makes it known in his statistics that the United States contain a million hired girls; in view of this fact and of the hired girl's dependence for home happiness upon the Christian courtesy of the family in which she lives, we wish to ask the following questions of those who employ a hired girl: How many of you say good-morning and good-night to her? How many of you greet her cordially on her return from an absence? How many of you speak of her in a homelike, family way to a guest as she enters the room, saying, "This is our Eda, who does so much to make our home a pleasant place," or something of the sort?

How many take special pains to make the work lighter on Sunday, by simplifying the meals and arranging for her to go to those meetings of her church which are about the only variety she has.

Who can account for the fact that good Christian people will pass a hired girl just as if she was a block of wood or an automaton, not giving her even so much of a greeting as they would a household dog or cat.

Why should the hired girl be called the servant? to be sure, one who serves does that which is altogether honorable, but the term has fallen into a sort of synonym for servitude; would it not be better, therefore, to use the expression, our helper? A good, strong Saxon word that has uplift in it and no sense of degradation.

How many of them are asked to go to family prayers and with all their traits and inconsistencies are remembered in the prayer that is duly offered? How many are fitted out with Bibles, if they have none, and are taught to read our language, if of a foreign birth. This does not relate to Catholics, although in some cases that I wot of the Douay Bible is read in family at prayers, she taking her turn with the rest of the family. How many look carefully after the hired girl's room? to see that she has nice springs in her bed, a soft mattress, a rocking chair and every comfort that is found in the other rooms of the home? How many speak to her kindly about an extra good baking of bread or a nice dish in which she may feel a natural pride? We are all glad of recognition and yet we often forget that those in humbler situations of life are just as glad to be appreciated as we in ours. Noting that perhaps the one whose work lies at the base of the health and the wholesomeness of the home is more acceptable than many a woman, who is the mistress of the home.

It has touched my heart to hear now and then in the grace before meals some such expression as this, "God bles the hands that prepared for us this food." Little deeds of kindness, how easily they are scattered and how strangely we forget them, but I like to remember that evil is wrought more for want of thought than want of heart, and so in these friendly lines, I had hoped to remind myself anew and any other who may read them, of a few among the many hundreds of Christian deeds by which we may brighten lives so wholly dependent for happiness on our good will.

THE HOME DEPARTMENT.

BY EVA C. GRIFFITH.

The greatest difficulty to be met with in the juvenile department of our work is the lack of interest in, and co-operation with, our efforts to teach the children, on the part of parents. One of the questions to be found in the question box at almost every W. C. T. U. convention is, "How can we interest the mothers in the Loyal Temperance Legion?" I have been in the habit of telling local superintendents that they simply must not look for nor expect very much help from the mothers in this work. Yet as I have continued to think of the matter, I have come to feel more and more that our work will never accomplish what it aims at, until some plan of coöperation between the home and our temperance teaching is found.

A possible solution to this difficulty is hinted at in the suggestions of Samuel W. Dike in his article on "Problems of the Family" in the January number of the Century. That part of the article referring to the "Use of the Home" as an educational and evangelizing agency, is especially suggestive. From it I get the idea for a home department in our work which I think might be carried out somewhat in the following manner:

A canvass of every family in the town and surrounding country should be made, and the mother, and any other members of the family who will, invited to join the home class of the union or Loyal Temperance Legion, as they may prefer, by signing the constitution, and pledging themselves to give twenty minutes a week to the reading of temperance literature either by themselves or with the family, the literature to be furnished by the local union. At first the ordinary monthly readings, now in use by our local unions, could be used for this purpose, but as the plan develops we shall need to have family readings published on purpose for this work. They should be arranged in dialogue form, like our monthly readings, with a part for father, mother, son, daughter, grandmother and baby.

Think of having family classes away in small places or obscure neighborhoods, where a W. C. T. U. or Loyal Temperance Legion would be impracticable, studying our plans together! Suppose we could get one-half of the families in any given town to reading dialogues on temperance subjects once a week! Think of the questions it would provoke, the discussions it would start, the sympathy it would engender between parents and children on the subject. Think of capturing the family as a whole to help in this fight for the better protection of the home! Is not this the "missing link" in the chain of organizations which the W. C. T. U. has put in the field? We have organized the mothers, the daughters and the children, now let us organize the family for temperance work.

Many women, who from ill-health or distance, cannot attend the regular meetings of the W. C. T. U. could help organize a home-class and feel that they were really doing something to help. Grandma who is too old or baby who is too young, or proud Kate who lacks a new bonnet, to go to the temperance meeting, can each belong to the family class of the W. C. T. U. I plead for only twenty minutes a week at first, as the pledge, because I believe that more than that would look like hard work to many of the families we wish to reach and would not be adhered to.

The family readings should be published in leaflet form, very cheap, purchased by the unions and distributed to the families through a superintendent of the home department. The addition in membership would more than cover the expense to the unions of sending out the readings and many families could be induced to subscribe for them, themselves. Of course it would take time and effort to work out this plan, but I believe it would, in the end, be productive of great good; will not some enterprising union proceed to organize a home department at once?

THE MOTHER'S HAND.

There is no instrument so efficient in producing the highest polish on wood or glass as to be compared with the human hand. Lenses, after every other appliance has exhausted its utility, receive their finishing polish from the hand. In the family the mother's hand is the great polisher. It keeps little faces and hands clean; it keeps little dresses and knickerbockers clean; it closes holes over knees and toes; it fills hungry mouths with wholesome and palatable food; it tucks in the sleeping children at night and keeps out the cold; it soothes weary limbs to rest, and presses aching heads gently, till they forget to ache; it binds up cut and burned and bruised fingers; it holds the cooling draught to fevered lips; it gently closes the eyes that look upon the sun no more.

In a figure, the mother's hand polishes the minds and characters of her children. Her finger points out the letters on the blocks, in the primer, the page in history, the noble ideal to be attained, the far-off goal to be reached, the rocks to be shunned, the maelstroms to be avoided.

Said an old lady, "My mother influences me more now than ever as to my consciousness of her influence. As I go back and back over my life, all my remembrances of her in my childhood, girlhood, womanhood, and mature life, what she was comes out clearer and more clear, and I find myself growing into her likeness and image. I remember what she told me of her mother and her household ways, and as I go about my house attending to this thing and that thing, I say to myself, 'Thus did my mother; thus did my grandmother; thus must have done her mother,' and the couplet sings itself through my head. " 'We are traveling home to God,
In the way our mothers trod.' "

THE NATIONAL TEMPERANCE CONGRESS SEEN THROUGH MR. HALL'S EYES.

II.

The second day of the Congress is over, and it has adjourned sine die. All are saying to themselves, doubtless, as I have been saying, "Has it paid? Has it been a success?" Yes, to both questions. The city papers have given it slighting notices, generally; have been more than ready to sneer at the meetings as of a handful of impracticable cranks; some of the speakers have felt exactly the same way, and the cranks, on their part, have heard how fanatical and impracticable their plans are.

By far the most important discussion of the Congress occurred after the reading of Samuel Gomper's paper, "The Attitude of the Labor Men Toward the Liquor Traffic," which I will speak of more fully further on. In the morning exercises Dr Carroll, editor of the Independent read his paper opposing the idea that there should be a national political party with prohibition as dominant idea.

[As Mrs. Poole sums up Dr. Carroll's argument, we omit Mr. Hall's summary.—ED.]

Mrs. Fessenden made an eloquent plea for suffrage for women as the help needed to make a party with the right dominant idea, and was followed by the liveliest speech, in its ring, that the Congress had yet heard. It was from Mr. H. Clay Bascom, of Troy, N. Y. He controverted Dr. Carroll's views in a way that set the people fairly shouting. "If," he said, "Congress has no power to suppress this damnable traffic, then it ought to have the power to get out from copartnership with it!" Here a number of calls were made for any one to speak on the other side. Dr. Kynett, a beautiful faced old man, from Philadelphia, was urged to speak, and he started out by saying that he was a Republican, but if that party did not step livelier in action towards suppressing the liquor traffic, he would hunt some other party. "The American people," said he, "are weary of the attitude of suppression." Then turning toward the reporters he shouted, "It's a shame, a boiling shame, that the leading Republican papers in this city could find scarcely half a column to give to the deliberations of this body!" The grand old man was followed by a Mr. Hilliard, of Boston, who opposed our grounds, but made no definite point except a plea to work side by side whether we differed as to methods or not. A remarkable paper followed; it was given by a Mr. Cutting, of New York, who changed the title to read, "The Relation of Saloons to the Homes of the Poor." After quoting liberally from Dickens, he pictured the home-coming of a man who has been at work for twelve or fourteen hours: two rooms, both dark, and full of the smell of cooking; the children dirty and crying, the air hot and close. After the meal is over the man has two hours before bed-time. Is it any wonder he goes strolling towards the saloon? the light, airy and large room; the walls hung with attractive pictures, the chairs comfortable, and other men like himself to laugh and talk with? (He said nothing whatever about the women and children, and I wondered if he thought they should have special saloons provided for them.) He went on to say; "I hate the saloons and know the evil they do, but if I could crush them all out to-night in New York City, I would not do it! Not until something else was provided for the poor laboring man, whose only glimpse of heaven is this time and place where the alcohol deadens his sensibilities, and leads him to a present, however perilous, enjoyment." These startling ideas, as might be guessed, were not received with rapturous applause by the people who believe that the tenement-house miseries are the direct results of the saloon, and not vice versa, but Mr. Graham got up and pitched into us heavily because of the chilly silence, said Mr. Cutting had spent half a million dollars to ameliorate the condition of the poor of New York, and that we ought to be ashamed of ourselves!

Good Robert Rae, of London, England, followed, and told of the work there of the National Temperance League. I can give a few points only. Their work is chiefly educational first, among the churches, then among medical men—following up public and yearly meetings of that fraternity with temperance conferences. Students in Training Colleges are carefully influenced for temperance. Pupils in public schools are offered prizes for the best essays on effects of alcohol; (why isn't this a good idea for the W. C. T. U. to follow?) Teachers are met in conferences and urged to further effort, and prizes for essays are also offered them. Last year the leading one was $250, well worth working for. These essays are talked up in home circles—information is sought and so spread, and great good has resulted. Mr. Rae said we were far ahead of them in one respect. It is a common thing in England to find prominent church members, even class leaders, who have licenses to sell liquors, and that brewers and distillers there are high up, often in all church and missionary efforts.

"The Attitude of the Labor Men Toward the Liquor Traffic." On this topic Mr. Gompers, who is president of the American Federation of Labor, said, "They look upon efforts of Prohibitionists with indifference. They consider all legislation in this line to be on a par with others that protects the rich and makes the poor poorer; that if prohibition prevails it will only mean that the poor man will have to do without his beer and work for less money, while the rich man retains his champagne. Mr. G. claimed it would be an impossibility to make men total abstainers by law. That there were three classes who habitually drink.

1st. Those who had nothing to do—no work because they are too rich to work, and they are the champagne drinkers.

2d. Those who have had the spirit crushed out of them by fourteen hours' work, and let spirits into them, wrongly it is true, but with the mistaken idea that it was a needed stimulant.

3d. Those who have no work to do, get desperate, and drink to drown their care.

He considered that our trying climate, with its sudden and severe changes, was responsible for much of the drinking done. T. B. Wakeman followed with only bitter words for "you fanatics," and all churches and church members. He said much that was true and worth considering, however. That the one great error that must be overcome among the laboring people, is that alcohol in beer or whisky is a stimulant. That the laboring classes would have nothing to do with Prohibition people because they say, "You get these laws with a 'I am holier than thou' feeling, and want to deprive the labor men of the little comfort and happiness we have." "You are deceiving yourselves," said Mr. Wakeman; "this labor movement lies directly across your path, and as you work now, you will never in the least move the labor men to help you." Methods of propaganda must be changed, and he highly commended the plan of Dr. Funk, to do away with all licensing, and teach the common people the true nature of alcohol. His remarks, at one time, caused a storm of "no, not true," and the discussion that followed was, in my opinion, the very best part of the Congress.

This thought was emphasized by a number; the trouble between the church and labor men is that the church is trying to force the labor people to come to it, and not having it go to where the people are. I saw last Sabbath how true this was in Philadelphia. Two services I attended there, in rich, down-town churches; there was only a handful of people present. In one service the total was thirty-nine when the service commenced, in a church that would easily seat eight hundred. The other service I attended was at a people's church, down among the people, and I had to stand up; twenty-two hundred or more were present, and the services are always that well attended. So the plea of Mr. Wakeman that science be taken as the corner-stone and "humanity" as the propaganda cry is well worth heeding in our way, viz.: that Jesus came to show us the value of a man.

Then the thought was brought out that when the labor men of the country find out clearly that after all they are the ones who pay most of the tremendous billion dollar tax on liquors they will overthrow it. I dare not take any more of your space, and must pass by the papers of Mrs. Hunt, Dr. McCosh, and even the closing exercises. The address of Joseph Cook had in it such an admirable object teaching lesson that I advise all our friends to order a copy of the proceedings of the convention for it alone. The price is $1.00, and copies may be ordered of J. A. Bogardus, 157 Chambers street, New York City. Send your name first. The book is not to be published unless enough copies are ordered in advance to justify the expense.

I have been able to give but a very imperfect picture of the Congress, but it was unique; nothing of the kind has ever before been attempted. It was earnest and enthusiastic, respectful to opposition, ever ready to learn something, and it was magnificently engineered by Dr. Deems, who was pleasant, cordial, urbane, and as inflexible as steel! He was exactly the right man for the place. May he live to lead twenty more just such Congresses!

JOHN GRUBB RICHARDSON.

Another leader of the temperance host has fallen. How he carried out his temperance principles at Bessbrook, Ireland, where in connection with his linen factory, he established a town free from the temptations of the dramshop, is known the world around. To the religious and moral welfare of this growing community, made up of his employés and their families, he devoted much of his life, and such was his success that Bessbrook is a model town. No more sincere mourners stood around his bier than these village folk, whose lives he had elevated and enriched, and nowhere will he be more missed than in their homes.

Mr. Richardson was an Ulster man, born at Lisburn in 1813. As early as 1840, before temperance had gained many supporters, the vast evils resulting from the use of strong drink so impressed him that he determined to do all in his power to lessen them. How well he carried out this determination the records of nearly half a century show. Beside his work at Bessbrook he has done much for the cause of temperance throughout Ireland, and was, at the time of his death, president of the Irish Temperance League.

He was a strong man—a leader of men, and this was demonstrated in his business life as well as in philanthropy; indeed, the two were ever united; he was a philanthropist in business and a business man in philanthropy. He was one of the projectors of the Inman Line of steamers, and continued his connection with it until the Crimean war broke out. Then he withdrew from the business, on principle; he was a Friend, and as such could not conscientiously consent to the use of the ships for carrying ammunition.

He was the intimate friend of John Bright, and took part with him in the formation of the present national school system of Ireland. He was repeatedly urged to enter Parliament, but steadily refused. In 1884, Queen Victoria offered him a baronetcy in recognition of his public services, but like John Morley, he declined it from principle.

Of late years Mr. Richardson was much interested in the support of the Unionist policy, upon which he, as a firm Liberal, believed the highest interests of Ireland depended. He had supported Mr. Gladstone's agrarian legislation in spite of personal loss, for Mr. Richardson was a large land-owner, but he could not conscientiously follow that statesman in his Home Rule policy. His loss will be felt far beyond the sphere of his own family, and great sympathy is felt with his widow and children in their bereavement.

INDUSTRIAL EDUCATION AS A PREVENTIVE MEASURE.

While visiting a state's prison in which thirty women were incarcerated, we inquired how many of them had been taught to do any kind of work by which they could earn an honest living; just one of the thirty had been so trained. The experience of police matrons proves the same thing; of all women arrested, only a very small minority have ever received any industrial training. This fact caused the Woman's Christian Temperance Union to look for the connection between inefficiency and crime. They had not far to look. A simple illustration will show the connection; a girl grows up in a shiftless family, with no chance to learn how to do housework well, because her mother never does it as it ought to be done. The time comes when she must earn her own living; she starts out to do housework, as that is the only occupation in which demand always exceeds supply, and to our shame be it confessed, one in which unskilled labor finds easiest entrance. I hire her only to find that she does not know how to sweep a room, make a bed, cook a meal of victuals, or serve it when cooked. I try to teach her, but the shiftless, slovenly habits of a lifetime are hard to conquer; it takes more time than to do the work, and infinitely more patience; mine is soon exhausted, and I discharge her. She next enters your kitchen; you, having more grace or more patience than I have, keep her a little longer than I did, but even you cannot endure it long, and gladly pass the inefficient handmaid along to your neighbor. Soon her character is so thoroughly established for inefficiency that nobody will hire her; if she tries other occupations, the same lack of training stands in the way of her earning her bread in any honest way; she feels almost forced to seek it in dishonest ways, and this lands her, sooner or later, in the police station or the penitentiary.

As prevention is the great work of the W. C. T. U., industrial education as a preventive measure soon engaged its attention; kitchen-gardens, industrial schools for girls, cooking schools and the like, were the natural outgrowth of this awakened interest. They are all doing good work, but a great work lies outside their scope. To do it, homeless girls, and this includes all those whose abiding places do not deserve the name home, must be brought into a home where they will have Christian mothering, and thorough training in all housewifery arts, and other things by which they can earn an honest living. This is the work that many unions are anxious to do, and some are doing bravely and well. But it requires a large outlay of money, and is really work which ought to be done by the state: there is no reason why the state should provide industrial or reform schools for its boys, which most states do, that does not apply with equal force to providing the same for its girls; indeed, it applies with greater force, even if, as it sometimes seems, our legislators cared only for the salvation of the boys; for one girl allowed to go to ruin insures the ruin of at least a score of boys.

Various state unions have endeavored to secure state aid in providing these industrial homes for girls; some have succeeded, others are still hard at work in this direction; the story of how one state succeeded may prove helpful to those who have not yet done so. We, therefore, give the history of the movement in Kansas, as gleaned from a letter written to Miss Willard by Mrs. Rastall, president of the Kansas W. C. T. U. The thought was born in the heart of Miss Olive P. Bray, probably while acting as temporary matron of Ingleside. This is a home for virtuous girls, established through the efforts of Mrs. St. John while her husband was Governor; it was the result of seeing the perplexity and dangers to which some young girls, coming into Topeka on the same night train as herself, were exposed. Ingleside afforded temporary shelter, and suggested the thought of a permanent home which should afford, not shelter only, but industrial training as well. When Miss Bray mentioned her thought to Mrs. Rastall, this practical woman at once proceeded to embody it in action; a department of state work was established, styled Woman's Work for Woman, with the understanding that its especial mission was the establishment of this school. Mrs. St. John was made state superintendent.

This was in 1886, and during that summer petitions to the legislature were circulated and numerously signed. It is a sad commentary upon the bitterness of partisan hate, that in even this good work, Mrs. St. John, whom only a few months before the entire state delighted to honor, was greatly hindered by the storm that had attacked her husband. Another thing worked against the bill when it came before the legislature; the union was also asking for the municipal ballot for women, and that required no appropriation. Then the question was constantly asked, "Is there any need for such a school?" and no statistics were ready with which to answer it. The petitions for the Home received more signatures than did those for municipal suffrage, yet its bill was stricken off the calendar in the rush near the close of the session, and so lost.

It had become known that the state union was interested in friendless girls, and applications from them for care and shelter poured in upon Mrs. Rastall till it seemed as though the responsibility for their future thus thrust upon her, was crushing. She diligently studied the question, "How can this great work be done, without money, without power?" Early one morning there came to her the thought to ask young, booming cities to bid for the location of this school, as many were bidding for the location of other institutions; she accordingly wrote to the mayors of a number of such towns, laying the plan before them. As a result, many bids were made, the best being those from Cawker City, which offered forty acres of land and a building worth $8,000 or $10,000, and from Beloit, which offered $10,000 in cash and forty acres of ground. Mrs. Rastall notified the secretary of the State Board of Charities of these bids, asking him to accept one of them as a gift to the state from the W. C. T. U., assist in choosing location and determining plans for building. After much circumlocution, he flatly refused to accept the gift lest he should be charged with bribery. As the success of this plan depended entirely upon the state's acceptance of the bid, and locating the school accordingly, it had to be given up.

Next came a suggestion from Mrs. C. H. St. John that Beloit might be willing to give a small amount of temporary aid in starting the school, if located there with the promise of the union's influence. The city authorities, on being appealed to by Mrs. Rastall, promised to give $1,000 for rent, fuel and salaries, provided the W. C. T. U. did its part. As this is what the union is always ready to do, there was no trouble on that score; soon a contract was signed by which the ladies agreed to open the school in Beloit, February 1, 1888, and maintain it for one year, while the city fathers promised $1,000, or $1,100, if necessary, toward its expenses. That was in January; by February 1 the ladies were on hand with money enough to furnish the house the city had rented, and a matron, Miss Marshall, and her assistant, Miss Wheeler. The Beloit W. C. T. U. furnished the kitchen complete.

The girls came so fast that soon a larger house had to be taken. It was now decided to restrict the Home to preventive reform work, and the class to be admitted was limited to unmanageable girls between the ages of ten and fifteen years. At the close of the year there were thirty-one girls in charge of the matron and two assistants. These were maintained by voluntary contributions of money and goods sent in by the W. C. T. Unions, the Equal Suffrage societies and the Girls' societies of Kansas.

As soon as the school was opened, plans for securing favorable legislation were laid; the methods employed to raise money for its maintenance were often such as to develop sentiment in its favor. Here are some of them: As soon as election of legislators was over, every member was asked to state his position on the Industrial School for Girls. By their letters written in answer to this request and by personal interviews, weak points were discovered and guarded against. Every Probate Judge was asked if in his judgment, such a school was necessary?

By establishing the school the ladies had demonstrated its necessity, and furnished an answer to the question asked by the preceding legislature, for here they had an institution running over full, and twenty applicants for whom there was no room. Petitions were circulated for the establishment of such a State Industrial School at Beloit; the bill was carefully drawn and introduced in both Houses on the first bill-day of the session. Mrs. Thurston for the W. C. T. U. was on hand to watch legislation, and ex-Senator Young represented the interests of Beloit in the matter. For fifty days they worked, watched, and waited; then were rewarded by the passage of a bill appropriating $25,000 for a building, and $6,000 annually for the maintenance of the school. Mesdames Rastall and Thurston met the State Board of Charities and transferred the school to their keeping. We should be very glad to hear from our Kansas friends what connection, if any, the W. C. T. U. now has with the school, and something of the way in which it is now conducted. We shall also be thankful for the experience of other states, notably Mississippi, along the line of industrial education for girls.

WALTER THOMAS MILLS, in the Statesman, has a grand editorial answering the charge that Miss Willard is a Socialist. He introduces it by saying that readers of the Statesman do not need to be told that the views of Miss Willard are frequently disputed by that magazine, that it is not his purpose to discuss the wisdom or the folly of the administration of the National Union, but it is his purpose to inquire why our opponents are abandoning the question at issue, and attempting to lead others to do so by starting the hated cry of "Socialist." He continues: "A Socialist, and therefore a dangerous woman. Indeed! Has she abandoned the church and attacked religion? She told the world, in her last annual address, that the year had been one of unusual devotion, and her aim a better piety. Has she forsaken the family and reflected on the fireside? There is no other word so constantly on her lips as 'home,' and in all the years of her public life the ideal of service has been a better 'home protection.' Has she counseled violence, or encouraged disorder? 'We wage a peaceful war,' is the spirit of her utterance everywhere and always. Is it not true, then, that she is a Socialist? That would depend entirely on what is meant by a Socialist. What is usually meant by a Socialist, and the meaning which it has been intended to fasten on her in this connection, is a person who favors such a reorganization of society as shall relieve passion and appetite from the constraint of law, and turn over to the idle and thriftless the fruits of the toil of their industrious and enterprising neighbors. That such a Socialism would be a hateful thing, and that Miss Willard is not such a Socialist need not be said. But if not, then all the sting in the denunciation, and all the force in the warning against her is gone. The Socialism she advocates emphasizes the rights and the duties of society, against the aggressions of monopoly and the weak surrender of the public. It would save the starving needle woman from her hunger, the unemployed from enforced idleness and unmantled poverty. It would make the oppression of any impossible, by putting the means of employment within the reach of all, and beyond the control of any."

The Watch-Tower.

"My brother, if thou canst bear with no instances of unreasonable behavior, withdraw thyself from the world; thou art no longer fit to live in it. Retreat to the mountain or the desert, or shut thyself up in a cell. For here in the midst of society offenses must come." Miss Willard says: "In writing these lines I can seem to hear my mother's voice who has repeated them to me scores of times since childhood, the quotation being among her favorites."

Mr. Frederick Eugene Partington, son of Mrs. Lura Partington, a prominent member of the W. C. T. U., one of its best speakers and workers, was married to Miss E. H. Bateman, of Portland, Me., June 12th. Mr. Partington is the "only child of his mother, and she a widow," but like so many of the "white-ribboners' " boys, he is a son to be proud of. He is a young man of rare endowments and great culture, and has for several years been at the head of the Latin school of Staten Island, N. Y. A pleasant feature of the wedding was a letter from the groom's friend, George William Curtis, of Harper's "Easy Chair," who wrote, "May all the roses of of June bloom that day and all other days for you and your bride." The bride and groom sailed for Europe on the Etruria, and will spend the summer in Norway and Sweden.

The beautiful poem, "Motherhood," read by Dr. Mary A. Allen, at the New York National Convention, in 1888, has received a setting worthy of the gem. It is issued as a booklet, dainty enough to be the fitting medium of the exquisite ideas of this poem—one of the sweetest in the English language. It is printed in clear, large type, on fine paper with cardboard covers of white and gold, tied with the white ribbon, most fitting gift to any who appreciate true motherhood. It can be secured by sending twenty-five cents to Miss Rose Allen, 533 South Erie street, Toledo, Ohio. Mrs. Allen had a severe fall which laid her aside for many weeks, sickness and family bereavement followed, and now she is called to Toledo to care for her aged father whose wife has lately died. She can be addressed there for the present.

The trustees of Wesleyan University, Bloomington, Ill., have won for themselves an unenviable notoriety. For years there has been in connection with that institution a Woman's Educational Association, through whose efforts $27,000 has been given for the endowment of the chair of Belles-lettres, with the understanding that it should always be filled by a lady. It has been thus filled, and most admirably filled, for fifteen years by Prof. Sue M. D. Fry, who has also been president of the Educational Association. Prof. Fry is a woman of unusual talent, of broad and thorough culture, and her work in the college has been of exceptional excellence. She is the senior professor there. So great is the impress she has made upon the college, and upon educational circles east and west, that it is safe to say that outside of local circles, Wesleyan University is known more through her reputation than through that of any other person connected with it. At its last commencement, the trustees, on the plea of economy, without a hint to Prof. Fry, or even consulting the president of the faculty, Dr. Wilder, voted to discontinue the chair of Belles-lettres, thus summarily dismissing Prof. Fry. Nor had they the grace or courage to notify her of their action, but left her to learn of it from street rumor. Great is the indignation felt by the faculty, the alumni, the towns-people, and educational people everywhere. Indignation meetings have been held, and the strongest possible protests made against the action of the trustees. These protests are based, not so much on Prof. Fry's personal popularity, great as that is, but are made because of the manifest injustice of thus ousting a professor from a chair created for her, thus leaving an institution whose students include both ladies and gentlemen, without a lady upon its faculty. It is also a very strange proceeding, at this time when English is coming so rapidly forward as the universal language, and greater attention than ever before is being given to its study in leading colleges, to have it dropped entirely from the college curriculum, as is done in this case.

A large amount was also put up, and sent in charge of the Commissioners to the great Exposition of Japan, to be opened in January, 1890. From both of these countries, the superintendent had received official invitations (with an offer to bear all expenses) to bring the exhibit to their Expositions. A box of literature was sent to Amsterdam, Holland, for the use of the temperance people there, and another large case was put up to leave with friends in Paris for distribution.

The fund raised by Mrs. Margaret Bright Lucas and paid to Mrs. Nichols amounted to £48 1s. 6d. For names of donors see B. W. T. A. Journal.

In acknowledging donations, that of Mr. Edwin Nichols should not be forgotten. Beside the more than Macedonian gift—giving not himself, but his wife for six months, his generous supply of funds to pay personal expenses and many expenses of the exhibit, made it possible for her to do the work. The decorations, which made the Chalet such a thing of beauty as to excite envy among foreign exhibitors, consisted of banners from France, England, Norway, Australia, New Zealand, the Hawaiian Islands, Japan, South America, Sweden, from the National W. C. T. U. and most of its departments in America, from the Peace Societies of England and France; also large photographs, framed, of Mrs. Lucas and Miss Willard. A beautiful banner and flag were sent from Siam, but failed to reach their destination; they may have been kept by the Siam commissioners as a part of their National exhibit. This occurred in several instances, commissioners so admired the beauty of the banners, and knew so little of the W. C. T. U. that instead of being turned over to Mrs. Nichols, they were retained to beautify the National exhibit.

News from the Field.

OREGON.

W. C. T. U. STATE CONVENTION.

In the Taylor St. Church, Portland, about sixty of our white ribboners convened, Tuesday, May 20. Our first convention, seven years ago, was held in this very church, and our memories often turned back to that time when our beloved National president organized our state union. Death had called several home since that day; among them our leader then, Mrs. H. K. Hines; and distance separated some from our view; but as a band we had prospered. Our borders had been enlarged under the persevering efforts of our president, Mrs. Anna R. Riggs. She was trusty and true, and God had opened up the way by which she was able to give herself almost entirely to serving us. Peace and harmony, with a secure feeling of sisterhood prevailed in our ranks. Our consciences told us we had fought bravely for the Amendment whilst it was pending. But the fight against dollars is an uneven warfare!

We have succeeded in getting the teaching of scientific temperance into our schools, and the ministers of nearly all the churches stand by us. Many women have found in the W. C. T. U. an occupation that has developed character and re-molded their life. Our state union cares for the infants by her kindergartens, and has procured a law making a kindergarten annex to the public school possible in every town over five hundred inhabitants, and she cares for the erring ones by offering them shelter and training to a virtuous life in her Rescue Home, while the Baby Home, started by the W. C. T. U. across the river, takes in the poor little castaways, who from different causes are deprived of the mother arms to rear them.

"God hath wrought much for us, whereof we are glad." This sense of gratitude and a desire for further guidance induced our president to call us together one day in advance that we might together bend at God's footstool and seek His helpful presence. Mrs. Smith French, Mrs. F. Montgomery, Mrs. G. Cooper, Mrs. Gordon, together with Mrs. M. L. Driggs, presided over the allotted seasons of prayer and praise. In the evening the Rev. Dr. Houghton delivered a grand lecture on "Law and the Liquor Traffic."

On the second day Mrs. Henrietta Brown, the corresponding secretary, gave a report which showed us that we had forty-four live unions in the state, with a membership of a thousand; that sixteen new unions had been planted by the work of our president; that $800 had figured up on the treasurer's page, and $2,944.20 raised for local work. We had a membership of 331 Y's and 1,056 Loyal Temperance Legioners.

It seems that many unions have established already, or are working to establish, reading rooms. This is always under difficulties, for our best citizens rarely give more than a modicum of help, for the most part none. But our unions do well to exert themselves; so many young men leading a restaurant life in their midst need to have some provision otherwise than the saloons, where they may spend a vacant hour, and where the stranger on his hunt for work may rest awhile in peace and safety.

We missed our devoted Mrs. M. E. K. Edwards, the Friends' minister, from her place on the program. Revival meetings were being held in her own town, and she was kept there. The work among sailors which has always been a feature in our river-board and seafaring city, was represented by Mrs. John Williamson.

Mrs. Additon, superintendent of the department of the relation of temperance to labor, gave us her interesting report. The dangerous illness of our orator, Mrs. Narcissa White Kinney, whose life was hanging on a thread, clouded our meeting. We also lost the presence of her sister-in-law, Mrs. M. S. Kinney, our superintendent of scientific instruction, and that of Mrs. Dr. Owens Adair, who was attending her. Our president gave us her address at the public evening meeting. She followed broad lines of thought; spoke of the movements that gave birth to this new branch of woman's work, of the agencies that had trained her, and what she had already accomplished with her far-reaching arms, and what they were still feel feeling after in the future.

The third day we had reports from districts, as far as that division was still retained, and from counties, where the county organizations were operating. Those in which the ground had been freshly broken showed the most vitality The women seemed waiting for the W. C. T. U breath to enkindle them—give promise now of energetic activity. The presidents of Coos and Benton counties prayed for help from the outside to organize and to build up more fully. The great interest of the day sessions was in the report of the Refuge Home presented by Mrs. Dalgleish. Seventy unfortunates had been at different times during the year in the Home. Of these, seven had married respectably, and fourteen had been supplied with good homes for their services, and the usual remuneration. The Home had had but one year's existence, the state W. C. T. U. having formerly supported an industrial home for women. It was exchanged for this, a greater need in the midst of a large and wicked city, and nobly had its work been done. The appropriation from the last legislature was found to be sufficient to meet the necessary current expenditure; therefore any sums donated by local unions, or other friends, were being laid by for the purchase of a lot and building. The accommodation was not nearly adequate to the demand, so that it was greatly to be desired that these sums might speedily be augmented in order to do what was required for a suitable Refuge Home.

The matron, Mrs. Kersey, was brought to the platform, that the delegates might make acquaintance with the whole-hearted Christian woman whose life-work is to redeem these erring girls. In answer to questions, which showed a warm interest on the part of the convention, she gave much interesting information respecting the work; how the girls sometimes came of their own accord, and were sometimes brought by the police, or the officers of the Children's Aid Society; how she never questioned them, but that, after a day or two of kindly talk and prayer, their confidence was gained, and they told their own sad stories. Further, how ignorant and helpless they were as to the duties of everyday life; that sewing was mostly an unknown art; therefore, to teach them to clean, sweep, to wash dishes, to cook simple things, and to use needles and thread, provided plenty of occupation for the inmates of the Home. Mrs. Kersey said that she felt nothing but love in her heart for these girls; she could never feel inclined to blame them when she thought of the neglect and temptations of their lives; contrasting it with her own young days, shielded as she was by parents' love, and trained by Christian hearts and hands. These poor things were so young; sometimes as young as thirteen. The connection between this work and that of bona fide temperance work could be seen by noting the part that liquor played in bringing these poor children down to this lowest of human levels. The mothers of several were dead, the fathers drunkards. In one case the girl was forced into a saloon daily to fetch drink for her father. What wonder they fall so low? The expenditure for the year had been about $1,500.

The afternoon devotions were led by Miss Maggie Eaton. In reporting and discussing county work and needs, Miss Eaton had been induced, by the president, to come forward and tell something of her experience. Sherman county is the only one in the state that can make the proud boast of being without a saloon. This one victory was due to Miss Eaton's rousing up public sentiment to white heat after an appalling occurrence; a saloon-keeper's son, a boy of fifteen, lost his life by falling over a high bluff, having, with a few companions, consumed a whole bottle of whisky. Miss Eaton left no stone unturned to cause this sad incident to be known. She harnessed her own team and rode up and down over her own wild country-side, till no voter was ignorant of the fact. The consequence was, that the discomfited saloonist failed to get a renewal of his license. Our president added that but for Miss Eaton's untiring help her own efforts to organize unions in Sherman county, would have been unavailing.

Mrs. Fannie Montgomery, our practical exponent of prison and jail work, gave us a touching narration of her experience in visiting the prisoners. She had commenced holding regular gospel services on the Sunday, and when they found it was to be regular, they said it was "too bad for the lady to come and find such a muss!" So they set to work with brooms and gave a good cleaning up on Saturday. The improved appearance of the city jail was most marked when, the next day, she took her Bible in hand and knelt in prayer with the poor inmates. She told, too, of several conversions: sorrow for sin and determination to do better, with personal prayer to the great Helper, and, what is best of all, the changed after life, showing that the effect was real and lasting.

Our interesting kindergartner, an educated Swiss lady, speaking English, yet with that delicate foreign accent which gives so much piquancy to our mother tongue, gave several useful suggestions respecting her work.

A very practical and useful time was spent with Dr. Orpha Baldwin, National superintendent of health and heredity department. She showed the evil effects of the tea and coffee drinks, which it was but fair for our women to give up if they expected their sons to renounce the cherished pipe; the folly of the usual mode of dressing young infants, and some tiny garments made in a better way were circulated among the audience. Our literature superintendent told us, to the surprise of some, that we had done much successful work during the year, which was one of the encouragements of the hour.

Our hearts were stirred in the evening by one of Miss Henrietta Moore's masterly addresses. She spoke with great force for the equal standard of purity, and with as much delicacy as force.

A significant ceremony on our closing night was the presentation of a handsome banner to the banner county; and a telling feature that, said county being too far off to send its delegate, the banner was received by proxy, by the hand of our state president, who had put aside all feelings of personal comfort, to organize in this region so difficult to traverse.

Resolutions were passed indorsing the suggestions made by the president in her annual address relating to a complete missionary tour through the state the coming year, by the state evangelist and organizer together, the two working in conjunction on their several lines; declaring loyalty to the National and state W. C. T. U., and pledging earnest support to the National President; urging the education of public sentiment in regard to the law of purity as equally binding on men and women; pledging full support to THE UNION SIGNAL and Pacific Express; urging work on juvenile and Y. W. C. T. U. lines of work; making special effort to secure the appointment of police matrons in all county seats, especially in Portland; also that an effort be made, in the near future, to furnish a room in the Portland hospital for the benefit of patients desiring non-alcoholic treatment; urging the circulation of the World's Petition, and expressing hearty thanks for all courtesies received. There is not space to give even a full epitome of all the strong resolutions passed.

Mrs. Riggs will attend the National Convention at Atlanta.

GEORGIA.

EIGHTH ANNUAL CONVENTION AND VISIT TO THE STATE TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Even at this comparatively late date, we must say something of the recent state W. C. T. U. convention, if for no other purpose than to thank the Rome people for their generous hospitality to our delegates and visitors. The beautiful auditorium of the First Methodist Church was not considered too good for our occupancy for three days and evenings, May 6-8; the pastor, Rev. Wm. F. Quillian, by word and deed giving his heartiest sympathy and coöperation throughout the entire time. Mrs. J. L. Camp, the president of the Rome W. C. T. U., Mrs. John H. Reynolds, and many other ladies had so planned every detail that we felt we were indeed welcome and honored guests.

The addresses of welcome were delivered by the Hon. Seaborn Wright, in behalf of the city; by Rev. Dr. Gwaltney, in behalf of the clergy; and by Mrs. A. B. S. Mosely for the Rome W. C. T. U. Mrs. Mosely is a daughter of Mrs. Mary Shropshire, a Rome pioneer temperance worker, and her address was a model of brevity and appropriateness. Responses were made by Mrs. Dr. Gauze, of South Carolina, and Mrs. Dr. Felton, of Georgia.

At the other evening meetings papers were read by Mrs. Virginia D. Young, of South Carolina, and by the writer; and on each evening addresses were made by Mrs. S. F. Chapin, who, as every lady knows, never fails to delight her audiences. Brief addresses of congratulation were also made by Rev. Mr. Quillian, and by Mr. John T. Graves, of The Rome Tribune.

Among the notable things of the convention were Mrs. Dr. Felton's admirable paper, on "Woman's Relation to Temperance Work;" and Mrs. M. A. McLendon's masterly sketch of "Atlanta Before and After High License." Special mention is due the graphic and racy report of the National Convention at Chicago, as given by our delegate-at-large, Mrs. Nannie A. Robb.

It was the prevailing sentiment that the business of the convention was more than usually well managed and interesting. The department reports given were juvenile work, Mrs. Webb; unfermented wine, Mrs. Witter; scientific instruction, Mrs. Scomp; health and heredity, Mrs. Dr. Blanchard; Sunday observance, Mrs. Margaret Chandler; social purity, Mrs. Calloway; soldiers and sailors, Mrs. Rowe; work among railroad employes, Mrs. E. T. Miller; and flower mission by Miss Carson. Fine local reports were also given of jail work at Atlanta, Augusta, and Savannah; and of colored work at all these points, as well as at smaller places. Rescue work at the Bethany Home in Augusta was well reported by Mrs. Hankerson and Miss Cleckley. The discussion of each and every department, so eagerly entered into by the delegates, was a refreshing and instructive feature of the proceedings.

As I looked over the convention and saw "the old stand-bys" re-inforced by new and capable women, my heart was filled with thankfulness. Some of the best of the missionary society women are joining us. Among the new recruits are such women as Mrs. C. H. Smith, Mrs. S. H. Sibley, Mrs. H. M. Willis, Mrs. M. A. Sandford, Mrs. Murphey, Mrs. Balock, Mrs. Hightower, Mrs. B. W. Heard, and Mrs. B. E. Overby.

The same general officers were reëlected, and but few changes made in the department superintendents. Mrs. Richard Webb was appointed to the state superintendency of jail work; and Miss Lily Reynolds, a cultivated, consecrated, young lady, to the juvenile work. Mrs. J. S. Moore was appointed to the department of conference with influential bodies, and Mrs. Sallie F. Saul to the department work as assistant to Mrs. E. T. Miller of the railroad. The devotional exercises were well conducted, and none were more acceptable than those of Mrs. F. A. Walter, formerly of South Carolina, but now of Birmingham, Alabama.

Mrs. Chapin did valiant service; for, besides speaking every evening, she conducted for the convention a mothers' meeting and a parliamentary drill. She also spoke to a children's meeting, and addressed the pupils of Shorter College, by invitation of the president, Rev. Dr. Gwaltney.

Mrs. Sibley's annual address was received with great enthusiasm by the convention, as was her reëlection to the presidency. A power at a Georgia convention is Mrs. Walter B. Hill. Original and brilliant, and equal to any emergency, she seldom gives the public the benefit of her wit and strong common sense; but the committees on which she is placed never fail to show the impress of her incisive and comprehensive thought.

Among the important resolutions adopted were to petition the Legislature "to build and equip a separate prison for women and children convicted of crime;" to urge the presenting of a bill "to make scientific temperance instruction obligatory in the public schools;" and "to apply for a charter of incorporation for the state union, with headquarters at Atlanta."

Early on the morning of May 9 we went to Atlanta, where we were met at the depot by a committee of our temperance brothers and escorted to the State Temperance Association which had convened the day before, and to which our delegates were all invited not merely as spectators and listeners, but as bona fide voting and speaking delegates. We were enthusiastically welcomed by President C. R. Pringle and the Association, and treated throughout with marked consideration.

The resolutions passed by this Association were remarkable for their point and strength; for instance, the following:

Resolved, That the members of this convention will not support with their ballots any candidate for any office, by whatsoever party put forth, who does not favor the suppression of the beverage liquor traffic.

The following resolution, which was offered by the writer for the W. C. T. U., was also adopted by our brethren:

WHEREAS, The recent decision of the United States Supreme Court, reversing the decision of the Iowa Supreme Court, allows the introduction and sale of liquor in original packages in states where the sale is prohibited, thus practically nullifying the prohibition laws of states and counties, and as this decision now makes prohibition a national question,

Resolved, That the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Georgia appeal to our brethren of the State Temperance Association to use their influence to elect to Congress such representatives as will favor a national prohibition law.

At the closing exercises of the evening the Association, by its own invitation, was addressed by Mrs. Sibley, Mrs. Felton and Mrs. Chapin.

MICHIGAN.

SHIAWASSE COUNTY CONVENTION.

This was held in Owosso M. E. Church, May 6 and 7, was one of the best ever held. The Owosso union not only served lunch and tea in a most beautiful manner, but furnished an organist and full delegation. Seven unions out of eight were represented, and the local attendance was unusually large. The ladies were encouraged by remarks from gentlemen whose presence was enjoyed through the whole meeting.

The paper on "Juvenile Work and its Importance," by Miss Jennie Mowers, our newly elected county superintendent, was very fine and deserves publication.

A poem, "The Crusaders," by Mrs. Shont, was much enjoyed, as were also all department papers, judging from the earnest and often tearful remarks that each of these papers called forth. We greatly missed the presence of Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Colby. The evening of the 6th the gold medal contest called out a full house. A beautiful greeting from Mrs. C. B. Spencer was responded to in an equally sweet manner by Mrs. Warren, both of which prepared the audience for a paper on "Our Boys and Girls; What of them?" by Will H. Golden, of Laingsburg Loyal Temperance Legion, which deserves high compliment. The contestants won much praise. The judges decided in favor of Miss Minnie Bishop, of Byron, who rendered "The Martyred Mother."

With renewed loyalty, and deep feeling the convention closed, leaving the work in the hands of Mrs. C. V. Waldron, president; Mrs. M. Miner, recording secretary, Mrs. T. M. Euler, treasurer.

MISSOURI.

SALINE COUNTY CONVENTION.

This met at Napton, May 15 and 16, in the Baptist Church, which was tastefully decorated with flowers, evergreens, mottoes, and also a beautiful picture of the Woman's Temperance Temple. Mrs. E. L. Anderson, county president, was in the chair. The local attendance was very good.

On Thursday, Miss E. P. Babb, district president, was with us, and by her help and words of cheer made the day one long to be remembered. Devotional services, spiritual songs, and an exceedingly interesting talk by Miss Babb, explaining the object and methods of work of the W. C. T. U. and also the difference between what is termed the non-partisan and the National W. C. T. U. After noontide hour of prayer, lunch was served at the church by willing hands.

The afternoon session opened with devotional exercises led by Mrs. L. Tichenor. Miss Babb suggested that some of the gentlemen present give a few thoughts on, "What will be the effect on Prohibition and high license of the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, on the original package case sent up from Iowa?" Rev. Bolton, of Marshall, and Judge Thompson, of Arrow Rock, responded. These gentlemen think that this decision is the "beginning of the end" of the liquor traffic.

Singing now followed by male quartette which had just arrived from Marshall. Rev. E. Wilks gave a very able and interesting address. A delightful paper by Miss Anna Stouffer on "The Temperance Temple" was well received.

The evening session was truly a time of great refreshing. After devotional exercises and singing by quartette, Miss Jessie Wilkins gave a cordial address of welcome, to which response was made by Mrs. S. M. Thompson. Short addresses were given by Pastors Bolton, Wilks, Tichenor and Anderson; they were earnest and full of encouragement. Master Hughes Banta recited an appropriate collection speech, which met with a liberal response.

The second day was crowded with work and interest. A selection, "Resubmission in Kansas," was read by Miss Mabel Hightchu, also "Only a Woman" by Miss Jessie Wilhelm; both were read in a beautiful, impressive manner. There were discussions on these topics by several members of the convention. The Demorest medal contest was commented on by the president. After the noontide hour of prayer lunch was served on the church grounds. In the afternoon a paper was given on "Will Christian Women be held responsible for failing to take part in the Temperance Work?" by Mrs. Nettie Cunningham. The question-box, conducted by Miss Babb, proved a valuable feature. Dr. Holland and wife, of Marshall, came in and were greeted with the Chautauqua salute. The doctor gave a talk which was enthusiastically received. This brave soldier is out on the picket line of this battle between right and wrong. All were greatly cheered by his hopeful words. Reports were received from Arrow Rock, Marshall and Napton unions, and from the county. All the county officers were reëlected: Mrs. E. L. Anderson, president; Miss Estelle Blanchard, secretary; Mrs. L. W. Scott, treasurer. The session proved very interesting and profitable.

OHIO.

TWENTY-FOURTH DISTRICT CONVENTION.

This was held at Lockland May 14 and 15. About fifty visiting delegates and thirteen from the home union, with many visitors, assembled at 10:30 on the first day. The devotional exercises were led by a venerable Crusader, after which a love feast was participated in by many who had labored in the Crusade of sixteen years ago. Reports were read from nearly all the thirteen unions in the district. All showed a prosperous year and were an encouragement to each other and a revelation to those unacquainted with the work.

Lunch was served in the church which afforded delightful opportunity for interchange of acquaintances and ideas. I wish I could speak adequately of the sweet music by volunteers; of the addresses of welcome; of the church decorations; of the large attendance of citizens; of the presence and strong endorsement of five ministers in the neighborhood, who attended all the sessions.

The address of Miss Charlotte Boyer, district president, was marked by devotion and fidelity to the cause, and gave facts concerning the work of the year encouraging to her sisters, and alarming to saloonists.

The mayor of the village welcomed the visitors in the evening, and Mrs. Mattie McLellan Brown gave one of her grand arguments in favor of prohibition. The audience was very large and intelligent.

Thursday morning a paper, "Waiting" followed by the consoling song,

"God hath said, to comfort thee,
'As thy days, thy strength shall be,'"

was heard with profit, for it was full of sweet exhortation.

Thursday afternoon three papers, "Moral Courage," "Franchise" and the "Political Phase of the Temperance Work," gave intense satisfaction and elicited repeated applause from the crowded house.

Miss Boyer was reëlected president; Mrs. Helen J. Pendery, corresponding secretary; Miss Lily Bachelor, recording secretary; and Miss Mollie Fulton, treasurer.

In the evening Dr. C. L. Work gave an admirable address, characterized by sparkling wit and full of "no compromise." Those who are familiar with grades of conventions say that this district anniversary compared very favorably with state conventions.

We of the home union are rejoicing over the good already done; twenty names are added to our number and will be received into the band at our next anniversary meeting. People about us are saying, "Why did you not have the convention come here again next year?" One lady said, "I was never in a W. C. T. U. meeting before; had I been, you would have caught me long ago —take my name!" Two villages in the near vicinity will form unions at once, stirred by what their women saw and heard here. We are very thankful for all these helps, and begin the year with faith undimmed and hope rekindled.

MINNESOTA.

HENNEPIN COUNTY CONVENTION.

This opened in University M. E. Church, Minneapolis, May 6, with consecration service led by Mrs. Minnie Webber, Mrs. Frances Neal, president, in the chair. The address of welcome was given by Mrs. Paddock, which was full of cordiality and good cheer. The response from Mrs. F. V. Denton contained much in a few words. Our dear state president, Mrs. Hobart, then occupied the time with remarks upon parliamentary drill, holding a real school. Mrs. Cressie followed with the topic, "Evangelistic Work," a beautiful, earnest lesson, and the convention sang "Rescue the Perishing." Mrs. Hobart made a plea for a state organ of our own, and received a unanimous response by every one rising to her feet. The report of local unions was full. The credential committee reported fifty-nine delegates, after full count, whereupon Mrs. Hobart said, "It does not look as if we are going to pieces." Mrs. Holt read a paper entitled, "The Saloon Must Go." A solo followed by Mrs. Fischer which was received with applause.

The evening address by Mrs. H. A. Hobart, on "The Great Issue," was in her own style of truthfulness and sound reason.

The morning session of the second day opened with devotional exercises led by Mrs. S. S. Sickles. The report of the Central Union was full of the good work they are doing. Mrs. C. R. Newcomb, just returned from a prolonged absence in state organization work, was received with delight by her white ribbon sisters.

Mrs. McCurdy's paper on "Prison and Jail Work" stirred every heart. She gave the horrors of filthiness in our county jail from personal visitation, and a committee of three was appointed to take the matter in charge. Mrs. Ella Tremain Whitford gave an able address on "Franchise," which was heartily received. In her ever ready and bright way, Mrs. Hobart took charge of the question-box, calling out much applause. The juveniles of three unions, numbering one hundred and fifty or more, were presented to the convention. The session closed with a grand evening address to a large audience, by Mrs. Marion Baxter, of National fame. The officers chosen for the coming year were as follows: President, Mrs. Francis Neal; secretary, Miss A. A. Conner; treasurer, Mrs. S. M. Gould.

The resolutions adopted by the convention pledged Hennepin County W. C. T. U. as loyal to the state and National societies. The importance of the evangelistic and juvenile departments was especially emphasized, and thanks extended to those principals and teachers of our public schools who have used their influence to put down the use of narcotics, thereby awakening thought and creating sentiment in support of the law against selling or giving tobacco to persons under sixteen.

Rev. H. H. French, pastor of Centenary Methodist Episcopal Church of Minneapolis, has been giving a series of sermons on the liquor scourge. Sunday evening, May 4, the topic was, "The Deadly Foe of Mankind;" May 11, "Shall it be Legalized?" May 18, "The High License Craze;" May 25, "Prohibition—State and National." Cards were printed announcing these sermons and cordially inviting the public to attend, and these were distributed throughout the city. MRS. AMY A. GREEN,
State Supt. Press Work.

HOUSTON COUNTY CONVENTION.

This was held in the M. E. Church at Caledonia, May 9 and 10. The meetings were ably conducted by Mrs. Ruth M. Rowell, president of the first district, assisted by the county president, Mrs. Lucy A. Wheaton. The first session was spent in devotional exercises, appointing committees, general business, discussions and reports of the local unions, followed by interesting remarks from Mrs. Rowell and Rev. William Cooke. There are only four unions in the county at present, but judging from the enthusiasm manifested at the convention we anticipate that the number will be doubled the coming year.

In the evening Mrs. Cooke gave the address of welcome at the court house. She made us welcome, not only in words but deeds, as several can testify. The response was given by Mrs. Mary L. Spencer, of whose meritorious speech we felt justly proud. This was followed by Mr. T. R. Stewart's famous "Chalk Talk."

The next day interesting and instructive papers were read on the following subjects: "Systematic Giving," "Progress ot Temperance among the Swedes," "Juvenile Work," and "Scientific Temperance." The songs and recitations of the little people proved very entertaining. The question-box was a notable feature of the convention. The address of the first district president was highly appreciated, for which a vote of thanks was given. The reports of the superintendents were brief, but showed how much in earnest every one is in her special line of work. Mrs. Marion Baxter, state lecturer, spoke to large audiences Saturday, Sunday and Monday evenings. Mrs. Rowell stayed after the convention to aid in organizing a Y. W. C. T. U.

As kind, hospitable entertainers the people of Caledonia cannot be excelled. The next annual convention is to be held at Hokah. MISS TILLIE MUMPY.

PRIZE OFFER.

A prize of five dollars will be awarded at the Minnesota state convention to that member of any W. C. T. U. or Y. W. C. T. U. in the state who will send the best essay of not less than six hundred nor more than one thousand words, on "Why Women Want to Vote," to Lock Box 21, Le Sueur, Minn., before July 10. These essays must be written on note paper, on one side of sheet only, and must not be rolled. On the first page of the essay write an assumed name, and in a sealed envelope accompanying the essay write assumed name and also real name and address. This envelope will not be opened until after the decision. If it is desired that the paper be returned, stamps must be inclosed in the sealed envelope. ELLA TREMAIN WHITFORD, Superintendent Franchise for Minnesota.

INDIANA.

JOTTINGS.

Our constitution requires local unions to elect officers the first and second week in March. The reports of these elections this year were very promising, in the number of departments taken up and in the spirit of consecration and undaunted courage manifested. The care taken to declare their loyalty to the National and state organizations indicated that the malarious fever that unnerved many of our dear sisters did not come our way. We have heard as yet of but one non-partisan W. C. T. U. of the new sort.

Miss Alice Palmer, state organizer, added twenty unions in thirty days; has any state better figures to give than these? The juvenile department is all astir; the patter of little feet and the music of their voices remind us of the flitting of birds and their spring songs. Mrs. K. T. A. Straw, state superintendent, has taken a very advanced step in the incorporating of the Loyal Temperance Legion. If the act of incorporation is not quite finished it is nearly so. Miss Flora Bratton, organizer for this department, met with an accident while crossing a stream during high water. She came near drowning, and the consequences of the wetting and the fright may prove very serious. Remember her in your prayers.

County conventions with full programs and large audiences have been the order of activity since the elections until now; and now the state is conducting a series of joint county conventions, twenty-one in number, taking in the ninety-two counties in the state. May and June are filled with this work; two conventions a week, and two days to a convention; two of the state officers present, as a rule, at each convention.

In looking over some of the published programs we read "Bible Readings and Consecration Services," "School of Methods," "The Y's—their Creed and Practice," "County Unions—How to Make Them More Efficient," "The Children A-Field" (Indiana's Loyal Temperance Legion motto), "Question Box," and "Public Meetings—How to Conduct Them." We have the soil in Indiana and this sort of cultivation insures the kind of harvest and almost the number of bushels, for our reaping is so in character with our sowing in all things. Mrs. Thompson, evangelistic superintendent, is in the field in the interest of her department. Mrs. L. D. B. Cowan has her time fully occupied with mothers' meetings, and, with this method of reaching the mother heart, has been able to organize several unions. Other departments are especially active. The Demorest medal work has made its way into sixty-seven counties. It has entered into the schools and churches, as well as into the temperance societies. The financial side is being better understood and chairmen of classes find that the ten cents admittance does not lessen the attendance or the interest, but it does help local treasuries and those who do most of the paying. Door receipts count up all the way from $5 to $40 dollars. This work will make a way through opposition and prejudice, when, seemingly, nothing else will. Mishawaka, Bluffton and Argos have been particularly successful. This department has its plans: A diamond contest in October, at the state convention in Terre Haute, and to be willing and ready to respond to all calls outside the state in making up classes for special occasions. We recommend it as a peaceful vote maker, also a successful one.

The death angel has visited our ranks several times; the grass is green over the folded hands of several of our sisters. Space forbids our writing their names here, but they are written in letters of gold in God's book of remembrance. The good things said by Miss Willard during her visit in Indianapolis have been repeated over and over in union and club. Mrs. Hoffman, Major Hilton, and others of National place, who have visited our state during the past six months, have left a good record for our cause, and a warm welcome for themselves if they will come again to-day or to-morrow. Our rank and file appreciate the sacrifice and toil of these leaders in the reform. MARY E. BALCH, Special Correspondent.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

A NEW tract in Chinese, a translation of No. 10 in Mrs. Bateham's Sabbath Series, is entitled "Bible Thoughts on the Sabbath," and can be had for two cents each by addressing Mrs. M. S. Carey, 506 South Second street, San Jose, Cal. Mrs. Bateham wishes special attention called to this neatly gotten up tract and hopes that wherever there are Chinese the unions will not fail to purchase and distribute these as largely as possible.

THE Mississippi W. C. T. U. in recent state convention, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That as a state organization we stand loyally by and with the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union."

THE visits of Mrs. M. C. Raynolds, and Mrs. Borden, the president and secretary of New Mexico, at Santa Fé, Albuquerque, Deming, Socorro, and Silver City, were productive of great good. They reorganized the union at the last named place. New Mexico is making encouraging progress in temperance work, and it is expected that many new unions will be organized before the official year closes.

THE flower mission workers of the Rahway, N. J., W. C. T. U., made their annual visit to the almshouse on Saturday, June 7. They were hospitably received by the warden and his family. Through the generosity of friends they were enabled to provide a bountiful lunch for the inmates. Devotional exercises were held in the afternoon, led by Mrs. Magie, local superintendent of the flower mission, at the close of which presents, flowers, fruit, candy and picture cards tied with white ribbon were distributed.

PLEASANT mention is made of Miss Carrie Estey's work in Minnesota, both at Lake City, where she spoke under the auspices of the Y's, and at the Wabasha county convention held May 27 and 28. Both Mrs. Godfrey and Miss Estey were present and aided much in making the convention a success. County officers were elected for the ensuing year as follows: President, Miss Fanny T. Weed; secretary, Etta M. Kelly; treasurer, Mrs. Southworth. Much work was accomplished, and all felt that they had gained much knowledge and were better prepared to serve in the great work of temperance, for having been present at this gathering.

RECENTLY Major and Mrs. E. T. Scott organized two new unions in Cedar county, Nebraska, one at Coleridge with forty-five members, and the other at St. James with over twenty names. These workers are kept continually busy.

A RESPECTABLE aged lady, a W. C. T. U. member, desires a middle-aged woman as companion, and will furnish room and furniture to a suitable person. Inquiries can be made of the Waco Sun, The Dalles, Oregon.

THE secretary of the Onondaga, Mich., union, reports a visit from Miss L. J. Newcomb, state organizer and superintendent of physical culture, who organized a W. C. T. U., a Y, and a Loyal Temperance Legion. She won the esteem of all who met her.

AT the eleventh district convention recently held at Sibley, Iowa, the efficient and beloved president, Mrs. J. B. Shesler, of Spencer, was reëlected. She has done grand work for six years. For corresponding secretary the convention elected Mrs. H. M. Lemon, Storm Lake; recording secretary, Mrs. F. O. Brown, Sibley; treasurer, Mrs. Emma Ladd, Sheldon. The convention was harmonious throughout, and the local press passed a deserved compliment in the following notice: "The officers were not elected by acclamation, but by formal ballot, and a good deal of friendly rivalry was manifested among the various delegates. Roberts' Rules were in all cases strictly adhered to, and for once, at least, in this generation, a body of women were seen to transact their business in accordance with the strictest code of parliamentary practice." Mrs. Bullock gave a fine address on "Narcotics."

CLARION COUNTY, PA., has ten unions and one Y engaged in active W. C. T. U. work. Mrs. E. D. C. Mair, of Pittsburgh, has been doing excellent work in the county, visiting former unions and organizing new ones. A very enthusiastic meeting was held May 27, in the Edenburg M. E. Church, which was attended by representatives from many of the local unions. County officers were elected as follows: President, Mrs. F. H. Beck; corresponding secretary, Miss Hettie Keattley; recording secretary, Miss Ella Reed; treasurer, Mrs. E. Finley. The annual meeting will be held in September at Rimersburg. Mrs. Mary H. Jones, state president, was present and won all hearts by her cheerful spirit and business tact. In the evening Mrs. Mair delivered a touching and impressive address, showing how much women may do for the salvation of the fallen. A marked feature of the county meeting was the presence of a large number of ministers and laymen who came to show their enthusiastic interest in the work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union Miss Vandelia Varnum gave a week's work at East Brady, recently; her meetings were largely attended, with great interest. She organized a Loyal Temperance Legion of forty members, also a Y, with Mrs. Parsons, the wife of the Baptist minister, as president. The W. C. T. U. received fourteen new members, and the work is prospering.

A BEAUTIFUL tribute to the memory of Mrs. Catherine Stone has been received, written by her daughter, who is also the secretary of the Hannibal, Mo., W. C. T. U., which only lack of space prevents from publishing in full in THE UNION SIGNAL, for no one could read the noble record without desiring to honor the memory of this sainted mother in Israel and loyal temperance worker. Mrs. Stone was associated with the early history of Chicago, Illinois, coming in 1839, when what is now known as the "West Side" was one unbroken stretch of prairie; when old Fort Dearborn still stood intact, and the Chicago river was crossed only in the ancient tow-boat. In those early days Mother Stone was known far and wide as a stanch temperance woman, and in the midst of the busy life of a hotel, she had many practical opportunities to illustrate her principles. "Her temperance mince pies were the delight of the many who partook of them, at the home, or on the journey, as the lunch hour arrived; but never did they bring temptation to the hungry traveler who partook of them." She went to Missouri just before the Civil War, and spent the remainder of her life in Hannibal. The tribute closes thus: "Here, in Crusade times, her name ranked among the league of women five hundred strong, who, by prayer and labor, sought to lift the curse of the saloon from the city. Later on, when the W. C. T. U. was organized, her full sympathy was given to the movement. Of the Hannibal union, she was the eldest and best beloved; its members miss the kindly cheer and greeting of the departed one, but rejoice in her abundant entrance into the upper and better kingdom. Thus after eighty years of life well spent, a pioneer of early Chicago, a promoted soldier of the W. C. T. U., and a beloved mother has passed from labor to reward."

TEN HALF-FREE STUDENTSHIPS.

In February last, announcement was made in THE UNION SIGNAL that a patron of the Boston Correspondence School had offered to pay one-half of the tuition of the first six women who should apply for work in the W. C. T. U. English Bible Course of Study. Twenty-two applicants responded within a week. Announcement was then made that the sixteen names, other than the first six, would be filed, and that work would be sent to these women as soon as money was forthcoming in their behalf. Work has since then been sent to them all.

The interest of our students in their work has not been selfish. Appreciating and confessing the blessings of the Course of Study to themselves, several of them have volunteered to become its patrons.

The undersigned, therefore, in their behalf, hereby announces that there are ten half-free studentships available in the W. C. T. U. English Bible Course, under the regulations governing the said six studentships named above.

Microscopic Enemies.

The experiments of modern physicians and scientists have established the fact, that many of the germs of disease enter the human organism by the inhalation of air laden with these bacteria or microbes. As their name imports, they are very small, but their work is deadly. Still, many of these are harmless to a person in health. But if any organ is diseased, it is first attacked. The experiments of Pasteur, Koch and others have shed much light upon this important subject. Up to the present time these researches have benefited science more than humanity, and have proved very destructive to dogs and rabbits. Meanwhile, the "expectant public" are allowed to derive all the comfort possible from this addition to their store of knowledge. As we can do so little to destroy these minute enemies, the most natural and sensible course to take, it seems to us, is to strengthen and revitalize the system, so as to enable it to repel and resist their destructive influence, and it seems also very appropriate that the vitalizing element should enter the system through inhalation. Such a vitalizer is Compound Oxygen. But examine the evidence, and judge for yourself. If you wish to do so, send for our brochure of 200 pages, a Treatise on Compound Oxygen, and giving accounts of many remarkable cures in the most obstinate chronic cases. Sent free. Address DRS. Publisher's Notes.

The Very Thing!

A short time ago we had word from a valued friend of our cause that she was about to establish a Union Signal Gem Club!

In other words to make our paper the center of a reading circle. We asked her to send us the results and we cannot do better than to give her letter entire, and here it is:

4041 WALNUT ST., PHILADELPHIA, May 13, 1890.

Our "UNION SIGNAL Gem Club" is fully inaugurated, and proves a success. I have just returned from our monthly meeting held at the house of a member of the West Philadelphia W. C. T. U. After a prayer and reading of Scriptures, we were refreshed with cake and iced lemonade, and then sitting in a circle, each lady was called upon in turn to furnish the best thing she had met in her UNION SIGNAL. No two had selected the same theme, but each prepared that which bore upon what she regarded as vital; and while we all concurred in all the articles that came before us, the wonder and surprise of the meeting was the versatility of THE UNION SIGNAL, how it meets and happily expresses the heart wishes of so many. The sense of the Club was that it had been a season of rare enjoyment and profit. We would advise all unions "to go and do likewise." There had been no comparing, or knowledge of selection of one member with another, and that no subject was duplicated evinces the varied and abundant supply of topics contained in your valuable journal.

CORNELIA E MOORHEAD.

Nothing more admirable than this has yet been thought of. It is better even than forming regular reading circles because

1. It is less expensive
2. Few will refuse to try the plan.
3. The result will be that many more will be interested in the paper and the work it represents.

Let us have a thousand

Union Signal Gem Clubs

started at once! Send us reports of methods, successes and outlooks. Don't pass this suggestion by; seize it; use it; grow by it. We will start the campaign by offering five copies of the paper free to be given to the first five UNION SIGNAL Gem Clubs organized, with due notice thereof given to the publisher. The free copy can be used to loan out, either to folks who ought to subscribe but have not, or to be sent to pastors or their wives. Let us put this capital idea to every possible use?

BEECHAM'S PILLS act like magic on a weak stomach

American Scenery.

There is probably not another ten-mile stretch of railroad in the world more varied and majestic in its surroundings than that from Point of Rocks to Harper's Ferry. The Valley of the Potomac narrows, the hills on either side rise to the stateliness of mountains, and the river flows swiftly in ripples and eddies. Just below the ferry, the river, increased by the Shenandoah's volume, becomes a torrent. On the opposite side is London Heights, a sentinel of the Blue Ridge, dark and frowning. Beyond Virginia and into West Virginia, the base of the two States and ending in the swift flowing stream which separates them, Bolivar Heights start abruptly up with Harper's Ferry at their feet. The train, still upon the opposite side, winds beneath Maryland Heights, thirteen hundred feet high. The meeting of these three mighty forest-crowned masses, the two rivers becoming but one, the long vista up the Potomac, in the foreground the steel bridge and behind it John Brown's Fort and the old-fashioned houses of the town, the ruins of the arsenal whose two tall chimneys alone remain, Jefferson's Rock high on the heights, and over all a September sky—expression fails the theme.

The scene described above can be viewed from the windows of the Vestibuled Trains running between the great cities of the east and west via Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. All B. & O. trains run via Washington.

Have You? Many Millions Have accepted James Pyle's invitation to try his wonderful discovery, Pyle's Pearline; for easy washing and cleaning. You couldn't count them in a lifetime. Some of the twelve million housekeepers in this land must have accepted very often. That's the way with Pearline. The wise woman who investigates, tries it; the woman who tries it continues to use it. A daily increasing sale proves it. The truth is, there's nothing so acceptable as Pearline. Once accept its help, and you'll decline the imitations—they don't help you. It washes clothes or cleans house. It saves labor and it saves wear. It hurts nothing, but it's suited to everything. Try it when it suits you, for it will suit you when you try it.

Beware Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, do the honest thing—send it back. 175 JAMES PYLE, New York.

FIVE LITTLE PEPPERS MIDWAY.

BY MARGARET SIDNEY. 12mo. $1.50.

Ever since delighted children first read "Five Little Peppers," that wonderful story of pure, sweet, happy child-life in the midst of privations and poverty and self-denial, there has been a constant appeal from the thousands, yes, hundred thousand of its readers, for "more, more." It seemed as if nothing could satisfy them but to know further about this most lovable and beloved family and letters kept pouring in asking for a sequel, until the author was at last prevailed upon to continue her chronicle. The announcement that FIVE LITTLE PEPPERS MIDWAY is now ready will be hailed with acclamation. Every one who read the first volume will want to know what Mamsie and Polly and Phronsie and Joel and Davie and Ben have been doing since they left "the little brown house." It is, perhaps, enough to say in its praise that the same sweet, sunshiny spirit that shone all through the first story illuminates the record of the FIVE LITTLE PEPPERS MIDWAY, and makes it a most fascinating story for old as well as young.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION

MODENE

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—IN COMPOUNDING, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts mildly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on moles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE SUPERCEDES ELECTROLYSIS.

Recommended by all who have tested its merits—Used by people of refinement.

Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail, in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with your full address written plainly. ☞Correspondence sacredly private. Postage stamps received the same as cash. (ALWAYS MENTION YOUR COUNTY AND THIS PAPER.) 14K GOLD
AND SOLID GERMAN SILVER.

The cases are made of a plate of fine 14k gold over the finest quality of German silver, making a case composed of nothing but fine gold covering finest quality of German silver. With German silver on the inside and 14k gold on the outside, we warrant the cases to be equal in appearance to a $50 solid 14k gold watch. They are open face, smooth bezel, finished to a dazzling brightness, dust and damp proof and warranted to wear a life time. Different from the cheap brass watches offered, the case contains nothing but gold and the finest quality of German silver and in fact it is in every way, except intrinsic value, equal to a $50 solid gold watch. The movement is a fine 3-4 plate style, finely jeweled polished pinion, oil tempered main spring which does not break, and all the latest improvements. A guarantee is sent with each watch that it will keep accurate time for 2 years ordinary use. OUR 90 DAY OFFER. That all may have this beautiful watch in their own hands and fully examine and see for themselves the value and running qualities of same, we will send it C. O. D. to your express office, with the privilege to examine it. All we ask is any business man in your city as reference that you are ordering the watch in good faith, and if found satisfactory you can pay the express agent $3.75 or when full amount issent with order we give a fine gold plated chain and charm free. If not satisfactory you can refuse same and you are nothing out but your time in going to the express office. Knowing the fine qualities of this watch we make the above offer, as any one wanting a good time piece will accept same at once on examination. Order at once as our price will be advanced. Address

PRESS NOTICES

GLIMPSES OF FIFTY YEARS

Wherever this book has gone, there is a better knowledge of the objects and aims of the National W. C. T. U. Already 50,000 copies have been sold and they still want more agents.—The Lever.

The publishers report that over 40,000 copies of the book have been sold. And yet Miss Willard's popularity, like the popularity of her autobiography, goes "marching on."—The Interior.

We gladly recommend to our Canadian white-ribbon sisters Miss Frances Willard's new book, "Glimpses of Fifty Years," with the consciousness that it will be one of the most interesting and helpful they have ever read.—The Woman's Journal, Ottawa, Ont.

It is a woman's book, warm, sympathetic, and off-handed. Every mother should read it; every son and daughter should read it and gain inspiration from its pages; and no library, either for church, school or home should be considered complete without it. . . . The book is embellished with numerous beautiful illustrations, and in every respect is a work of which its publishers, the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, Chicago, have reason to be proud.—Demorest's Monthly Magazine.

Publisher's Dep't.

What a Splendid Report! 4120 pledges of five each—20,600!!

Is it possible that we have heard from that many unions and that the good work will be done by July 1?

No!

The above report is from The Voice and not from THE UNION SIGNAL subscribers! It makes quite a difference and we have not yet started to count ours. You can do it for yourself if you like, if you find last week's paper and add names given below. Here are some glints from the battle field. One corresponding secretary writes: "Our union declines to accept your proposition but I will work for it. If I could take only one paper THE UNION SIGNAL would be that paper." Some state presidents respond in a blessed sort of way. Mrs. S. C. Acheson, president of Texas, writes: "I will urge all my unions to the work." Mrs. Downs, of New Jersey, told the writer at New York that she had already sent in six names personally secured by her and more would follow. Miss Tobey, of Massachusetts, also gave us a cordial word of encouragement at New York. One corresponding secretary writes: "I will work as I never have before." Some unions respond like a child wakened out of a sound sleep when told it is time to get up, and some—the majority, thankful to say—answer in this wise: "Why, yes, that's a splendid plan, we accept it and go to work under it with enthusiasm." That's what we must have, friends, if we expect to make a successful battle of any kind whatsoever.

Enthusiasm!

The paper already referred to is a most able one—keen, lively, convincing, sharp; but will you say, practically, it can forge ahead with its four thousand pledges of five each and THE UNION SIGNAL stay behind? Why should it be so? THE UNION SIGNAL has as different a sphere as can be imagined. It aims to get into the home life, the library or center table life, the life where good impulses are unlocked and a sentiment evolved which says "Do this because of love for thy neighbor." It touches the political life only incidentally and aims at the sources of all right thought and action. Neither do we ask the unions to do the work that will most surely give them a footing, a sure foundation in their own place, for nothing. The framed picture of Miss Willard should be a noble incentive before them. There is left—the work can be done in that time—the pledge at least can be written—you have six months in which to carry it out—it need not be a gift from your treasury as some have written. We urge you to decide for this work—it is hard to do in some places, but it does pay, and pay abundantly. Whose business? The president's, corresponding secretary's, anybody's but yours? No! no!

Yours! Yours!

Talk it up with others—get the names yourself and hand them over to the proper official to send them. The picture would be an abiding object lesson saying, "What can be, must be." We hope to hear from an increased number within a week. It's a large country with over sixty millions of people!

We add a list of pledges received from unions since last week's issue.

TO MOTHERS.

If for any reason you cannot nurse your child, we can assure you positively that there is but one Food that is practically a perfect imitation of Mother's Milk in composition and digestibility, and that is LACTO-PREPARATA. It is made wholly from milk.

All manufacturers of Infant Food make the broad claim that theirs is the best, but few, if any, tell how it is made or of what it is composed, for the facts told to any intelligent person would condemn most of them.

CARNRICK'S SOLUBLE FOOD contains 62 1-2 per cent. of Powdered Milk and 37 1-2 per cent. of wheat. Both the milk and wheat are partially digested. It is especially adapted for Infants from six months upwards, and for Invalids, Aged People and Dyspeptics.

Before you take the risk of trying any other Food, do not fail to send to us for a pamphlet of 64 pages entitled Our Baby's First and Second Years, by Marion Harland, which also gives a minute description of Lacto-Preparata and Carnrick's Soluble Food and their mode of manufacture. Sent Free.

Read the above pamphlet and then ask your Physician which Foods are the nearest approach to mother's milk.

Get out of old ruts and into new ways by using a cake of SAPOLIO in your house-cleaning.

SPLENDID PROGRESS.

Started late in 1889 with no population or improvements, the development already made is surprising. Five factories are building, and several companies organized to build others. No booms, but steady, substantial progress. A knitting factory company is organized, the stock to be all owned, and entire business managed by women. It will pay large profits. Those who want homes in a "clean city," where the rumshop, brothel and gambling den are perpetually excluded, should buy soon, as prices are rapidly advancing.

PROFITABLE INVESTMENT.

Stock in the Demorest Home, Mining and Improvement Company will pay large profits. There are also good opportunities to make paying investments in several manufacturing enterprises. For full information address

AT a recent meeting of the Glasgow College Liberal Association, it was agreed to petition Parliament against the compensation proposals of the government.

"ORIGINAL PACKAGE" saloons have been opened in Lewiston, Maine; Mason City, Iowa; Yankton, South Dakota, and Leedsburg, Pa. The last-named town has been dry for several years, and the citizens are greatly excited.

MISS FRANCES E. WILLARD has recently taken editorial charge of a department in the Business Woman's Journal, to be devoted to philanthropy and reform. This will bring the various reform movements to the attention of many people who could not be otherwise reached, and will doubtless be the means of accomplishing great good.

WORCESTER, Mass., is said to be the largest no-license city in the United States. A prohibition daily newspaper is published there, with good, financial support. Even druggists are unable to obtain licenses, and this high sentiment is fully sustained by the leading citizens.

A CORRESPONDENT in Topeka, Kansas, writes: "That decision of the Supreme Court has caused a great change to come over Topeka. The town is now full of 'original package' houses; the old saloon-keepers that had squatted just beyond the state line, are all back with their packages, large and small, and are exulting over their victory. What a shame it is that Congress does not do something to relieve the people from such disgraceful proceedings! It is too bad that people who try to be decent have to submit to such things."

THE London City Council have, by sixty votes to thirty-eight, passed a resolution declaring that the compensating clauses of the government licensing bill, if passed, would place the council in a difficult and invidious position, and justify the claims of the publicans to a vested interest in their licenses.

LOU J. BEAUCHAMP, of Hamilton, Ohio, has recently closed a series of lectures at Jackson, Ohio, under the auspices of the W. C. T. U. As a result of his work over four hundred signed the pledge, the membership of the W. C. T. U. was largely increased, the Y's received over fifty new members, and before Mr. Beauchamp left, one-half the voters had been persuaded to sign a petition to the City Council for a local option vote, with a prospect of said petition being signed by many more. On his last night the Y's sent the following note to the speaker:

"MR. BEAUCHAMP:

"Dear Friend:—The Jackson Y's feel that they can never express their gratitude to you for all your coming has brought of increased membership, and of awakening and inspiration to better and nobler work in this grand temperance cause. As a slight token of their loving gratitude they ask that you will accept as a gift from them the use of the Crescent Opera House for your 'Sunshine' lecture Monday evening. Hoping God may return in blessing upon you and yours all the blessing you have laid upon the life of Jackson's young people, yours cordially in behalf of the Y's,

REV. DR. A. H. ROSS, of Port Huron, Mich., recently preached a notable sermon on "The Philosophy of Trade," in which he said: "The laws of trade are the laws of God. What we have to do is to discover and adopt them. It is one of the signs of the approaching millennium, that the beneficent laws of trade which make every business transaction mutually beneficial to buyer and seller are being discovered and applied. It will need only their universal application to establish confidence between buyer and seller, manufacturer and user, primaries and middle men, and to cause the marvelous network of small and great transactions to be permeated with what Confucius called "reciprocity," and which we, in its wider statement by Christ, call "the Golden Rule." We can do something to help this incoming. Let us just make every trade and every transaction in principle a reciprocal benefit, that buyer and seller may both be sharers in the profit, that all may be helpers together in the common prosperity; and let us care for our own that all may be the better cared for."

DR. WILFORD HALL'S HEALTH PAMPHLET.
A Marvelous Triumph over Disease Without Medicine.

Mrs. Rev. C. Clark, Thiells, N. Y., writes, Oct. 9:

"DEAR DR HALL:—Some three months ago I purchased your Health Pamphlet with many misgivings as to its value. But having been a great sufferer for twelve months with spinal weakness, rheumatism, nervous prostration, and coincidently with a strong tendency to Bright's disease, accompanied by insomnia so that I had to walk the floor for hours at night before being able to get any rest, being at the same time under the treatment of a good physician, but without avail, it at last induced me to make a thorough application of your treatment. At once my sleep returned as of old, and as sound and as sweet as ever, and my nervousness and other troubles have left me. I attribute my bodily condition to my critical period of life, and I am anxious that other like sufferers should know about my case and secure your pamphlet. I can not be over thankful to you for this discovery, and would not part with the knowledge thus purchased for $4, for many times that amount.

Gratefully yours, MRS. REV. C. CLARK.

The Louisiana Legislature has passed the lottery bill; the annuity to be paid the state is $1,250,000.

NATIONAL CONVENTION.—The sixteenth annual convention of the National W. C. T. U. will be held in Trinity Church, Atlanta, Ga., beginning Friday, November 14, 1890

THE International Sunday-school convention is said, by secular papers, to be the most important gathering ever in Pittsburg. Twelve hundred delegates were in attendance at the opening session, representing 112,897 Sunday-schools, 1,178,301 teachers and 9,149,997 pupils. North Carolina leads all other states in progress made during the year. She reports 4,273 schools and 255,013 pupils. Georgia's report showed grand work being done for the negroes, 127,000 being enrolled in her Sunday-schools.

THE resignation of Mr. William S. Caine, member of Parliament for Barrow-on-Furness has created a great sensation in England. Our readers know him as a leading temperance member; he is the present whip of the Liberal-Unionist party, and ranked as one of the most prominent men in England who have not actually attained Cabinet rank. He resigns and offers himself for reëlection on purpose to test the feeling of his constituents on the licensing policy of the government. The question of Home Rule is also involved, and the result will be looked for with great interest.

IN spite of the intense heat Saturday, a goodly company came out, in Chicago, to hear Mrs. Clara Holbrook Smith on artistic and healthful dress, and all felt well paid for coming. Mrs. Smith's address was the best exposition of the subject we have ever heard, clear, practical and interesting. The dresses she exhibited, the school-girl dress, maternity gown, business dress, various styles of dinner dress and others, were certainly all that is claimed for them both artistically and on the score of health. The celerity with which she changed from one to the other, a minute and a half being all the time required in changing from an elegant velvet dinner gown to her business suit, is a great point in favor of her methods. At the close of her lecture many ladies inspected the various suits with which all were delighted, as they had been with the womanly little woman who wore them.

THE House has agreed upon a substitute to the Senate Original Package bill, broader in scope than that bill, as it applies to all articles of interstate commerce, instead of to intoxicants simply. Here is the text of the House bill: "That whenever any article of commerce is imported into any state from any other state, territory or foreign nation and there held or offered for sale, the same shall then be subject to the laws of such state; provided, that no discrimination shall be made by any state in favor of its citizens against those of other states in respect to the sale of any article of commerce nor in favor of its own products against those of like character produced in other states, nor shall the transportation of commerce through any state be obstructed except in the necessary enforcement of the health laws of such state."

REPORTS made at close of Mr. Moody's Bible Institute, Chicago, show that since the opening of this session, January 16, there have been in attendance two hundred men and women from all parts of the United States, from Europe, and from Canada, several of the pupils being regularly ordained clergymen. The regular course of instruction under Superintendent R. A. Torrey, has been thorough, and has been supplemented by lectures from Rev. W. G. Moorehead, Dr. Arthur G. Pierson, Dr. Gratton Guinness, Dr. Weidner and others. The students have done much work in the various missions in the city, thus not only rendering efficient aid, but also receiving good themselves in the practical training no schoolroom instruction can give. In connection with this work, they have visited 9,330 families; 1,053 persons have professed Christ, led to Him by their labors.

IN his address before the Temperance Congress, Mr. Edwin Higgins, President of the Maryland State Temperance Alliance, made some excellent points on utilizing Fourth of July for temperance. He said that five years ago they commenced this work in Baltimore by a celebration conducted by a single Band of Hope; now the work has spread so that the Alliance has arranged four temperance celebrations for that city and for many more in other towns and villages. He pertinently asks: Why should not a Christian and patriotic people take and consecrate its State and National holidays to temperance and patriotism? There are thousands of church buildings and chapels scattered over the land, and thousands upon thousands of hearts and hands ready to unite. Utilize the buildings, enlist the workers in this enterprise.

THE National Editorial Association held its annual meeting in Boston last week and was very largely attended, seventeen ladies being among the delegates. Last year the Illinois Woman's Press Association was the only ladies' auxiliary; this year the New England Woman's Press Association joined, and several other state associations sent lady delegates. Mr. Pabor read a very fine poem, in which he took strong grounds in favor of the equality of woman. It was applauded to the echo, and its author was elected first vice-president. A party of twenty-five ladies and gentlemen delegates went to Oak Knoll, Danvers, to call on Whittier and were cordially received by the grand old poet, who showed them about the beautiful grounds and gave each a "posy" as a memento of the visit.

RICE COUNTY, Minnesota, W. C. T. U. convention found it necessary to pass resolutions reprobating the action of the last legislature of that state in passing a law empowering a father to will away his children whether born at the time of making the will or not. It does not seem possible that as enlightened a state as Minnesota could have passed such a law at this late day when so much light has been shed upon the relation of mother and child, but reference to the General Statutes of Minnesota, Sec. 132, page 120, of laws of 1889, shows that it did. No wonder that the mothers in council protested against such barbarism, as well as against the law making the father sole guardian of minor children, and looking for the cause of this injustice, announce it and their determination to work for its removal in the following action:

WHEREAS, Legislation is always in the interest of the legislating class, therefore,

Resolved, That we will bend all our energies to securing the full franchise for women at as early a date as possible.

THE International Fair and Exposition to be held in Detroit, from August 26 to September 5, sets a good example to the Columbian Exposition by rigidly excluding gambling and liquor selling from its grounds. To prevent evasions of its temperance rules, the association puts in all its contracts and licenses for restaurant and other refreshment privileges this notice: "All forms of gambling and selling of intoxicating liquors prohibited. This license may be revoked by order of the secretary for violation of above rules." Also the further warning: "Accepted by —— subject to the above conditions. —— Sig." As this great International Fair was attended last year by a quarter of a million of people, and a much larger attendance is expected this year, many thousands of dollars have been vainly offered the managers for privileges to sell intoxicating beverages, and also many thousands for licenses for various gambling devices. Not only is this an example to be commended, it also shows great advance in Christian and temperance principles, when such a course is adopted by managers of a great Exposition, not only because it is right, but because as shrewd, experienced business men, they consider it the policy best calculated to attract great numbers of well-to-do people from all over the continent.

THE Woman's Universalist Missionary Alliance, of Ohio, passed the most ringing resolutions of any religious body whose report we have seen. Avowing their desire to put themselves in line with every specific movement of reform which aims to actualize God's kingdom by banishing abuses and correcting the vices of public and private life, it first proclaims invincible hostility to the saloon system and to the drink habit. Next they declare against the use of tobacco, and urge all women to use their influence to prevent the formation of the habit among boys. They claim for women an equal voice with men in all matters which affect the well-being of their homes and children, and resent the imputation upon womankind involved in the denial to her of the right to participate in the counsels and the political action which determine the public disposal of her property and the laws which intimately touch the fortunes of the household over which she is called to preside. They close by declaring their most cordial sympathy with the efforts that are making, under the various names, to inculcate higher principles of purity in both private and social life, and to reclaim the profligate and fallen, especially among womankind. But while thus feeling a peculiar summons to help in raising our erring sisters, they insist that the law of purity is the same for male and female and protest against that traditional habit of the public mind which condones the sin of man while it pillories with unforgetting and cruel contempt the same offense in woman.

THE International Sunday-school Convention had about twelve hundred delegates, a fifth of them women. Major Harris of Montgomery, Ala., presided. Five women were on the program, Mrs. W. F. Crafts, Mrs. Ostrander, Miss Willard, Miss Van Marter and Miss Wheelock. Miss Kimball addressed the Executive Committee in support of the Memorial for temperance lessons on some other than review Sunday. On this subject the committee made this report: "The improvement in our Sunday-school work should include improved methods in teaching temperance to our children. The awful evils of intemperance, and the fearful waste of money, health and life are appalling. But more than all, the plain teaching of the Word of God, that 'no drunkard shall inherit the Kingdom of God,' should lead to plain, earnest, frequent, scriptural instruction and appeal. We do not object to special temperance days and lessons, but believe that in addition to special lessons, the pastors, superintendents and teachers in all our schools should be careful to teach the Christian virtue and important truth of temperance as other truths and virtues are taught, namely, day by day, continually, and from every lesson." The debate on this lasted an hour and was very spirited. All seemed ready to set apart some Sunday, the only question was what Sunday. A substitute of the usual compromising sort was finally adopted by a vote of 260 to 109. So far as we can judge from reports received, we have gained little, as no change is to be made till 1892, when we are assured of one temperance lesson on some other than Review Sunday, but that is not fixed on general principles, only because it happens to come so in the lesson course, and we have no assurance for any other years, not even as much as we have now, the committee only "think it possible that the selections for other years may be like the selections for 1892, in the respect above named."

THY COUNTRY'S FLAG!

AIR: America.

BY D. A. PERRIN.

Thy country's flag uphold,
Ye sons of vet'rans bold,
Defend the right;
Awake from ev'ry vale,
Let not thy foes prevail,
Thine enemies assail
With thy great might.

Thy country's fair ensign,
Thrice noble its design,
It's triumphs sing;
Pride of our native land,
Joy of a mighty band,
Beneath it take your stand,
Your tribute bring.

Hail it in peace or war,
Throughout our land afar,
Our glorious flag;
Now waving over us,
Send it victorious,
To conquests glorious,
O'er mount and crag.

Unfurl'd beneath the skies,
O'er our proud youth to rise,
Resplendent, fair;
Repeat its wondrous birth,
Proclaim its royal worth,
Let songs of joy and mirth
Full rend the air.

The God of nations praise
For all His wondrous ways,
Makes firm our age;
Long may our banner wave
O'er land our fathers gave,
Awake, ye souls, and save
Thy heritage.

SPOILING A HOLIDAY.

BY MRS. HARRIET A. CHEEVER.

Mr. Gardner Rockport was what those who knew him best called "a splendid fellow." His personal presence was sure to please one at the outset, while both speech and manners were quite in keeping with his genial face and commanding figure.

"Six feet and a little over of genuine manliness from crown to sole, I call Rockport," remarked lawyer Folinsbee to Judge Ransom one day.

But the very good fellowship inherent in the heart of the man was proving a piteous snare. He confidently assured his wife that as yet he had himself so perfectly "well in hand," that no one but she suspected how rapidly an unfortunate habit was gaining ground, nor how fast he was developing a singular mania when under its influence.

It was only natural and a thing to be expected that a man possessed of Mr. Rockport's social qualities should be a favorite in the club-room, at the annual gathering and the holiday feast. Aye, and just there on the occasions last named seemed to occur the strongest, most seductive time of temptation.

Holidays! How poor Mrs. Rockport had learned to dread them until she shrank from their very mention. For as surely as they meant a great supper at the fashionable hotel in the winter, they meant a jollification at one or another popular resort in the summer. And the mania, deplorable yet laughable, to which allusion has been made, was always quick to manifest itself after Mr. Rockport had participated in the subtle enjoyments of one of these holiday spreads.

The painful truth was, that once under the influence of certain brands of rich old after-dinner draughts, although Mr. Rockport never "lost his head" before others, as most men would have done who indulged so freely, never had been seen to stagger, never became maudlin nor irritable, but carried himself with exceeding steadiness and dignity at such times while still abroad, yet once he found himself at home and in the seclusion of his own room, he would tell his wife a series of the most improbable and absurd stories imaginable.

On several occasions she had been deceived and really alarmed at the stories he told, but on questioning him the next day about the events disclosed the night before, she would discover they were fabrications of an excited mind, of which after sleeping he retained not the slightest recollection.

After an experience of this kind, Mrs. Rockport would say to her husband, "Why, Gardner, what would people think, and what do you think would be the result should you begin telling others such strange untruths as seriously as you do me?" For with the exception of leaving out a word here and there, his speech differed in no wise while telling these monstrous stories from the usual style, while the expression of his face was more than ordinarily serious and apparently sincere.

But at each remonstrance he would assure his wife there was no cause for anxiety on that account; instinctively he would know better than to attempt making dupes of his friends.

Mr. Rockport was in prosperous circumstances, had a beautiful little family and was unusually free from trials of a personal nature. Such things as troubled him, therefore, were in connection with his friends rather than with himself. He felt genuine sympathy for Shaw MacLeod, a noble fellow who was deeply in love with Miss Helen Prince; but Helen was an heiress, while poor MacLeod, having been thwarted by adverse fate from acquiring the profession he craved, was merely head book-keeper in a large mercantile house. True, he received a good salary as salaries go, but there was no prospect of rising higher in business life, and the high-spirited, honorable man declared he could never appear to wish to offset his circumscribed financial condition, by striving to secure an heiress.

Then lawyer Folinsbee had an unfortunate quarrel with Judge Ransom which in reality was a source of deep regret to both lawyer and Judge. At the same time the men admired and revered one another, yet each thought the other at fault, and being equally proud and unbending, concession and reconciliation seemed afar off. And Gardner Rockport being a warm friend to both men seriously deplored the breach which had sundered them.

Still a third source of discomfiture was the bitter disappointment of good Dr. Worth, the minister, who had struggled hard in the endeavor to send his promising son to college, but found himself unable to do so because of protracted sickness in his family. So, although Mr. Rockport was not exactly given to worrying, yet his sympathetic nature kept these things before him sufficiently to cause not a little genuine solicitude.

The Fourth of July was close at hand, and Mrs. Rockport was unable to overcome a feeling of decided despondency and apprehension at its approach. Not that she selfishly desired to keep her husband at home, come the great holiday—a thing she might justifiably have desired to do—but there had been a rather discreditable ending of the 22d of February reception at the club rooms, and the stories she listened to afterward were simply astounding, things which her husband asserted with the utmost gravity he had discovered happened to her own father!

And Mrs. Rockport uneasily mistrusted, judging from fragmentary bits which floated to her ears, that both on New Year's night when there had been a large gathering at the hotel as well as at the Washington birthday party, some rather exaggerated statements, to put it mildly, had escaped her husband before he reached home, and in the presence of his friends.

But time and tide we know wait neither for anxiety nor fears, any more than for man or any other creature, and so the Fourth came on apace, and Capt. Lee had invited a select company, chiefly of sea-faring men, generous, large-hearted, and fond of good cheer, to a sail and a supper on his elegant new yacht, the start to be about noon, supper at five o'clock, return in the evening. Ah! the return! How like a nightmare it arose before Mrs. Rockport's troubled vision.

The day dawned gloriously, the sky reflecting right loyally the tri-colored stripes of the national standard flung everywhere to the breeze. The Captain's yacht danced gaily, like a fairy afloat, from one light wave to another. In the cabin things were superb, the table lacking nothing in the way of fanciful adornment. Flowers, beautifully decorated china, cut glasses of slender, pipestem gracefulness, decanters of every glistening hue, cut in points and prisms, sending flashes of light athwart the burnished silver, which vied with the broad mirrors in picturing various objects in the richly furnished apartment. All lending glamor to a pleasure trip suggestive of freedom and independence indeed, of appreciative and cultivated tastes.

It was not very late in the evening when the bird-like craft bounded up to her landing, and one lordly looking man with even steps but with his brain on fire, began walking at random through the city. The first person he met whom he knew was his friend, Shaw MacLeod, into whose unsuspecting ear he began pouring a mellifluous tale

"Good-evening, Mac," he began, steadying his voice to extreme deliberation, making every word tell, "been looking for you. My wife saw Miss Helen Prince last night—told wife she'd lost every cent—her property. Said she was poor, so poor—must go to work at once; a bad uncle she used—live with, wanted her to keep house for him, but she's going—tend in a store in the country right away."

"How came she to tell Mrs. Rockport that?" asked Mr. MacLeod, eyeing his companion sharply for a moment, a touch of both excitement and suspicion in his tones; but the reply was prompt and apparently honesty itself:

"We heard it first through her lawyer,—Folinsbee, you know; then wife happened—meet her and asked her if unfavorable report—heard was true, and she said 'twas. Wife told her—wished she knew how much you thought of her, and she said, 'Oh, I ain't worthy—him, he'd better forget me, sooner the better.' Made wife feel very bad."

"Did she say when she was going away?" inquired Mr. MacLeod.

"Yes, early to-morrow morning;—said trouble never came singly, she'd lost—pocket-book, must borrow money to go away; wife lent her some."

"Well, good-night, old boy," said Shaw MacLeod so gaily, that Mr. Rockport looked at him with a vague sense of wonder as he returned his good-night.

A block or two farther on he suddenly encountered lawyer Folinsbee, and his presence at once inspired another tale.

"Hullo, Folly!" he said with unsmiling eagerness, "just the man I wanted—see. I wish you could heard what Judge Ransom said—me this morning, 'bout you."

A rattling street car which kept alongside the two men made the occasional omission of a word not particularly noticeable, as Mr. Rockport spoke. The lawyer replied, interested at once:

"Not such very friendly observations, I suspect."

"Never so mistaken in your life!" was the serious rejoinder. "Said he'd forgiven everything long 'go, only wished you'd call—see him; wanted to apologize in that old affair,—felt he was altogether to blame—loved you like—brother, but didn't s'pose anything would induce you—enter his doors. Said he'd been very sick, indeed,—had doctor several times,—such things wore upon him more'n any one would think—hated to think you'd lost confidence in him. Honest truth, Folly, just go ask him if—don't believe me."

"Well, I'm going around that way," said Mr. Folinsbee hesitatingly, a pleased ring in his voice as he added:

"Thank you for telling me, Rockport, what my old friend said; possibly he thought you might repeat it."

"I think he did," said Mr. Rockport with quiet dignity, "but he sails for Europe to-morrow, leaves home early in—morning."

"Possible!" exclaimed Mr. Folinsbee, "and the Flickby trial coming off next week?"

"Said—didn't care anything for it;" replied Mr. Rockport with a calm look into his friend's face, who took leave forthwith, hurrying off in the direction of Judge Ransom's dwelling.

Left to himself, a sudden fancy possessed the man to cross on a ferry-boat to an adjoining suburb. Whether into his inner consciousness was borne some realization of his true condition, making it seem advisable to remain out until his brain cleared a little, it would be hard to tell, but it was growing very late as he sailed with stately strides up the main street of the thriving town.

After walking quite a distance he came to a large building which he knew to be a bank. This suggested a story whose outcome should be glorious. A bright light was streaming from the transom over the door, and going up and trying the knob he entered and stood face to face with the watchman who had himself entered the building only a moment or two before, and had waited to turn up the gas before locking the door.

"Good-evening, sir," said Mr. Rockport with gentlemanly blandness; "I was sent here by the president of this bank to request you to give me without delay six thousand dollars. I am to pass it over to a worthy, but impecunious clergyman, who wishes to send his son to college, but is unable to do so for lack of funds. The president instructed me to order you to hurry."

"All right," said the watchman carelessly, "excuse me a few moments," and he moved off. At the end of the hall he looked back and added:

"You stay there, please; it may take a little while to work the combinations." He closed a door after him, then shouted through the telephone.

"Send a couple of policemen right away; I think an insane gentleman is in want of care."

Mr. Rockport leaning against the wall, patiently waiting for his six thousand dollars, was beginning to think he had better go and offer to assist in manipulating the locks, when the outside door opened, and two stalwart policemen entered.

So utterly stunned was the gentleman at finding his story disbelieved, and himself under arrest, that beyond declaring he was a twin brother of the president of the bank—a man known to be singularly without relatives—he seemed unable to give any account of himself.

The officers were perplexed and guarded. Evidently they had a gentleman of education and respectability in their grasp; but arrived at police headquarters, Mr. Rockport coolly laid down on a lounge in the chief's office and almost immediately falling asleep, it was decided to let him remain there until morning.

"What do you think, sir?" asked one of the men.

"I think, my dear fellow," answered the chief with a quiet smile, "we have in custody one very fine gentleman who is hopelessly drunk!

"And they call this celebrating Independence Day!" he added, with an interjection so much more emphatic than choice, it were better not repeated here.

When Mr. Rockport awoke at broad daylight, he was his own majestic, pleasing self. At the story the chief had to tell, his fine face flushed painfully.

"Of course," continued the officer kindly, "I understand the situation, but it will be necessary to send for some one whom I know to identify you, before the case can be discharged, for you see, you attempted something criminal."

"Send for Judge Ransom," was the brief reply.

When the Judge came hurrying in an hour later, there was a brief colloquy between the chief and himself, then the former turned to Mr. Rockport and said simply,

"You are at liberty, sir."

"I want to see you in my office, my friend, a little while, even before you go home," said the Judge, when having crossed the ferry the two men were heading up town.

They were closeted in the private office for more than an hour. It would be needless attempting to quote much that was said, but it takes considerable courage, unflinching fidelity and rare tenderness of manner to understand how fittingly to hold a mirror before the face of a friend, forcing him to see that which hurts and mortifies and stings, even though the trying picture, "bitter but wholesome" may prove his salvation.

Judge Ransom could not help a kind of judicial summing up of the affair as he said in concluding the interview:

"You really did not harm any one in the least last night except your own worthy self. When I met Folinsbee in my parlor, the first words the noble fellow said were, 'My friend, how I wish it might have been me who first spoke words of concession instead of yourself; it surely was my place to have done so as the younger man.' But I was delighted that it all came out as it did. Folinsbee has long been very dear to me and we are brothers again outwardly, as indeed, we always have been at heart.

"Then I learned early this morning that MacLeod was one of the most jubilant of men. Without questioning in the least the veracity of the unlikely story you told him, —love is blind, you know,—he went immediately last night after leaving you, and offered himself to Miss Helen Prince, assuring her it would be the privilege and delight of his life to share with her his moderate but comfortable income, rejoicing that no great fortune of her own kept him longer at bay.

"Of course the girl hasn't lost a penny, but she took Mac at his word, nevertheless, and I do not doubt is quite as happy at the outcome of affairs as he is; she surely should be. Poor MacLeod found it impossible to understand matters, however, until he had seen Folinsbee this morning and then, as I have already intimated, the two men compared notes somewhat and reluctantly decided that you and your reason must have parted company for once.

"Between ourselves and a few other of good Dr. Worth's more intimate friends, I imagine things can be pretty easily adjusted so that our minister's boy can go to college without delay. You see, the rest of us have not been admitted to the degree of confidence you have enjoyed in that direction and so failed to see our chance of assisting our faithful pastor."

The kindly voice dropped a little at the next remark.

"I believe this is the first time any misrepresentations of a serious nature have escaped you publicly, and ordered as it has been, the whole thing is quite as safe with your friends,—and I've secured secrecy on the part of yonder chief—as it would be with your own mother or your estimable wife. But—Rockport! is it a true patriot, a reliable citizen, a whole man, who, on the Nation's grand commemorative day, will deliberately deprive himself of his own freedom of thought and act? Folinsbee, MacLeod and I, putting things together this morning, had to face a very unwelcome fact, and great tears stood in MacLeod's eyes as he said; 'I'd give anything possible for me to give, to save Gardner Rockport from himself, but Gardner Rockport is, himself, the only man on earth who can do that.' "

"There! don't say another word," said Mr. Rockport, seizing his hat, "I'll sign a new Declaration of Independence in the shape of a solemn pledge, before I'm an hour older, and in the presence of my wife too! I'll show Mac and the rest of my good friends that I can and will, save myself from myself, with the help of Almighty God."

And he did. From that time forth, Mrs. Rockport never had reason to dread a holiday.

ECCLESIASTICAL AMUSEMENTS.

BY E. P. MARVIN.

[Extract from a 32 page leaflet.]

"The church has gone into the amusement business largely. In the days of primitive simplicity, it was thought that the world and Satan had a monopoly in that line. This, however, is 'an age of progress,' so called, and the church has entered the market, and is in competition with these great caterers."

Indeed the whole alphabet of amusements, and all the colors of the rainbow are exhausted in these carnal and crazy forms of ecclesiastical amusement. But such is the continued complaint against "long-faced piety" and the demand for an "attractive religion," that no one can predict the future career and end of this modern craze. The idea is becoming popular, that we cannot attract people to anything serious or elevating without the bait of food or fun.

The discovery has been made that the church, in order to hold the young people to its altars, must provide for the natural craving for amusements. It used to be held that Jesus and his work furnished ample resources to meet the loftiest aspiration of a saved soul. It was sung—

"Thou, O Christ, art all I want;
More than all in Thee I find."

That sort of sentiment is now thought not to be up to "the times." Sad as it may appear, judging from the new order of things, Jesus is not equal to the occasion. A little amusement must be thrown in. In order to keep the people from the theatre and opera our churches must be made into semi-theatres and semi-operas. We must "play at church." Faith in the gospel as the chief attraction fails.

The royal ordinance of preaching retires before the popular ordinance of entertainment. Pagan, Papal and patriotic holidays furnish convenient seasons for these unblest practices. Now I wish to utter some earnest words of testimony to God's professed people, concerning fairs, festivals, concerts, orchestras, tableaux, amateur theatricals and variety shows, as methods of winning the heart and purse of the world.

1. As methods of raising money for the Lord these are all contrary to the precepts and examples of His Word, and, therefore, they cannot please Him. They are counterfeit methods of giving, and they cultivate bogus benevolence.

On a certain occasion "Jesus sat over against the treasury, and beheld how the people cast money into the treasury." (Mark 12: 41.) The motive and manner of giving to the Lord should be regarded as much as the amount given. (Matt. 6. 1-4.) God even curses services of any kind performed in a wrong spirit. (Jer. 23: 36-40.)

The simple method of free-will offerings alone is approved, and all other methods are virtually condemned. (Study Ex. 35: 5, 21, 29; II Cor., chapters 8 and 9; Luke 6: 35; and Matt. 10: 8.)

The least departure from this is the first step toward all current abominations. One-tenth, or more, cheerfully and directly given, was the law of Old Testament stewardship, and it is the privilege of the new. These unscriptural methods are often very costly in time and money.

What if Moses had instituted a grand carnival or bazaar to draw the surrounding heathen into his camp and get means to build the tabernacle? How would it comport with the character of the early Christians to read in one of Paul's epistles a suggestion that the saints at Corinth get up some amateur theatricals or Isthmian games to raise money for the poor saints at Jerusalem? or an exhortation to Lydia to stir up the godly women of Philippi to get up a grand fair, festival, crazy tea, or baby show, with fantastically dressed Christian girls and all our latest modern devices? The word of God teaches that giving is an act of worship—Acts 10: 4,—but these ecclesiastical Vanity Fairs are scenes of carnal revelry and ungodly mirth.

2. These unblest devices are belittling, contemptible and sometimes positively dishonest. It is almost a shame to even speak of them in detail as they appear in all our newspapers, not unfrequently as the butt of worldly ridicule and contempt.

When the churches become ashamed to practice such things and our missionary journals ashamed to tempt the young by advertising and commending them, we shall be ashamed to mention them. What shall we say, what would the Master say, of a bevy of vain and bedizened young ladies, fascinating and cornering susceptible young men, to sell them commodities above value and which they did not want? or a dance gotten up by the "King's Daughters?" What of the many devices like grab-bag, fish-pond, bean-counting, ring-cake and raffle, involving the gambling principle?

3. These methods abate and corrupt the spirit of gospel benevolence in the church and bring it under bondage to the world.

Instead of "acts of worship" and exercises of benevolence they are scenes of carnal revelry and selfish pleasure. They foster the worldly spirit of self-indulgence instead of the Christian spirit of self-denial, as designed by the institution of alms-giving. They are tricks of traffic with the Lord, and devices by which to give him "what costs us nothing." They are "giving made easy," patents for the convenience of stingy saints, cloaks for covetousness, anesthetics for the painless extraction of charitable (?) gifts from ungodly people.

Says a pert disciple of this school: "I am not going to give my money unless I get some fun out of it." Well, if persons cannot be persuaded to give to the Lord, "hoping for nothing again," in the spirit of willing and cheerful benevolence, we have the best reason to believe that he does not want them to give at all. Luke 6: 35, II Cor. 9: 7, Matt. 10: 8. Perish the jesuitical principle that "the end sanctifies the means!"

Can there be any doubt as to the sin and folly of this double-faced, indirect method of trying to raise money for the Lord's cause, in contrast with the straight-forward, honest appeal to men to give of their substance to Him on whom they depend for all things?

These methods are especially designed to draw money from the "outsiders" and thus spare the "insiders;" but we should remember that the world, the flesh and the devil claim a mortgage on all institutions which they help to support. We should not expect Satan to help pay for the weapons with which we assail him. The world expects its stock to vote in a church as well as in a railroad corporation. If we beg of the world to help us to support the church we must allow the world a measure of control in it, and it will gradually become "a church of the world."

Taxation without representation is tyranny. The early Christians never dreamed of asking the world to support the church. Long before this, Abraham and Zerubbabe had refused such offered aid. Gen. 14: 22-23; Ezra 4: 1-3

4. Many of these practices are evil in their desecration of our places of worship, and in degrading them into places of merchandise.

Even if we do not regard places now as consecrated, like the temple, all agree in the expediency and importance of hallowed associations. Though there be "no religion in surroundings," there are powerful incentives and hindrances to spiritual worship.

After the memorable scene of Transfiguration, Peter calls the place a "holy mount." Reverence in worship is naturally connected with reverence for the sanctuary of worship. Certainly the spirit of the law in Lev. 19: 30: "Ye shall keep my Sabbaths, and reverence my sanctuary. I am the Lord," has never been made void. But what undevotional associations must linger on Sunday in the sanctuary where we lately attended a "necktie and apron social," or saw the Sunday-school children play "Cock Robin" or "Mother Hubbard," or where the pastor lately lectured on Jack Horner and Jack Spratt.

A pastor used the following language in dedicating his church: "Holiness becometh Thy house. Let this church never be desecrated to worldly and secular uses. Let the tables of the money changers and of groveling worldlings never find a place here. Every part is sacredly the Lord's." After an entertainment in this church, I asked a friend to what the church was dedicated? He replied, "We dedicated it at first to the Lord, but last night we dedicated it to Shakespeare, Dickens and Bret Harte." The law to tax churches that are used as play and pay houses is just and equal. Our solemn ceremony of dedicating or consecrating buildings to religious instruction and worship is manifestly a sacred farce if they are to be used as play-houses or club rooms.

Fair and festival, frolics untold,
Are held in the place of prayer;
And maidens, bewitching as sirens of old,
With worldly graces rare,
Invent the very cunningest tricks,
Untrammeled by gospel or laws,
To beguile and amuse, and win from the world
Some help for the righteous cause.

Christ twice cleansed the temple court of abominations far less offensive than these, and if he were here we may be sure that nothing less severe than a whip of small cords would suffice. If pulpit watchmen would give clear and ringing testimony to the imminence of the Lord's coming again, it would startle many a slumbering saint out of these abominations. Matt. 24: 42–51.

5. Amateur dramatics to please the world and put money in the purse of the church, silence the testimony of the pulpit against the stage, and even promote its interests. The theatre has always been a school of immorality, from the time when the Greeks sang and danced around their wine-god Bacchus until now, and these performances are training schools for the play-house.

But some one may say: "Suppose we should have fearless and faithful pulpit testimony, go out of the show business, and administer wholesome discipline, according to our standards, who would be left in our churches?"

left disencumbered of a great mass of ecclesiastical worldlings who are falsifying the gospel, caricaturing Christianity, grieving the Saviour, hindering the Spirit's work, and thwarting the endeavors of those unequally yoked Christians. Yes, "lovers of God" would be left when these "lovers of pleasures" were gone, and I should expect the grandest revival of salvation ever witnessed in America! If they do not want to be "tied up," let them go and take their Kitchen Annex and Club House with them.

6. These practices turn the church aside from its legitimate and heavenly calling, and fritter away its spirituality, its time and energies.

The church was purchased by the blood of Christ for no such secular, trifling or corrupt purpose. Her mission is her commission. The church is not designed to be a bureau of amusements for the world, strew the broad way with flowers, and cheer on the world's frolic to perdition. It is her mission to save "our young people," and God does not bless such means, directly or indirectly, to this end.

We must not forget that the cross itself, with all that it represents of toil and suffering, attracts heroism. The church triumphed when it was the fashion to believe, to love and to suffer. The church has made its grandest conquests when most holy and separate from the world, so that God could work through her, and the world could see something to be converted to. Christianity has its repulsions, and the church ought to be holy enough to expel the unholy. Christ knew how to attract and hold, and what is His call? Mark 8:34–38.

"We study to please," is the motto of the stage, but "We study to save," is the motto of the church. The church is to be a Christ-witnessing, light-bearing missionary agency. It is a divine propaganda, and it has no apology for its existence in any other character. Christ and the apostles never dreamed of making almsgiving, preaching or worship an entertainment. The church in its corporate state has but one thing to do.

7. In fine, these methods of ecclesiastical amusement and money-making blight the spiritual life, influence, activity, and usefulness of the church, and promote almost every species of carnality and worldliness.

They open not merely a wide door, but the whole broad side of the church, and invite the world to free and easy fellowship, if they will only help to support the church. It is both down grade and broad gauge. In the Holy Spirit and with trumpet tone, we utter our solemn declaration and testimony that this new ecclesiastical dispensation of frolicking and mirth is absolutely contrary to the truth and spirit of our holy religion, corrupting to the church, ruinous to the world, and offensive to God. We are purchased, separated, and sent into the world for Christian work, and not play. When we magnify the spirit of play and amusement to please our young people. we make them "lovers of pleasure," but not "lovers of God." The church is always corrupted when "it pays" to join it.

Study such scriptures as Ezekiel 33, Acts 20, I Thess. 5, Titus 2 and James 4, and learn the serious import of this present probation in its relation to eternity. Salvation is not a selfish luxury, but a tremendous trust. It cannot be propagated in fun, avarice, or ease.

Study the lives of Christ and Paul and see if you find in them this "spirit of the times," this gospel of fun, this "jolly club" business, so regnant in many churches. These lax views, this picnic religion, this go-as-you-please life, cannot possibly coincide with the religion of Jesus Christ. Most of the play-people of the church have no clear, firm, and influential faith in the creeds to which they have subscribed, and they despise discipline. They propose to "make religion attractive," but they most of all make it appear gloomy, by their manifest disrelish for all spiritual things, lack of the joy of God's salvation, and their frenzy for worldly pleasure at any price. They constitute no part of the true church, but are merely a dead weight of baptized worldlings. Professing godliness and practicing worldliness, they are making more infidels than all our enemies outside of the church. Phil. 3:18, 19. The gospel demands an earnest life. The doctrine of universal immortality and a conditional salvation is the most solemn and tremendous faith ever conceived. It is the great pending concern of the universe, and if men will not give their money cheerfully and liberally to this cause, we may fear that they have no part or lot in it.

The gospel presents both the brightest and blackest possible future for humanity—morning and night, love and wrath, punishment everlasting and life eternal. The worldly policy of attracting the world by conformity and fun is of recent origin, but it has been tried long enough to prove a wretched failure. The vast and formal visible church scarcely exerts the strength of her little finger for the world's conversion. Her "mixed multitudes" are "dangerously rich," but she takes to pleasure, and merely plays at missions, giving her shreds and crumbs, which cost her nothing. The church has no relative advantage over apostolic times in the propagation of the gospel.

Our modern improvements are just as available to our enemies as to us. It cost the early churches something. Self-sacrifice and earnest missionary zeal are just as necessary now as then. In life we are to be neither ascetics nor worldlings. We "rejoice in the Lord always," but have fellowship with a suffering Saviour in His great and self-sacrificing mission. We should be earnest and true, even if we sometimes appear blue. We should save many out of the world, if we do not always please worldlings. If we sometimes use vinegar instead of molasses, it is because we deal with bad men and not silly flies.

Already have these crooked methods of counterfeit benevolence and carnal pleasure corrupted the church to a fearful extent. Notwithstanding the untold wealth of the church and these novel schemes of extracting it, our Boards are almost constantly in a state of humiliating debt and mendicancy, while apostolic missions like those of the "Taylors" are well supported in the apostolic way. Our treasuries and spirituality must suffer more and more from these ways that are "nigh unto cursing." The Bible principles and method of giving, for redeemed and consecrated stewards, may be clearly seen. The Pentecostal blessing made money plenty. Acts 2:45.

Will churches that have exhausted their wits and energies on other methods, now try this? Will the church, for the sake of God and humanity, confess its folly and forsake it, come out from the world and be separate, take on a higher type of piety, cultivate the genuine grace of giving, and give the old gospel a fair trial in God's appointed way? Probably if all Christians who are "exercised" in conscience about this matter, had the courage to act out their convictions, this great evil would soon be abated or entirely removed and we should have abetter church and a better world. Let us do it.

HEARING BEFORE THE CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEES.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—As announced in THE UNION SIGNAL, the joint congressional hearing on the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to prohibit "the manufacture, importation, exportation, transportation, and sale of all alcoholic liquors as a beverage," took place the 14th of June before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor and the House Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic. The committees of Congress were addressed by members of the National Prohibitory Amendment Committee for Congressional Work, which consists of the general officers of the several national temperance societies which believe in absolute prohibition, the general officers of the National Executive Committee of the Prohibition Party, and the Superintendent of Legislation and Petitions of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union. The appearance of this committee at the hearing was in furtherance of the "Plan of Canvass" contained in the "National Prohibitory Amendment Guide."

The superintendent of legislation and petitions of the National W. C. T. U., who is author of the "Manual" and chairman of the National Prohibitory Amendment Committee for Congressional Work, made the first address. She gave a brief history of the movement for national constitutional prohibition, now fourteen years in existence, and emphasized the fact that petitions from more than eleven millions of citizens of the United States, praying for proposal of the amendment, have been presented in Congress, and none against it. In the legal part of her address, in answer to a question as to why the national government should be made responsible for the evil of intemperance, and not other evils, or crimes, she said: "It is the nefarious traffic in alcoholic beverages, and not the evil of intemperance as such, that we are asking legislation against. The liquor curse is a business. It is commerce. It is interstate and international commerce. It is based upon production which goes on in foreign countries and in the several states. It finds an appetite, or a demand, in every community throughout the whole country. That leads to interchange—traffic—commerce — everywhere, regardless of state lines, between producers and consumers. Thus, from the nature of the business, it must be under the same powers as those which control commerce generally, that is, national powers. It is not a mere state matter, and cannot be made so. Murder is not commerce. Theft and robbery and arson are individual actions, and are not the outgrowth of industries and general relations which exist regardless of state and sectional lines. Intemperance is such an outgrowth. Commerce in intoxicants, and the evils arising therefrom, are so closely blended as to be indistinguishable in the minds of most people. No other article of commerce is so situated."

W. Martin Jones, of Rochester, New York, Treasurer of the Right Worthy Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Good Templars, well represented that body.

Rev. R. D. Munger, of Waterloo, New York, Supreme Councilor of the Royal Templars of Temperance, in representing this temperance beneficiary association, presented statements and figures showing the low percentage of deaths in total abstinence insurance companies as compared with other insurance companies which pay no attention to the personal drink habits of the persons insured. George T. Niver, Lecturer of the Supreme Council Royal Templars of Temperance, presented various statistics showing the alarming increase in the production and consumption of intoxicants, especially of malt liquors, and said: "The panacea for the hard times is the suppression of the saloon. That will make good consumption instead of overproduction."

John Lloyd Thomas, Secretary of the National Executive Committee of the Prohibition Party, and representing also the National Young Men's Prohibition League, of which he is Vice-President, and the National Prohibition Press Association, of which he is secretary, made one of his characteristic, forceful speeches, sticking closely to the matter at issue.

Lydia H. Tilton, of Washington, D. C., Legal Secretary of the Non-Partisan National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, made an able, impressive plea for National Constitutional Prohibition in behalf of the mothers of the land.

Able addresses were also made by W. Jennings Demorest, of New York, president of the National Anti-Nuisance League, George May Powell, of Philadelphia, President of the Arbitration Council, and Dr. C. N. Whitney, Past Grand Chief Templar, I. O. G. T. of the District of Columbia. The representatives appointed for the National Division Sons of Temperance of North America, and the Supreme Council Templars of Honor and Temperance, were unable to be present. Rev. Dr. I. K. Funk, of The Voice, vice-president of the National Prohibition Press Association, who was expected, telegraphed greetings to the N. P. A. Committee and his regrets that business arrangements made it impossible for him to be in Washington.

The address of each one who spoke in favor of the proposal of the amendment, was meant to show, in the language of the Senate Committee of last Congress, in reporting favorably on the joint resolution, that "this evil (the liquor traffic) runs with the blood throughout the whole system of national life, and nothing but National Constitutional treatment will cure it."

Louis Schade, editor of the Washington Sentinel, was the last speaker and only person who appeared in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Schade is now ex-attorney of the United States Brewers' Association, having been succeeded by Hon. A. P. Fitch, congressman from New York City, who represents the thirteenth district of the great empire state.

The Notes of the Hearing will be published by Congress. Any person desiring a copy should address his or her Senator or Representative in Congress for it. The larger the demand, the greater the number which will be printed. It will make a most valuable document, and should be circulated.

The day following the Hearing, a mass-meeting was held at the National Capital under the auspices of the National Prohibitory Amendment Committee for Congressional work, which was addressed by the several speakers who appeared at the Hearing, and by Hon. Henry W. Blair, United States Senator from New Hampshire, author of the amendment, and who has it in charge in the Senate, and by Hon. J. A. Pickler, Congressman from South Dakota, who has the amendment in charge in the House of Representatives. Both of these Congressional leaders indorsed the "Plan of Canvass."

As Senator Blair was introduced, he was presented with a large basket of choicest roses by Mrs. Bittenbender in the name of the committee, and in behalf of the several temperance organizations represented on it in recognition of the fact that he was the first to advocate national constitutional prohibition in Congress, and at a time when it was a most unpopular topic. Now that success seems not afar off, this public testimonial of grateful appreciation for his faithful adherence to the principle, from the time he first entered Congress, fourteen years ago, to the present, was fittingly made. The presentation was unexpected. The Senator expressed his thanks and appreciation, and accepted the flowers. He then addressed the audience, and said that "in the prohibition movement a new and more promising era has come, and that the workers now knew how to direct their energies, something which was very important in every movement. The workers, he believed, had no cause to feel discouraged, but much to stimulate them to even greater exertions."

"Prohibition straight and national is what we want," said Representative Pickler when he was introduced. He believed in temperance organizations and temperance speeches, but he believed in work. He said no conscience was needed to be a license man. "I am glad the question is in politics, and in politics it must stay until it is settled. Each of the old parties must be crowded into this question until they can evade it no longer."

MRS. LEAVITT EN ROUTE.

MY DEAR SISTERS:—On Monday, April 1, I went on board the steamer Africa. Captain Claire had a very commodious state-room assigned me. We had a prosperous voyage of twelve days, during which we stopped at Bathurst, and Gosee on the coast. I had no opportunity to go on shore at either place. The temperature fell from twelve to fifteen degrees before we reached Madeira, and I found it there, varying from 67 to 75 degrees Fahrenheit, as chilling as fifteen degrees lower used to be in Boston. This explains one cause of fever in hot climates. People expose themselves to only slight changes of temperature, thinking no harm will come of it, when, from the relaxed state of the system it is equivalent to a great exposure in America or England.

Madeira is a lovely island. The name means wooded or forest covered. The discoverer, Zargo, a Portuguese, represented to the King of Portugal that fires should be set to remove parts of these magnificent forests, in order that settlers could avail themselves of the land. The fires were set and raged on for seven years, doing harm that the island has not yet recovered from. Funchal is the name of the capital, and it means fennel, as the spot where it stands was covered with that homely but favorite plant when Zargo landed there.

The story of the discovery is full of romance. There was a real affection between two young English people, Anna d' Arfet and Roger Machim. Both were of gentle birth, but Roger was of lower rank and smaller fortune than Anna. In consequence, their mutual love was frowned upon, and a marriage was proposed for Anna with an old and detestable man, but of very high rank and great wealth. To escape this fate, Anna consented to elope to the continent with Roger in a little vessel manned by five men. A storm overtook them, and drove them out of their course. After many days they saw land, ran the little vessel into the mouth of a river, and landed to rest and refresh themselves. Part of the men remained on board, and others went on shore with Roger and Anna. A storm came up in the night and the vessel broke from her moorings and was not to be seen in the morning. Poor Anna succumbed to all these ills and left Roger alone. He had the grace to survive her but a few days, having in this interval, with the help of the men, prepared a tomb and a shrine, properly inscribed to Anna. His followers interred him in the same tomb. This tomb, inscription, and shrine were in existence as late as 1820, but I was not able to visit the spot, nor to find any one who knew about its present condition. It is not likely that the Portuguese will trouble themselves to preserve the knowledge that the island was discovered and inhabited by an English pair some years before Zargo found it. A trace of this unfortunate Roger Machim is still left in the name of the spot Machimo, where he and his bride were buried.

The men, two in number, apparently, who had been so faithful to the lovers, got away, probably in the boat in which the party had landed, were captured and enslaved on the Barbary coast, and soon found the companions that were carried off when the vessel broke loose and who had shared the same fate. Juan Morales, a Spanish companion of their captivity, heard their story. On his return to Spain, Morales was captured by Zargo, who informed his sovereign of the wonderful tale, and of the rich acquisition that lay awaiting his enterprise. Zargo soon made the discovery, in 1419, and formally took possession in the name of the king.

There is quite a colony of English permanent residents here, a few of whom are retired military and naval officers, but most are merchants. All approve of drink, and nearly all are interested in the traffic in one way or another. They have a very high Anglican church. Beside this there is a little Presbyterian church, a mission enterprise, which holds a service now and then, in English, and morning and afternoon in Portuguese. The latter service is in the care of a man who went to Jacksonville, Ill., as an agricultural laborer, was converted there, and finally came back to assist in the depot of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and to preach to the dissenting Protestant people. Mr. Smart, who under Miss Weston, manages a Sailor's Rest, also supervises the Bible work, and Mrs. Smart, assisted by her sister, Miss Caroline Newton, maintains a school for young children, in which a number of Catholic children are found. One little girl was turned away from the Catholic Sisters' school as utterly bad and unmanageable, "No amount of beating would subdue her," was one of the expressions used in regard to the poor child. In the schools and homes of Madeira there is, as yet, no sparing of the rod, however many children may be spoiled. When this girl appeared in Mrs. Smart's school, there was a great drawing of the breath and many exclamations. Mrs. Smart said, "We must try to make her good, by being kind to her and praying for her," when at once all the scholars took the position for prayer. Mrs. Smart prayed for her, and when she had finished the bad girl was in tears. That was a step gained, and though not yet what may be called a good child. the fits of obstinacy and insubordination are more and more rare. She learns rapidly, and has great powers and force of character.

In the early days, people of the "better sort" come from all European countries to settle in Madeira, so that the pure Portuguese type is found only in the lower classes. A few remnants of "costume" are to be seen, such as the fact that all women of these classes wear kerchiefs on their heads instead of hats or bonnets. But one must go into the country to see the costumes represented in the photographs. The upper classes dress like all Westerners.

All streets are very narrow and the lower stories of the houses look like prisons with the doors heavily barred and studded with iron, and the one window cross-barred. If the house stands back from the street, the garden wall is eight or ten, or even more feet in height, solid masonry. In this case there is a place over the gate where the family can sit and look down into the street. They rest their elbows on the wall, so that often there is quite a continual row of arms and feet, not as cherubic as might be in most cases. Sometimes branches of trees, flowering shrubs and "creepers" hang over these walls and give an intimation of the beauty within. Since I left Southern California I have not seen roses equal to those of Madeira, though the Orange Free state, South Africa, seems to me capable of producing those equally fine. Strawberries are abundant and have a long season as there are about twenty degrees of difference in temperature between the gardens at the base and top of the mountains, with a distance of only five or six miles. The loquot grows to perfection, and so would the Japanese persimmon, if it were introduced. Peaches and oranges abound.

The streets are all paved with small beach pebbles set on edge, the sidewalks, garden walks, and ornamental squares with still smaller ones. The latter are improved by a pattern done in white stones, or by setting the stones in different directions (according to a pattern) from the surrounding ground. This will be understood if it is remembered that the pebbles here seem to be fragments of their strata, so that they are oval in shape but thin and flat. The streets that ascend the mountains were originally carried straight up, so they are very steep. The patient oxen toil up these, pulling a sledge for two persons on wooden runners. Picture a pair of oxen hitched behind a sleigh, and you will see it. This method gives the riders a fine view of the city and ocean as they ascend.

A party of four ladies went up on May day. We stepped into the church, at the top, which has a superstitious legend about Mary's appearing at a fountain close at hand and commanding a church to be built to her there After a pleasant day we came down in the same sort of sledges, guided by two men each. It is most charming.

(Concluded next week.)

LONDON'S GREAT TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The ancient Egyptian conjurers used to profess to be able to see, mirrored in a drop of ink, pictures that revealed the past. I will endeavor with this little black drop on my pen to picture, if possible, the great temperance demonstration which took place in London on June 8.

The weather was brilliantly fine with a cool breeze blowing, which no doubt greatly enhanced the success of the occasion. It was a stirring scene. Thousands filed by us with banners flying, stepping to the sound of music. In the procession there were about one hundred bands and several hundred banners. Many of the banners were beautiful in design and texture. I noted some of the inscriptions which they bore, for here, as in our own land, rum works the same ruin.

"We protest against the authors of paupers."

"Compensate the widows and orphans of drunkards."

"Drink is England's greatest enemy."

"Voices from the convict's cell cry, 'No compensation.'"

"Oh, that men should put an enemy into their mouths to steal away their brains!"

"We don't owe; we won't pay."

One wagon contained an immense beer barrel with both ends knocked out, bearing the significant words, "We see thro' it."

A band of Scots in kilts, and with their bagpipes, marched under a banner that was hailed with cheers. On it was this motto: "We'll no grease the fat soo."

Hanging suspended from a gibbet was a black bottle inscribed, "The devil in solution." Perhaps the most touching and striking feature of the whole demonstration was a wagon full of ragged, dirty, little orphaned pauper children. "Compensate These," was written upon the banner that floated over them. They looked radiantly happy, which detracted perhaps from the dramatic effect, but they were enjoying their free ride with children's thoughtless enthusiasm.

It stirred one's soul to see the different societies and religious denominations march by. The Morning Advertiser, a London liquor organ, says, "They brought the Anarchist into line with the Radical, the Socialist with the Separatist, the Free Thinker and the Atheist with the Salvationist and the professed teetotaler," and it might have added "the Catholic with the Protestant." The paper refers to this heterogeneousness as being an element of weakness. But let the traffic tremble when Atheist and Christian, when Anarchist and Radical are brought into brotherhood by the fear of a common evil.

It was four o'clock when our line began to move and it was seven when we arrived at the Park. This was caused by the length of the procession and by the police who interfered with its progress to make way for passing drays and carriages and beer wagons. The long twilight favored us, however, and the crowds gathered about their chosen stands to listen to the orators of the day. Among them were twenty members of Parliament, besides widely known reformers and clergymen. Among the list of lady speakers was the name of Mrs. E. J. Foster, "barrister of Ohio, U. S. A."

I can not attempt to give extracts from the numerous speeches to which I listened, but will simply quote a little from the address of Canon Wilberforce. He said that he had never spoken with a deeper sense of the integrity of his cause. "We owe a debt of gratitude to the Government for having turned themselves into a poker to stir up the banked fires of temperance enthusiasm into a flame all over the country. We are not here, however, to impute motives. It has been said to me and other clergymen of the Church of England, 'You are going into the Park to stand side by side with Socialists, who, if they had the opportunity, would destroy the very organization to which you belong.' Let my reply be this: 'I would rather see the temporalities and externals of the Church of England—for that is all anybody could touch—destroyed by Socialists than see it built up by co-operation with the iniquitous liquor traffic.'"

Canon Barker and Canon Leigh also spoke. The executive committee of the Episcopal Temperance Society had stated that the society favored the bill, and these men testified that the society at large is bitterly opposed to it.

This bill, which has aroused such an agitation among temperance people, is one proposing to buy up licenses with the state's money, setting aside a yearly sum for that purpose. Hon. Mr. Gladstone has called it "The Public House Endowment Bill." Under the law now in operation, the licenses to the public house at the end of a year expire utterly, and they must be renewed. The right of withholding a renewal of such license is in the power of the magistrate, though here, as in the United States, it is ordinarily granted. A sum of £350,000 a year is to be given to the county councils to be used in buying out public houses.

"That, of course, is the public endowment of public houses as far as it goes, because the license is withheld, and for withholding the license a price is to be paid, and the price is to be fixed by the publican himself. There is no power to take it at the price fixed by the council; there is no power even to refer it to valuation; but the county council are to be able to stop the renewal of the license if they can satisfy the publican as to terms." (Gladstone.)

It has been estimated that the amount appropriated for the purpose would close up twelve public houses in a year. There are seven thousand of them in London alone, and I calculate that at that rate it would take six hundred years to close them simply in the metropolis.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE WORLD'S W. C. T. U. AMONG HER CONSTITUENTS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL: Your grand women over the border, who have so long had Miss Willard as their National President, will be glad to learn that for the past month she has been in this Dominion of Canada, doing work as President of the World's Union, and speaking in many of our large towns. At Pictou, Kingston and Montreal, where our Dominion convention was in session, her presence was an inspiration. She gave us two Parliamentary drills, which sharpened our wits, and communicated wisdom. Her evening addresses were given in two of our largest churches, to crowded houses, many persons being unable to obtain entrance.

After the convention she filled engagements at Quebec, and then on to the Maritime Provinces, speaking at Moncton, Charlottetown, Amherst, Pictou, Halifax, Windsor, St. John and Fredericton, arousing fresh interest and strengthening the hands of our temperance workers.

She was accompanied by Miss Anna Gordon, who held children's meetings at most of these points. During the convention at Montreal over one thousand children filed into the church, with banners flying, while the tread of little feet kept time to the grand march which pealed forth from the organ. Miss Gordon's address to the children was in language which all could understand, and the illustrations used, such as will be engraven on many hearts.

We are hoping that Miss Willard may see her way to cross the ocean and help our English sisters (many of whom, are indeed, our "sisters in the flesh") by her clear and apt presentation of the many phases of the temperance question.

TEMPERANCE TEMPLE ITEMS.

MATILDA B. CARSE.

Great undertakings must, in consequence of their immensity, move slowly. The W. C. T. U. in erecting the Temple are not building for a decade, but for the centuries. No doubt many of our good sisters have grown impatient that the work has not advanced more rapidly. Many have written saying, "If you would only start the building, the money would come in more rapidly, for people are waiting to know that it is really commenced before subscribing their money to it." We can now assure all interested, anxious hearts that the Temple is materializing; some of the contracts have been let, and work on the foundation commenced this day, June 28, A. D. 1890; as most persons know the underground walls of a building must go up before the corner-stone is laid. The laying of the corner-stone has been postponed until Saturday, September 13, at the request of our National President, Miss Frances E. Willard, whose engagements will not permit her to attend to the ceremony before that time. It will not, however, hinder the work from going forward on the rest of the building. We are now in consultation with Miss Willard in regard to the program for the laying of the corner-stone, which will be announced in due time.

We trust the above announcement will give added zeal to all unions that are at work for the Temple, as we are most anxious that all unions and individuals that have pledged $100 gifts will pay as speedily as possible; $60,000 in stock has been subscribed for, on behalf of the National W. C. T. U. Of this amount only a little over $25,000 has been received by our treasurer, Miss Pugh, while about $150,000 has been pledged. If these pledges could only be paid at once, the stockholders would gladly surrender their stock in our favor, and not wait until the five years, which they have allowed them to hold it, expires. We know that a large amount of the above sum is not yet due, but there is a considerable sum that is overdue, and we trust all such individuals and unions will pay at once without further notification. The first assessment on stock is to be paid on or before July 15th, so our friends can realize the need we have for funds. Those practical persons, who have been waiting to hear the sound of the hammer upon the stone of our great National edifice before sending their gifts or pledging to give any, should stand no longer in the market place of indecision; God's voice is calling unto them to arise and help build the Temple which will prove a mighty bulwark against the onward sweep of intemperance in the land. Let all wise-hearted women and men hear the call.

We wish we could acknowledge, through this column, all the gifts we receive for the Temple, but it is impossible. Our friends must, in general, look to the acknowledgment of their gifts in our treasurer's (Miss Pugh's) report, which is given every two or three weeks in another column. How we wish our dear white-ribboners could realize the power of mites to make a million. The following is an honest confession from, evidently, a very frank and sensible woman, Mrs. Abraham, Maplewood, Ill. She says, "I feel quite ashamed to think I am a white-ribbon woman and have not a mite-box; and, in fact, have not seen one. I have thought many times to send for one, but it always seemed to be such a small way of helping that I generally ended by persuading myself that I could do a little better than that, consequently have done nothing at all. Had I sent for a box the Temple would be at least $3.65 ahead. I certainly can promise to put in that, and should be glad to have a box sent me." If all our white-ribboners would only take a mite-box and drop into it a penny a day, or get their friends to help them to do so, it would aggregate, in one year, $730,000. The following letter from Mrs. C. H. Merritt, Mason City, Ill., shows what a little effort will do in this direction. She says: "On examining my mite-box to-day, after seven and a half months' stay in our family, I found it to contain $4. When Lila, my little daughter almost four years old, found I was going to send the money away, climbed up and took down her own bank, counted out ten pennies, and told me to put them in. The draft is for $4.10. All the family have contributed their mites. May God's blessing rest upon the small gifts of His poor people, that they may aggregate a large sum. I will keep the mite-box and send again at some future time." Mrs. H. M. Scott, of the Miamisburg, Ohio, W. C. T. U., has also a realizing sense of the power of mites. She writes: "Enclosed please find post-office order for $12, from the opening of mite-boxes in our union. We hope to do better at our next opening. Let this go on our $100 pledge. These littles from all over the United States will surely, in time, bring the desired result. I have great faith in the building of our Temple."

We are glad that many of our dear women are able to give more than a penny a day. One such is Mrs. Elizabeth Forbes, of Rochester, N. Y., now in her seventy-third year. She sends a check for $100. She says, "I wish we could have a Temperance Temple in every city and not any saloons of any kind to tempt the young to their ruin." Mrs. O. N. Garlick, formerly one of the beloved members of the Central Union of Chicago, now a resident of Tacoma, Wash., sends a check for $50 on a pledge of $100, in memoriam of her mother, Mrs. Charlotte Nelson, La Porte, Ind. Rev. Ada C. Bowles, Arlington, Mass., a most ardent friend of the Temple, sends a check for $25 on a pledge of $100. She writes: "Is this not a significant date (June 17) when I remember all Boston is celebrating the battle of Bunker Hill, and that Bunker Hill monument was for years incomplete till a woman helped her sisters add the cap-stone. Some day the Temperance Temple shall speak of another generation of patriotic women not unworthy their descent." Twenty-five dollars is sent from a friend in Texas, by Mrs. Sarah D. Dryer, Brenham, Texas.

SUMMER'S SERMON.

BY MARY D. BRINE.

Sing a song for summer-time,
  Happy, merry days!
When all nature seems to be Running o'er with praise
To the Giver of all good,
  All things fair and light,
All things beautiful, that make
  Living a delight.

Nothing in the meadow grows—
  Be it e'er so wide—
Which cannot our every thought
  To the dear Lord guide.
Nothing blossoms, nothing blooms,
  Be it large or small,
Which does not the glory give
  To the Lord of all.

Every little running brook,
  Every lake and sea
Sings, and tells the love of God
  Given us so free.
Sun and shadow in the sky
  Come they as they may,
Yet but teach the loving care
  Of our Lord each day.

Happy, merry summer-time!
  How it loves to show
All the dear Lord's gifts to man
  On this earth below!
With the summer birds we sing
  Willing songs of praise.
May our hearts for Jesus grow
  With the summer days. —Exchange.

INDEPENDENCE ROSES.

BY CHARLES N. SINNETT.

It was the Fourth of July, and Aunt Clarinda Morse was earnestly trying to have "independence of faith."

"Things," as she called her surrounding circumstances, had her at a great disadvantage, however. She had worked late the previous evening. Thoughts of her post, and the much which must be done on the coming day, had kept her nervously awake for some time. And how the boys had rung the bells and fired the cannon and anvils at four o'clock!

After a hurried breakfast she had gone down to the Grand Army Hall with a broom and a large basket of her finest flowers.

"The other ladies will be tired and late," she said, "and we must have the place look its best for our temperance dinner and speeches."

What a sight met Aunt Clarinda's eyes when she unlocked the hall door! Sticks, clods of earth, decayed fruit, and many other things were strewn over the floor. The good woman knew well that this meant opposition from the drinking element of the town. She was right in thinking that much liquor was hidden away somewhere. She feared that its sad and dangerous effects would be seen in that very hall before the day ended. No wonder that she had to struggle for "independence of faith that all would come out well!"

Just as Aunt Clarinda got the hall nearly cleaned, there was a thin little face peeping in at the door. And then Nan Dorris' thin little voice said, "Why, you've had quite a job!"

How like a spy the child looked! Especially so when Aunt Clarinda knew how she and the temperance women had had Paul Dorris' saloon closed only a few months before. Had not the father sent out his tattered child to see how matters were going at the hall? The question, and others like it, tugged hard at Aunt Clarinda's faith. But she struggled again for independence.

"Yes, quite a job. But I was brought up to work," was the pleasant answer which she made.

At which Nan tip-toed into the hall nervously, and slipping upon a piece of orange peel fell upon the large basket of flowers. The woman turned at the sound and the child's shrill, "Oh, my!"

"You listened outside. And now you've spoiled my bouquets!"

That was what Aunt Clarinda was tempted to say. How hard her fingers tightened on the broom handle!

Down went the lump in her throat, and out bloomed a smile on her tired face, however.

"Never mind, Nan," she said. "I'll put them all right. Only—could you run up to my house and pick me all the roses on that bush in the front yard?"

"Oh, my, yes!"

And the amazed child turned from the crushed flowers in a moment. On the steep stairs she paused, as if in fear or hesitation, and then pattered away upon her errand.

"I hope her father did not see her," said Aunt Clarinda. "And I didn't mean to pick quite all those roses."

But, somehow, she was happier than she had been before little Nan had peeped into the hall, though she felt more certain about the liquors which were hidden in the town, and saw before her a mass of ruined flowers.

And how different the child looked when she came back with her apron full of roses! She had washed her face and hands at the brook near Aunt Clarinda's house, and rested in the shade of the great willows. And a stranger had spoken to her in a very pleasant manner.

But these things did not seem to be a sufficient reason for the change in Nan, nor for the way in which she assured the woman that she would "help about the dishes and things after dinner," adding with glad emphasis as she hurried homeward, "I'll be real glad to!"

Could it be that the child had found "independence of faith," too? It seemed like it.

And now the other ladies came to help Aunt Clarinda. All of them had fears about the hidden liquors, and the trouble which they might cause in the afternoon. But still they felt that their cause was just and right, and that God would guard it well. And how Aunt Clarinda cheered them all with her words of trust and hope!

The fine dinner was well patronized that day. Many people who had not wished to be classed in any way with the earnest temperance workers, admired their energy on this occasion, praised their meal and the pretty floral decorations, and, though that was not what they had intended to do when they entered the hall, remained there to hear the speaking.

Others, who had said that they would not "pay out a cent for victuals cooked by fanatics," sauntered in as the time for the music and addresses drew near.

Some who looked for "fun from Paul Dorris and his crew" also came into the cheery hall.

"I knew we had a good speaker," thought Aunt Clarinda, "and prayer has never ceased for this hour. But I'm astonished at the attendance!"

And there was Paul Dorris bowing to her! Leading happy little Nan by the hand, he walked to one of the front seats. And why did that stranger beside the speaker of the day nod so to the father and child? Aunt Clarinda saw many look at her as though she had been planning a great surprise for them.

But now the meeting was called to order, and an earnest prayer was offered. Then "America" was thrillingly sung. How still it was when the speaker was introduced!

"My friends," he said, "I have spent many hours in preparing an address for this afternoon. And now, as I see how many are here, and how genuine is your interest in this occasion for which the temperance ladies have so wisely planned, I feel well repaid for every moment of time and hard thinking which I have spent in the hope of interesting and cheering you. But, my friends, there is one present to-day, who, though he has not spent much time in preparing his remarks, I know will help you all far more than I can."

Many eyes were fixed on the stranger at the speaker's side. But the man continued: "Gentlemen and ladies, I have the honor to introduce to you Mr. Paul Dorris."

And Nan's father walked quickly to the platform. Then, as he turned his pale but shining face towards the people, such a cheer arose that the hall echoed and re-echoed.

"Aunt Clarinda's roses here have helped a great deal," he said, "and so has my Independence Rose, as I shall call my dear little Nan there. Last night there were gallons of liquor hid away by the brook that runs by Aunt Clarinda's house. But by this time the brook's taken every drop of it down into the river. Thank God, it can never hurt anybody there!"

The stillness of death was in the great hall as Paul Dorris looked reverently to heaven.

"Many of you know that some of us meant to get wild on that liquor and break up this meeting. We'd always had our own way here on the Fourth of July. We didn't mean to have the temperance folks coming in and crowding us out. And how I laughed as I went creeping up beside the brook this morning to see that the liquor was all right.

"But you temperance folks had been praying. So had my dear little girl, God bless her! And there by the brook I heard my Nan talking with that old comrade of mine there on the platform.

"Said he, 'Where did you get your roses, little girl?'

"And says she, 'Aunt Clarinda Morse had me pick every one on her bush, that she likes so, for the temperance celebration. And I don't believe God will let the good folks be disturbed!'

"Those words went through and through me. It seemed so like Nan's mother saying with her last breath, 'I know God will save you, Paul!'

"And how I started when my old comrade said, 'Yes, God will bless the temperance folks.' He spoke so strong and clear that I knew him in a moment. We had fought side by side in the army. Before I thought what I was doing I rushed up the bank and grasped his hand. God seemed saying to me, 'Forward! March! for independence!' With my own hands I poured out every drop of that liquor, and then how I kissed my little Nan there! Her roses had kept that old comrade of mine from hurrying past to the station. And I had known she wanted to tell Aunt Clarinda her prayers for me when I saw her stealing up to the hall—God bless her!

"This is why I say with all these flowers here shining as they do, Nan's my Independence Rose, so sweet and pure. With the child, Aunt Clarinda, and all these good folks, I'll always work for temperance!

"There's a text my mother taught me when about Nan's age, 'A little child shall lead them.' I believe in that with all my heart. God bless the temperance work!"

And scores of people were led to the paths of truth and right that day.

JOHNNY'S FOURTH OF JULY.

BY MRS. H. M. GILLETTE.

"Oh, boys!" said little Johnny Evans, "let's play Fourth of July. Freddy, you may run over to Mr. Vail's and see if Charlie and the girls can come, and tell Charlie to bring his drum. Eddy Forbes can run home and tell Carrie and Ella to come too. You know when we have a Fourth of July we must have a band, and a speaker, and an audience," added Johnny rather pompously. "The girls can be the audience, but who'll be speaker?"

"I can thpeak," lisped little Annie Vail. "Mamma thays I thpeak too much thometimes, but it wouldn't do any hurt Forf o' July, would it?"

"Oh! a girl for speaker for Fourth of July!" said the boys.

"And on such an occasion as this," said Johnny strutting about, feeling of his chin.

"I don't care, I guess you needn't laugh at her," said Carrie Vail, who had joined the group. "I guess ladies do speak Fourth of July sometimes. Last summer when I was in the city, I went with Aunt Mollie to hear Frances Willard, and she's a real nice lady."

"Yeth," responded Annie eagerly; "I could be Frentheth Willard."

"I guess," said Johnny, "we'll try and get a speaker that don't lisp. And now, let's all march 'round to the back yard, and pick out the spot to have the celebration."

They selected a spot in the shade of some apple trees. Two tubs filled with water were standing near. The boys thought they could place some boards across them, and thus make a nice speaker's stand. They then arranged the music, "a real band," Johnny said.

It consisted of one drum, one mouth organ, and a tin whistle.

It was at last decided that Johnny should make the speech. The band was to play, marching, the boys to march after, while the girls, "the ladies," as Johnny called them, were by his order, to remain seated.

The line was formed, the music commenced, and the boys began their march. They had gotten half around once, when little Annie joined the ranks.

"Halt!" cried Johnny; "there is a lady in the ranks. Annie, take your seat with the rest of the girls. Ladies don't march."

"What makth they have Forfs of July, then?" whined Annie.

"Can't say," replied Johnny, stroking his upper lip.

"I wish ladies could have Forfs July all their own thelves," said little Annie, taking her seat.

"Order!" called out Johnny, resuming his march with great dignity.

They paraded around till they were tired and warm, and Johnny, longing to display his talents as an orator, proposed taking the stand. He mounted the boards laid across the tubs, the baby's high chair was the table, on which was placed a tumbler of water for the refreshment of the speaker, for Johnny had made up his mind to make a long speech.

He stepped forward, smiled and bowed to the audience, then stepping back seized the glass of water, and took a long drink, wiping his lips with the back of his hand.

"Why don't you uthe your handkerchief?" cried little Annie.

"We must have order, or we cannot proceed," said Johnny, coloring and pulling up his collar, then taking another sip of water, he commenced:

"Fellow citizens—Ladies and Gentlemen: This is the great birthday of our nation. This the day which General Wash—"

There was a splash and a cry, and Johnny was struggling in the tub of water. He had been so carried away with his own eloquence that he had stepped on the end of a short board, and it tipped, sousing him in the water. The boys ran up and helped him out, while little Annie jumped and drew a long breath, exclaiming, "O, Forf July's broke all to pietheth."

"I don't care," said Johnny stoutly, looking down at his wet trousers, "I guess accidents most always do happen Fourth of July."

The Still Hour.

FOR THE WEEK BEGINNING JULY 13, 1890.

BY REV. C. C. HARRAH.

DAILY BIBLE READING NOTES.

(Luke 14:1-24; Colossians 4; I Thessalonians, 1-5.)

Sunday, 13; Luke 14:1-24. Verse 5, Acts of mercy and necessity are right on the Sabbath day. Verse 7, Jesus was always watchful for opportunities to do good, and in His intercourse with men did not fail to speak the right word at the right time. Verse 16. The nature of the kingdom of God is very clearly set forth by calling it "a great supper." In it there is the most perfect satisfaction, the most blessed joy, and the most noble society. Verse 17, Everything is "ready" but the sinner, who with worthless excuses rejects the provision God has made to save him.

Monday, 14; Col. 4. Verse 2, Prayer should be persevering, watchful and grateful. Be not discouraged. Beware of spiritual sleepiness in devotion. Be thankful for answers to prayer, and for the privilege of prayer. Verse 5, The world knows but little about religion by the study of the Bible. It gets its knowledge from the daily lives of professors of religion. Verse 12, To stand perfect and fully assured in all the will of God means firmness and constancy. Human opinion, worldly wisdom, the lust of the flesh, and self-will, furnish no guide for the Christian in the various relations of life.

Tuesday, 15; I Thess. 1, Verse 3, "Work of faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope," is a brief and beautiful description of Christianity. All should desire a faith which moves us in our life-work, a love that leads to self-denying labor, and a hope which leads to patient continuance in well-doing. Verse 8, As the church bell sounds forth the call to worship, so the clear-toned lives of believers should represent the light and salt of the community.

Wednesday, 16; I Thess. 2. Verse 1, Paul's self-praise was necessary in order to self-defense. Against the unjust imputations of his enemies he declared that he was divinely certain of his cause and acted with self-denial in his work. Verse 10, One who in Christian work seeks not his own, acts holily; one who does no wrong to his neighbor, but shows him all love, acts justly; one whose teaching and life correspond, acts unblamably. Verse 12, How can any object to the gospel when its aim is to have every one who accepts it live a pure and good life.

Thursday, 17; I Thess. 3. Verse 8, That one is truly happy to whom the faith of others is a comfort, and who, because of his interest in them, is able to disregard his own troubles. The steadfastness of others may become to us a source of great strength. Verse 12, Love to Christ leads to Christian fellowship; and one who loves Christ and loves the brethren is best fitted to love all men as he should.

Friday, 18; I Thess. 4. Verse 1, When we have found the right way in which to walk, we ought to keep moving onward in that way. Standing still tends to backsliding. Verse 3, Sanctification is separation from the things of the world, and all should strive after this with a steady perseverance. It results in purification from the pollution of the flesh and surrender to the service of God.

Saturday, 19; I Thess. 5. Verse 2, The coming of the Lord will not be an unhappy surprise to believers; but the fear of the unbelievers will lead them to call upon the rocks and the mountains to hide them from the face of the Great Judge. Rev. 6:16.

THE PRAYER MEETING TOPIC.

(The Hindrances to Religion in the Family. Joshua 24: 15.)

1. Family religion is hindered by the little importance which is given to it in the daily life of many homes. It is crowded back to the place given to secondary matters, and is not spoken of and honored as a part of the business of the family.

2. Family religion is hindered where there is little recognition of the personal presence and interest of God in the home. Where the feeling of love or obligation to the Saviour is never expressed, there is not likely to be a very great interest in family worship.

3. Family religion is hindered where the members of the household do not attend the same church, and consequently have no unity in their plans of church work and no familiar acquaintance with the affairs and needs of a particular church.

4. Family religion is seriously hindered where the Sabbath is not properly observed, and where the Sunday newspaper comes into the home. Where at any time the papers and magazines leave no place for the Bible, and the study of the Scriptures is neglected, there will be but little or no interest in family religion.

The Household.

OUR FATHERS.

BY J. E. RANKIN.

Across vexed seas our fathers came,
  God's own elect, His chosen,
And took possession in His name
  Of new realms, wild and frozen.
They knelt here first, with song and prayer,
  The rock's rude pile their altar;
And standing by that altar-stair,
  In faith we dare not falter.

The darkness is Thy secret place,
  The thick clouds Thy pavilion;
'Mid Time's far shadows we can trace,
  Where Thou hast led Thy million:
Hast cloven pathways through the sea;
  And stilled the angry waters,
While triumphing, their song to Thee,
  Have sung Thy sons and daughters.

O God, who savest not by sword,
  Nor 'mid war's thunder rolling,
Who art, by Thine almighty Word,
  Earth's path through space controlling,
We bless Thee for faith's heritage,
  The tale our sires have told us;
Turn Thou for us the Future's page,
  Let Thy right arm enfold us.

Our fathers' blood flows in our veins,
  May all their valor fire us
To self-denials, toils, and pains,
  For man and God inspire us;
That we may never lose their way,
  Nor break the compact solemn;
Before us go in cloud by day,
  By night in fiery column.

THE GLORIOUS FOURTH AT HUNTSVILLE.

BY E. V. KEEVER.

Mina Heller at sixteen years of age was "as pretty as a picture," so everybody said. She did have a lovely face and winning manners, but her intimate friends knew that she also had one defect of character that unless remedied would be a source of mortification to her through life. She was inclined to practice deception. While she thought it a grievous sin to tell a falsehood she often acted one, and the other members of her aunt's family were always suspicious of her sincerity.

Mina became an orphan when five years old, and was adopted by an aunt who strove faithfully to lead her to be sincere in word and deed. When she was fifteen years of age this aunt died, and poor Mina was sent to Huntsville to live with her aunt Jane Ringold, a stirring business woman, one who did with her might whatever she took in hand.

The first time Mina fell into disgrace from her failing after she went to Huntsville to live, Mrs. Ringold, instead of scolding her, took her to her own room and had a long and serious talk with her; the outcome of it was that poor Mina, distressed and mortified beyond expression at the very plain language of her Aunt Jane, solemnly promised to confess to her if she ever transgressed in a similar manner again, and together they would plan a suitable punishment; "for," said Mrs. Ringold, "you must conquer that fault, Mina, and if you make the penalty severe enough every time you slip, you can get entirely rid of it, I feel sure."

This was in June, and the people of the village were planning to hold a grand Fourth of July celebration. They were sending invitations to neighboring villages, and expected a large delegation from each. There were to be "bowers of green" on the village common, with tables set for the feast of dainties the housewives were expected to furnish; also a stand for the speakers with the "flag of our country" waving above it, and the prettiest girls of the village were to walk in the procession dressed in white, wearing sashes of red, white and blue, and each carrying a banner with the name of one of the states on it. The tallest young lady was to represent the Goddess of Liberty, wear a gilt crown, a long flowing white veil, while two little misses were to attend her as pages.

Mina being a new-comer to the village was fearful that no one would think of her when the committee made out the list of names; but in due time a note of invitation to meet with the others in the town hall dissipated her fears and she danced about the house singing like a bird and looking like a fairy, so light of foot, so fair of face was she, with dancing blue eyes and gleaming, long, golden-hued curls.

When she returned from the gathering the quick eye of her aunt noticed her troubled look and at the first favorable opportunity she asked her niece kindly what went awry with her while away from home. For an answer Mina burst into sobs.

"Tell me all about it, Mina, dear."

"Well," repressing her tears, "it was like this, auntie. Several of the girls—three at least—wanted to carry the New York banner and two were determined to represent Illinois, so the chairman of the committee said he would write the names of the states on slips of paper, and each girl should draw one, and then no one could complain of favoritism.

"He fixed up his slips and began to call off the names of the girls who went up one by one and drew. He had requested every one to shut her eyes tight before he held up the book that had the slips stuck into one end, and along the front.

"When my name was called I never thought of peeping till half a second before I did it, and just then the breeze from the open window blew across the slips and bent some and I saw 'New' through my lashes, and I picked out that one. I was so ashamed as I went back to my seat that I almost hoped it was little 'New Jersey,' but it wasn't, it was New York, and now those three girls are as stiff as pokers toward me, and I feel mean and unhappy and I don't know what to do. I want to punish myself so hard this time that it will do some good."

"How?" asked Mrs. Ringold; "have you thought of anything in particular?"

"Yes, ma'am," rather slowly; "I thought I would exchange slips with one of those three girls."

"Were you especially desirous of drawing the New York slip before you went forward to take one?"

"O no, auntie. I wasn't at all particular about it. All I want is to walk in the procession in a new white dress, and share in the good time."

"Then I fail to see where the punishment comes in," returned Mrs. Ringold dryly, "unless you intend to confess that you cheated; do you?"

Mina's round eyes grew larger and rounder.

"O auntie! I couldn't do that. They would tell the others, and I should have the—'finger of scorn' pointed at me."

Aunt Jane smiled faintly in spite of herself. "Yes, you would without doubt, several fingers, so to speak."

"Isn't it enough to confess my fault to you and—and to God?" asked Mina very soberly. "You don't know how hard some girls can be on one who falls into temptations that never come to them, auntie."

"I know how hard some grown people can be under similar circumstances, Mina, and I don't insist upon the 'confession;' but leaving that out, I can't see how you will be what you call 'punished,' so I think you will have to plan something else. When you have done so, we'll talk about it again."

The days flew by. Mina's dress was a lovely embroidered India lawn, made for this very important occasion; and nothing was talked of, seemingly, but the approaching celebration.

It was the second of July, and Mina had not referred to the matter of her dishonesty, save to tell her aunt that she had offered to change banners with each of the three girls who originally wished to carry hers, but for reasons of their own they had declined with thanks rather stiffly expressed.

On this Monday morning, the second of July, Mrs. Ringold asked her niece to carry a package for her to a house on a side street quite at the other end of the village. "The woman's name is Holmes, you say. Well, what shall I say to her when I find her?" asked Mina.

"Nothing whatever about the bundle; but I hope you will inquire after Charley. He's had a run of fever; and ask if he could eat some blanc mange."

When Mina reached the open door of the plain little cottage, a young girl of about her own size and age rose to receive her. Mina introduced herself, and made kindly inquiries after the pale-looking lad in the big rocking chair.

Presently Mrs. Holmes entered, and, her errand accomplished, Mina set out for a leisurely saunter homeward. Suddenly she stopped, the color flushed her cheek, and, tossing her head defiantly, she quickened her pace for a few moments, then paused again, and the expression of her tell-tale face was quite changed.

"I'll do it," she said to herself in a very decided way. "Yes, I'll do it, and then we'll see whether it's a 'punishment' or not."

Hastily retracing her steps she was soon at Mrs. Holmes' door, and though her heart fluttered painfully and there was a slight tremor in her voice she managed to make her proposition known. She simply invited Helena Holmes to take her place in the ranks on the "glorious Fourth of July."

Helena blushed scarlet, and after a pitifully appealing look at her mother, burst into tears. Mrs. Holmes, a cultured, beautiful woman, with a sad, care-worn expression, drew her daughter to her side, and with an arm thrown protectingly about her waist, she thanked Mina politely, and then asked her why she seemed so willing to offer to another her place of honor.

It was now Mina's turn to blush and show embarrassment, but she answered bravely. "I'd rather not tell that if you will excuse me; but it is a little sacrifice I wish to make for personal and particular reasons. I will speak to the committee and will arrange everything so that it will be exactly the same as if Helena had been invited in the first place. The "Union Ladies" as they call us are to have a separate table at dinner with little speeches—toasts they call them, and it will be delightful."

Mrs. Holmes smoothed her young daughter's hair with a tender, caressing touch that made Mina's heart ache with a longing never to be satisfied.

"We thank you very kindly, Miss Mina, and I will send you an answer by your auntie this evening. Would you like it, do you think, darling?" raising her daughter's face from her shoulder and smiling to reassure her.

"Mamma! I a—a," and with a pitiful dry sob the head went down again.

"Perhaps we would better decline your invitation now, Miss Mina. Helena has so few opportunities to mingle with young people in a social way that at first thought I felt inclined to have her accept; but the time is so short I fear I could not procure her a suitable dress, and possibly the other girls might not be pleased to have the change made. There are several things to be considered, you see."

Mina did not quite understand what the lady meant about the girls, but the dress matter was clear, and she exclaimed: "She may have my dress. I should be glad to give it to her. It is very pretty, and she would look so lovely in it. I have quite set my heart upon it some way, but we will consult Aunt Jane."

There was a peculiar expression on her Aunt Jane's face while Mina related the above conversation. She neither commended nor reproved Mina, but quietly kissed her and said, "I will bring you word this evening. In the meantime I would not mention the matter to any one. I think Helena wept because she feels so deeply mortified with their poverty, and her father's drunken ways."

After Mrs. Holmes had held a confidential conversation with Mina's aunt, she thought favorably of the proposed change, and being assured that the dress was a small matter, considering Mina's fortune, it was accepted also.

To their credit be it said, most of the young girls who represented the states received Helena quite graciously into their ranks. If one or two, envious of her grace and beauty, whispered sneeringly, "Drunkard's daughter," she did not hear it, and finding things so delightful, looked happy indeed.

Some strangers chanced to be stopping in the village, and in the afternoon were standing near the seats occupied by the "Union Ladies." These strangers were discussing the looks and manners of the "states" with a young man of the village.

Said one of them, "I believe I never saw so many really pretty faces grouped together before. Your 'Goddess of Liberty' is 'tall, and divinely fair,' but to my taste New York carries the palm; such purity of complexion, sweetness of expression, with such a charming absence of self-consciousness one rarely sees. Her name ought to be Margaret, for she reminds one of a pearl. What is her name?"

"That is—why that's old Holmes' girl, true as the world! I didn't know her at first," replied the young man.

"I should suppose he would be as proud as a prince of his daughter," returned the older man.

"Humph! I don't suppose he ever took enough notice of her to know whether she was pretty or not. His nose is in a glass too often for his own good. He's a low-down old sot. She has a splendid mother, though."

Just then a shabbily-dressed man shuffled by, and turned his bleared eyes full on the speaker as he passed. The young fellow gave a contemptuous shrug, and continued: "Well, I don't care much, anyway. He's heard the truth about himself for once. That was old Holmes, as we young folks call him, but I don't really suppose he's over forty now."

"Old Holmes" had indeed heard every word, and, for a wonder, being almost sober, the contemptuous tone and insulting epithet pierced him like an arrow. He, too, had noticed for almost the first time, his young daughter's beauty, and such a sense of his unworthiness and degradation came over him that he felt like being alone and at home. Finding his wife and children gone he passed through the living-room to a bed-room and lay down, while his thoughts were of his own gradual decline from respectability, a fair practice for a young lawyer, to a "low-down sot." The phrase kept turning itself over and over in his mind, and even rankled him in the uneasy slumber into which he finally fell.

When he awoke late in the afternoon he could hear his patient wife soothing Charley whom a kind neighbor had taken out in an easy carriage, and who had returned weary and fretful, then talking pleasantly to the other children about the celebration. Finally he heard Helena's sweet voice exclaiming: "Oh, mother dearest, I've had one happy day! Wasn't it all lovely, and weren't the girls all nice to me? I almost forgot about father, and everything that makes life so dreary to you and so sad to the rest of us."

Opening the door of the bed-room she came dancing in, but stopped suddenly as she saw her father on the bed. "Are you sick, father?" she asked kindly, all the joyousness gone from voice and manner in a moment.

"Yes," replied her father, a sudden wave of contrition sweeping across his mind, "sick of living. Lena, you'd all be better off if I were out of the way. I see it all as I never did before. I'm going to make one more effort to quit drinking—a desperate effort, and if I fail I'll slip out of life; better suicide than this way of living, a disgrace to you all."

Lena's arms were around his neck in a moment, and her kisses on his cheek. When had she kissed him before? "O papa, you will succeed. I am sure you will, for we'll all help you and if you do, shall we ever forget this happy, happy day?"

Kind friends rallied around the poor drunkard, when it was seen that he was earnestly trying to conquer his love for strong drink, and he did succeed to the joy of his long-suffering wife and loving, dutiful children. Mina, too, succeeded in her endeavors to conquer her sinful habit, and she and Helena became the warmest of friends.

They are charming young ladies now, and are together so much that their intimate friends call them "the inseparables."

THE DAY WE CELEBRATE.

To-morrow morning we shall every one be wakened—if, indeed, we are permitted to sleep at all to-night—by the booming of cannon, the whiz of fire-crackers and the yells of the small boy. What is the logical connection between Fourth of July and noise is beyond the comprehension of average grown-up folks, but the youngsters evidently firmly believe there is one, and we are not conceited enough to deny their intuitions. Yet we hail it as a sign of promise that Young America is learning that Fourth of July is not "all noise."

Twenty years ago it was said, and to our disgrace, truthfully said, that American children knew less of their national history and took less pride in it, than did the children of any other civilized country. This was the more surprising and the less inexcusable because our life as a nation has been so short, and crowded with so many scenes which, skillfully portrayed, would arouse intense interest, and be stamped indelibly on young memories. That this had not been done was not the children's fault.

The Centennial changed all this by setting the entire Nation to study its own history with the aid of most impressive object lessons. One result of this study is seen in a revival of patriotism all over the land: never, we venture to say, was our national holiday celebrated more heartily and more intelligently than it will be to-morrow. This revival is felt with especial force in the public schools, as it ought to be, since these are the training ground of the Nation's future citizens. To this training in patriotism we look as one means of relief from the rule of the boodler and bummer element from which we suffer. If trained to revere our country and her institutions, these school-boys and school-girls as well will appreciate the value of the ballot too highly to neglect to use it when they can, and thus allow unscrupulous politicians to run the government to suit themselves, because honest, intelligent men shun the caucus and the polls for fear of contamination by "dirty politics."

The "flag for every school-house" movement, which the W. C. T. U. has, through Mrs. Moffit, of its department of work for soldiers and sailors, so ably generaled, has done much to help this on; while it may not accomplish all claimed for it, it certainly will aid in impressing the pupils with a sense of the sacredness of the banner which floats above them, sufficiently, we trust, to prevent their using it as the medium of saloon advertisements.

When we were children, this was a favorite conundrum about Fourth of July time: "Why is the emblem of America more lasting than that of France, England, Scotland or Ireland?" The answer was in rhyme:

"The lily must fade and its stalk decay,
The rose from its stem must sever,
The thistle and shamrock will pass away,
But the stars shine on forever."

This may be slightly egotistical, but a little national egotism is refreshing in this age of Anglomania and affected contempt for our own land. Such exhibits of un-American sentiment make us sympathize with the feeling which prompted Benjamin Franklin's famous toast. It was at a court dinner in Paris, where England was toasted as the sun and France as the moon; it was now Franklin's turn, and his toast was: "George Washington, the Joshua who commanded the sun and moon to stand still, and they obeyed him."

In many schools especial methods of inculcating patriotism have been resorted to with marked success. The birthdays of noted Americans are observed as "memorial days," and devoted to the study of the life and character of the one whose memory is thus kept green; prize essays on patriotic themes are doing the work in this direction that prize essays on temperance themes have done for the great reform. For several years Victor F. Lawson, editor of the Chicago Daily News, has annually offered medals to pupils in the schools of this city for essays on American patriotism. Each year the interest in these medal contests increases; this year two hundred and eighty-two medals were awarded to pupils in one hundred and forty-one schools, and it is estimated that not less than twenty thousand children wrote essays competing for these prizes. Such a ransacking of histories as this caused, resulted in literally wearing out the books in many school libraries; they could not have perished in a better cause.

On the evening of June 17, the anniversary of Bunker Hill, the great Auditorium in Chicago was packed clear to the roof, with an audience coming together to join the Junior Order of United American Mechanics in celebrating the achievements of our fathers in that defeat which won for us the respect of the world. The name is unfortunate, as it conveys a false impression; this is no labor organization. in the common acceptation of the term, but one whose fitting motto is "Virtue, Liberty and Patriotism." No one who makes or sells liquor is eligible for membership. The exercises of the evening were all calculated to cultivate patriotism—opening with prayer and consisting of short, sensible addresses on the privileges and duties of American citizens, interspersed with the singing of patriotic songs, they marked a great advance from the old spread-eagle style of celebrating national anniversaries.

A quiet little school-ma'am in the Harrison school is doing more to train good citizens than the politicians can readily undo. The school is named for the redoubtable Carter H. Harrison and is situated in a district where most of the parents work in shops; never were parents more anxious that their children should receive the full benefits of school, or more loyal to a teacher than they are to Miss Greenleaf. The whole school is organized into a "best citizen" brigade, and the teacher keeps ever before the pupils the fact that the mission of the public school is to train for citizenship. Does an obstreperous youngster begin some mischief—"That's not the way a good citizen would do," gently chides Miss Greenleaf, and that settles it.

Mayor Harrison helps on the good work by giving, at the close of every school year, a prize to the pupil who is accounted the "best citizen" scholar. This prize does not go to the boy or girl who has been most regular in attendance, for it often happens that the best citizen has had to stay at home and tend baby while her mother went out washing, nor the one who recites the best lessons. The best citizen is the one who during the year has had the interest of teacher and fellow-pupil most at heart, has best fulfilled the command, "do the duty that lies next thee." This keeping the high ideal of service as the characteristic of good citizenship ever before the minds of these young people is a blessed preparation for the duties of real citizenship. Joined with the temperance teaching obligatory in most states, it will send our future citizens to their duties better prepared for the right discharge of them than they would have been by a long course in theoretical political economy.

That America sadly needs the inculcation of true patriotism and training in a more excellent way of celebrating her birthday goes without saying; the records of to-morrow's drunks, fights resulting therefrom, debaucheries and accidents in general, will convince any one that a reform is needed. Temperance celebrations are doing much to correct the evil, and the right training of the children of to-day will be a potent factor in the redemption of the Fourth of July of the future. In both directions the W. C. T. U. can achieve great results for "God and Home and Native Land," if every individual member at once begins to build over against her own house the wall that shall guard from desecration the next return of the "Day we Celebrate."

THE ARMY CANTEEN SYSTEM.

A captain in the regular army, at a post where the canteen system has had a fair trial, writes to the Kansas City Times, strongly condemning it. The Times says the views expressed are not its own, but they seem to us sensible and truthful. He calls attention to the fact that the officers loudest in praise of the system are at posts in, or near, cities where they can purchase the supplies which a post trader usually keeps, but who wish a place where they can buy tobacco and liquor cheap. The post from which he writes is a hundred miles from a railroad, with no store of any kind near Their trader carried a stock of goods valued at $75,000, such goods as are needed at the post, and his prices were reasonable. We give the rest in his own words:

"But along comes the order from Washington to do away with this large and varied stock of goods, so convenient to both officers and men, and substitute the canteen. And what have we in the canteen? Beer, with a big B, wine, tobacco, pig's feet, sausage, pies and stationery. This in place of the hundreds of articles of drygoods, hardware, groceries, etc., that our trader kept.

"The tendency of the canteen is to relax drills and work so the men can have more time to loaf at the so-called amusement room. If they are drilled as required by orders and regulations, they would be so busy during the day that they would find no time to spend in the government saloon, and at night would be so tired they would be glad to go to bed at nine for a healthy rest and sleep.

"My service extends over twenty years, and most of it has been on the frontier. The happiest and most contented garrisons I have ever been in are those where both officers and men are worked continuously from sun to sun. Part drill and part the necessary fatigue work of the post. It is no kindness to a command to allow them to loaf about a saloon while their post, fences and buildings are going to rack and ruin, and the battalion rapidly losing all skill and knowledge of drill.

"About the only argument for the canteen that I have heard is that it creates a large company fund with which to feed the men. Would it not be better for the morals of the army to increase the ration, say to three pounds of fresh beef every day, and add butter, potatoes and onions? Then the saving on the salt meat would be sufficient for all practical purposes. It seems to me this government is well able to both pay and feed its soldiers, and not depend, as now, on the soldier's weakness to fill his stomach.

"I claim it is an insult to ask an officer or soldier to take charge of a canteen as now conducted. "It is a sad sight to me to see a man who has served his country faithfully for years, still in its uniform and pay, standing behind a bar dealing out death and destruction to his comrades, and himself gradually sinking to their level.

"Bad as the liquor business is in civil life, it is always a cash business, and does not teach men the bad habit of contracting debts. Not so with the government saloon. Here every inducement is held out to the soldier to anticipate his pay. He is encouraged to contract debts, and the canteen officer is expected to sit along side the pay table and rob the men of their pay before they can get outside to settle their honest debts. The laundress and the tailor must wait till the saloon is satisfied; then, if anything is left, they can take their chances of getting their hard earned wages."

OUR NEW FRANCHISE LECTURER.

In view of the fact that Mrs. Mary E. Haggart has recently been appointed one of the lecturers on the staff of the Department of Franchise for the W. C. T. U., it is fitting that we should introduce her to our readers, through this sketch by Florence M. Adkinson.

Mrs. Haggart is a native of Washington county, Pa., and a graduate of the Southwestern Normal College of that state. For some time after her graduation she engaged in teaching, a vocation in which she excelled as a disciplinarian and instructor.

Possessed of strength of character, great mental breadth, scholarly attainments, and executive ability, Mrs. Haggart is capable of good work in many directions, but finds on the platform the opportunity best suited to her powers. Her natural gift for oratory, inherited from her father, an able and influential minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, was early manifested in her essays and original orations while a school-girl. So marked was her ability in this direction that when only fifteen years of age she was urged by the leading anti-slavery agitators in her county to prepare and deliver an address upon the injustice of negro slavery. This invitation she accepted, and her logic and eloquence, enthusiasm and youth delighted her hearers and won for her an enviable local reputation. She addressed a number of anti-slavery meetings in western Pennsylvania, and her friends were anxious to put her prominently before that public as a reformer and lecturer. Her father, however, at that time held very conservative views regarding the proper sphere of woman, and was opposed to his daughter entering upon a public career, and in deference to his wishes the idea was abandoned.

In February, 1867, she married Mr. David Haggart, a homeopathic physician, a gentleman of liberal views and in sympathy with all efforts for the advancement of women. Soon after their marriage Dr. Haggart and wife removed to Danville, Ind., and began house keeping. There being a dearth of recreation, the professors of Danville Academy determined upon a lecture course by home talent. Receiving an intimation that the new doctor's young wife, a very quiet, unassuming home body and an excellent housekeeper, had shown rather marked ability in her school-days, they invited her to deliver the third lecture, which she did, taking the subject, "Woman's True Culture," and surprising her neighbors with her thoughts, logic and oratory. A few weeks later Mrs. Haggart delivered this lecture at a Woman's Suffrage Convention at Indianapolis, and received the highest encomiums from the press. From this she soon became known, and has filled numerous engagements in Indiana and other states, winning an enviable reputation. She has been closely identified with the woman suffrage and temperance movement, and as a logical advocate of those reforms has no superior. Since 1877 she has held the position of chairman of the Woman's Suffrage State Central Committee in Indiana, and has been assiduous in the important but not showy work of committees and conventions. On several occasions Mrs. Haggart has addressed the General Assembly of Indiana and of other states in behalf of the legal and political equality of women. Her plea for woman's enfranchisement is based upon justice and the inherent right of woman as a member of the human race, and as a citizen of the United States. She reasons from premises to conclusions, her addresses, unmarred by trivial anecdote or personalities, are argumentative and convincing. In 1878 Mrs. Haggart established the Woman's Tribune at Indianapolis, a weekly devoted to the interests of women, which she continued about a year. For some time she edited the woman's domain in the Chicago Lever and occasionally contributes to the Woman's Journal. She was one of the originators of the idea of a woman's department in the Indiana State Fair in 1878, and was elected president of the Woman's State Fair Association, holding that position until last year when numerous lecture engagements compelled her to withdraw from this line of work.

Modest and unassuming, wise and prudent, earnest and sympathetic, yet strong and having the courage of her convictions, practical and reliant, undaunted and eloquent, Mrs. Haggart is justly ranked as one of the ablest advocates of woman's enfranchisement. A sincere friend, ever ready to counsel, encourage and aid, she has been no less helpful to women in private life.

A devoted wife (now widow), a model housekeeper, an accomplished home-maker, all the domestic virtues and graces thrive around her hearthstone. Blessed with large, healthy and cultured brain; of strong, magnetic, courageous presence; enviable scholarly attainments; a peer in legal research and reasoning power; imbued with reliant, practical Christian faith, and undaunted in her advocacy of the heaven-born principle for which she is so arduously toiling, Mrs. Haggart reminds us of an oft-tried general who never retreated, never lost a battle. She is "enlisted for the war" for woman's suffrage and temperance, and would prove a most fitting generalissimo for that grand army now half a million strong.

NEED OF RECREATION.

Among mechanics and day laborers of all kinds exists an almost universal desire for some kind of stimulant. Hard, monotonous, grinding toil, day after day, and month after month, does not suit mercurial and nervous temperaments. The soul demands variety, change, a new outlook, and the calling into activity of unused faculties.

Against this change of activity modern inventions have conspired. Think of a man spending his life-time in making the screws of a watch, in guarding a small but important bit of machinery, in blowing glass or in "minding" the broken threads in a loom! Continuous, minute, uninteresting labor dulls the mind and stultifies its faculties.

Yet work is more and more dividing into special departments. Even the Japanese artist spends his whole life in painting a stork or a cherry-tree till he knows nothing but storks or cherry-trees. True, he attains inconceivable dexterity in his domain but at what expense! He knows nothing else.

It is the same with multitudes of laborers. The thoughts of the man who tends the machine that cuts wires into pin lengths are the slaves of his machine. He cannot even polish them or point them or head them or superintend any other of the eleven different processes through which the pin passes before it is ready for use in my lady's chamber.

Competition is so great that the utmost dexterity is required of the workman. To that all other activity is sacrificed so that he may become an expert in one direction.

Against such painful concentration and narrowing down to one minute point the mind rebels. The man does not reason about it; he merely feels when the day's work is over he must have change. He knows where to get it—at the nearest saloon.

Right here is a great work for the philanthropist and Christian. The workman is in no condition to listen to temperance talks or read tracts. His brain surges with stagnant blood; his heart demands brightness, geniality, sociability. These cannot always be had in the narrow tenement that he calls home. The wife knows no better than he how to find or make it.

But the boys know! There are songs and rough witticisms, and maudlin stories, and a little sparring, and the dull ache is forgotten. Take another finger of gin and the dingy saloon becomes a fairy-land, and the other fellows are the genii. There is a letting up from the same narrow round. For a little while the tread-mill is forgotten, and the soul enters another realm, miserable though it must be.

These facts must be fairly looked in the face by the reformer, especially by those who know no such sodden round of uninspiring work. In place of the groggery, innocent and enlivening recreations are needed, certainly wherever men are compelled to work in narrow and confining occupations.

Our Book Table.

The June number completes the first six months of William T. Stead's REVIEW OF REVIEWS. No venture in the literary field has ever so soon and so convincingly proved its right to be as has this. Busy people at once accepted it as a solution of the problem how to profit by the cream of the magazines without reading all of them. No one but an omnivorous reader, who combines the faculty of close and just criticism with thorough knowledge of literature and the needs of busy workers in various literary and philanthropic fields, could do this work, and these characteristics are seldom united in one person. In William Stead they are; herein is one element of the success of his magazine. In it we get the winnowed wheat of English, American, French, German, Spanish, Portuguese, Belgian, Italian and Dutch magazines.

When the plan of the REVIEW was announced, we supposed that this magazine symposium would be its chief feature, but now we prize this, valuable as it is, even less highly than the editorial matter which bears so unmistakably the impress of Mr. Stead's strong thought. The opening pages give us as clear a view of people, and of states as those following do of journals. A few paragraphs bring out the characteristics of the young Kaiser, "King by the Grace of God"—"the young man (who) always halloos as through a speaking trumpet" and who essays to keep the peace of Europe by threatening, "Those who venture to break the peace will learn a lesson which they will not forget for a hundred years." This quotation from his speech concerning German policy in Africa shows the spirit of Caprivi, who may live in history as the man of Bibles and buckshot, as his predecessor, Bismarck, will as the man of blood and iron:

"We must begin by establishing stations in the interior that will serve as a basis of action as well to the missionary as the merchant, while the 'Musket and the Bible,' (die Flinte und die Bible) must here coöperate. Without killing off the slave-dealers we shall never put an end to slavery." Here is France: "Internally France is quiet. Fifteen Russians who were preparing bombs for assassinating the Czar have been arrested, but nothing else has happened. General Boulanger, rather than risk the perils of a return to France has dissolved the Boulanger Committee. The decapitated Boulangerists have endeavored in the Republican-Socialist-Revisionist Alliance to galvanize into life Boulangism without Boulanger; while Paris is discussing the question whether or not it is seemly and decent for the capital of civilization to permit the establishment of bull fights under the shadow of Eiffel Tower." The new labor laws laid before the Reichstag by the German Government are thus epitomized: "They begin with the prohibition of Sunday labor and end with making all breach of contract between masters and workmen punishable by fines which are paid as compensation to the injured party. No children under thirteen are to be employed at all. Between thirteen and fourteen they may work six hours a day, from fourteen to sixteen they may work only ten hours a day. Special provision is made for Sunday labor in certain handicrafts, but even then it must not exceed five hours in length. . . . The working day of women must not exceed eleven hours, with at least an hour off at midday." Among the brightest pen pictures are those of the brides of Henry Stanley and William O'Brien, both of whom make romantic marriages this month.

Large space is given to a loving, appreciative sketch of Cardinal Manning, whose jubilee has just been celebrated. He paints three Cardinal Mannings, the Cardinal as he appears to Protestant statesmen and other men of the world; the Cardinal known to the Catholic world and as known "to me (Stead), a heretic, a Protestant, a Nonconformist." In each light he appears grand and lovable, most grand and lovable when outlined against the walls of Stead's prison.

"Helpers in Council" in the REVIEW is devoted to philanthropy. So rapidly has this department grown that Mr. Stead finds it necessary to establish another magazine which will do for the philanthropies what the REVIEW OF REVIEWS does for magazines. It is called GESTA CHRISTIA, and will be issued, monthly, at the same price, sixpence a number. The summer numbers of the REVIEW are especially prepared for tourists who, when on vacation, wish to keep in touch with the events and ideas of the day. An illustrated supplement with fifty portraits of leading men and women will appear during the summer.

The Watch-Tower.

At the last National, Miss Anna Gordon was requested to prepare the White Ribbon Hymnal and have it ready for Atlanta. How she will find time to do it with all else she is doing is past conception, but that she will is sure, for she always does. That it will be exactly the thing needed is proved by the excellency of "Marching Songs" and "The Y Song Book."

A shrewd old lady remarking upon a distinguished speaker whom she had entertained, put forth this bit of philosophy: "He is a really interesting man when he gets through talking about himself."

The article about the beautiful new W. C. T. U. headquarters at Bay View has caused many inquiries to be made about that famous Northern Michigan summer resort, assembly and summer university. Rev. Drs. Henson and Gunsaulus were there last summer, and pronounced it the most delightful place they had met in all their travels. Miss Willard thinks the assembly second to none, while Dr. Worden, at the head of Presbyterian Sunday-school work, said last season, of the thirty assemblies he had attended the Bay View program was "the most complete, varied, perfect and choice of them all." As many people at this season are deciding where to spend their summer vacation, they may want to know more of the place about which Miss Willard and others have so highly spoken. The Assembly Herald, published by Mr. J. M. Hall, is full of Bay View information and tells how to go there, the expenses, etc. He will gladly send copies on request. His address is Bay View, Emmet county, Mich.

The Amherst (Nova Scotia) Record, devotes a column and a half of its first page to an appreciative sketch of Anna Gordon by one of Canada's Y's. It closes with this tribute to her parents: "To the mother who for so many years has given this daughter to the temperance reform all good people owe a lasting debt of gratitude. It is the testimony of those who know them best that Mr. and Mrs. Gordon, to whom their daughter Anna owes her rare training no less than her rare gifts, are, with God's grace, a sufficient explanation of her remarkable character and beneficent career. In her lives much of the choicest history and spirit of their Christian home."

With all the other good things William Stead is busy about, he is working like a Trojan to secure penny postage between all English-speaking people. This year is the jubilee of the penny post in England, and he makes it the occasion of trying to secure a like boon for the colonies. He has vigorously circulated a National Memorial to Her Majesty praying for the establishment of the penny post throughout the English-speaking world, believing that nothing would tend more than this to strengthen the ties between the Motherland and the "vaster Britains that have arisen beyond seas." These petitions were called in June 21, and contained thousands of the most influential names in Great Britain.

Teachers' receptions tendered by the W. C. T. U. are becoming important factors in temperance instruction work. Rightly managed they do great good by showing teachers that the mothers of their pupils are interested in them and in having temperance taught to their children, and often are made the vehicle of pleasantly conveying suggestions concerning how this work can best be done. The W. C. T. U. of Wyandotte county, Kansas, lately gave such a reception to the county teachers' associations. The program of its toasts is suggestive of the good cheer called out by them:

"A feast of reason and the flow of soul."

Address of Welcome:—"Small cheer and great welcome makes a merry feast."—President W. C. T. U.

The Schools of Kansas:—"A school-house on every hill-top, and not a saloon in the valley."

The Teachers' Aim:

"Let all the ends thou aim'st at,
Be thy Country's, thy God's and Truth's."

Physical Culture in our Public Schools:—"Mens sana in corpore sano."

"Combinations":—

Nor knowest thou what argument
Thy life to thy neighbor's creed hath lent,
All are needed by each one.
Nothing is fair or good alone.

Should Women be Members of School Boards?—

"They talk about a woman's sphere,
As though it had a limit.
There's not a place in earth or heaven,
There's not a task to mankind given,
Without a woman in it."

Our National Educators—Editors and Teachers:—"To influence each day a score of minds for good or evil, for wrong or right, that is responsibility—and it is yours!"

The responses were bright, witty, sensible and suggestive. The occasion will long be remembered with pleasure, and its influence will be felt in the schools.

ON DUTY.

News from the Field.

WESTERN WASHINGTON.

SEVENTH ANNUAL STATE CONVENTION.

This was held in Tacoma, June 3-6, in the First Congregational Church. Mrs. Dr. Fifield, president of the Tacoma union, called the convention to order, which was opened with prayer and reading of the Scriptures by Rev. Mr. Wilding. Mrs. M. B. MacLafferty followed with an address of welcome to the delegates. It was earnest and thoughtful. The address of welcome was responded to by Mrs. M. L. T. Hidden of Vancouver, in the absence of Mrs. C. S. Jackman, who was unavoidably absent. After music rendered by Mrs. Caverly, and a benediction pronounced by Chaplain Stubbs, the convention adjourned until Wednesday morning at nine o'clock.

The church was beautifully decorated with banners, flags and flowers. The air was full of welcome as the delegates took their seats Wednesday morning. The forenoon was spent in the examination of credentials and appointment of committees. Fifty-one regular delegates, besides superintendents of departments, were present. The corresponding secretary had reports of 617 active members. There are thirty-four unions organized, of which twenty-eight sent in reports. Mrs. Stubbs voiced the convention in the noontide hour of prayer. On reassembling in the afternoon the session was opened with prayer by Mrs. C. B. Tibbitts. Mrs. Parkhurst, delegate to the last National convention, presented on behalf of the National convention, for the greatest increase in membership the past year, a beautiful hand-painted white satin banner, inscribed with the National motto, "For God and Home and Native Land." Mrs. Parkhurst made the presentation speech in a very happy manner.

Mrs. Shaffer, the president, then delivered her annual address, which was listened to with much interest. She said she believed in the ballot for women, but hoped no woman would be kept out of the temperance work because she is not a suffragist, as there are twenty-five departments beside the franchise department which are equally important, and in which any woman can feel she is doing good. She said, "We are not a political organization and from the nature of our membership we cannot be, but we are Prohibitionists in principle. The license law, the root from which saloons grow and flourish, must be destroyed, eradicated from our statute books in city, state and nation. In order to accomplish this we must take up the lines of work already inaugurated in our state and with women's persistent prayers, patient perseverance and plucky promptness we must powerfully plead, potently preach, peaceably practice, practically print and plentifully publish until prohibition prevails." In concluding she said, "And now when the year's work is ended what is it worth unless you have saved a soul from death? Jesus came into this world to live, suffer and die that we might have eternal life. When this truth is accepted in the heart the first impulse is to find another to bring into the kingdom, and after this impulse is yielded to, from time to time it is no longer an impulse, but a settled purpose, which becomes a very part of the life, and the life becomes a beacon star guiding the storm-tossed wanderers into the haven of rest in Christ Jesus. This, then, is our mission; ever looking forward to the time and realizing that we are preparing the way for the fulfillment of the prophecy, 'The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and His Christ, and He shall reign forever and ever!'"

After the address, which was warmly applauded, the vice-presidents gave encouraging reports of work in the different counties and districts.

The evening was devoted to soldiers' and sailors' work. Mrs. Moffat, National and local superintendent of that department, gave an address in which she maintained that her department was the proper channel through which the patriotism of our organization should flow. "As a part of our legitimate work," she said, "I have undertaken to inspire a national movement to secure a flag for every school-house in the land? She urged that the raising of these flags would do much to educate the children and make them good citizens; that a nobler, truer, broader patriotism must be stimulated in the hearts of our youth. Patriotism may not again mean gunpowder and cannon balls, but a spirit of self-sacrifice in undertaking the task of better self-government and the preservation of the country from its own vices. We must help to make America a Christian nation." After a spirited chorus of "Rally 'round the flag," Mrs. M. B. Reese spoke on memories of the war, which were enjoyed, as all the earnest talk of this large-hearted woman must ever be.

On Thursday morning Miss H. G. Moore conducted devotional exercises, after which Mrs. F. B. Stacy gave a Bible reading upon the building of Christian character, and spoke in a clear and impressive manner. Reports of superintendents were then submitted, many of them being extremely interesting and encouraging. Arrangements were made by Chaplain Stubbs and Mrs. Kennedy to take delegates to the White Shield Home. Many of the delegates visited the Home at noon, and then partook of a hospitable luncheon. Mrs. St. John, of Kansas, conducted a mothers' meeting at the beginning of the afternoon session. We would like to give in full Mrs. Kennedy's report of the White Shield Home. It was full of sad, truthful words. She told us what it meant to lift up the fallen and rescue the perishing. She said that during the fifteen months of its existence, fifty adults and infants have found a refuge under its protecting roof; seven have been sent to good situations; five returned to home or friends; two have been married; ten have refused to remain.

The evening meeting was largely attended. After devotional exercises and a solo by Mrs. Coveny, Mrs. Parkhurst, delegate from the state of Washington to the National convention, reviewed the year's work, and enlarged upon the present condition of the union. After a piano solo by Mrs. Gates, Miss H. G. Moore, of Ohio, National lecturer, addressed the convention. She spoke earnestly and eloquently. She strongly argued in favor of prohibition and woman's suffrage, and said that reforms in the liquor traffic would be sooner accomplished if woman had recognition and a right to vote.

At the morning session on Friday, a telegram of greeting from Spokane Falls came as follows: "The Spokane County Prohibition Convention greet you as co-workers for prohibition of legalized murder." A telegram of greeting was received from the prohibition convention in session in Whitman county. The telegram was from Ezra 10:4: "Arise, for this matter belongeth unto thee; we also will be with thee; be of good courage, and do it." Next in order being election of officers, the following were chosen: President, Mrs. M. A. Shaffer; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Jennie Hopkins; recording secretary, Mrs. M. L. T. Hidden; assistant recording secretary, Mrs. M. Dobie; treasurer, Mrs. A. E. Saunders; organizer, Mrs. E. S. Moffatt, of Tacoma; delegates at large to the National convention, Mrs. M. B. Reese, Mrs. M. E. Stubbs; alternates, Mrs. Russell, Mrs. Dr. Fifield.

The resolutions were presented by Mrs. Hidden, on behalf of the committee. After a brief preamble the resolutions were read and acted upon one by one. As finally adopted they were as follows:

Resolved, That we give our approval and support to those parties which declare in their platform our principles, viz.: belief in Almighty God as the source of all power in government, sanctity of the Sabbath, prohibition in state and nation, and equal suffrage.

Resolved, That the late decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in regard to original packages, places the prohibition question in the domain of national politics, and helps to hasten the day of final victory.

Resolved, That greatest effort should be made by our unions along all lines of evangelistic work.

Resolved, That we recognize the necessity for education in regard to the work of social purity, and recommend that this department be made a specialty in our union, and that each union contribute toward the support of the White Shield Home.

Resolved, That we recommend to every union in Western Washington work along the lines suggested by Mrs. Moffat, to secure a flag for every school-house.

Resolved, That the juvenile department is one of the most important of our work. We especially call the attention of our women to more general organization of Loyal Temperance Legions and recommend the Young Crusader to our homes for their use.

Resolved, That as a state union we re-affirm our loyalty to the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and pledge ourselves to co-operate, as far as practical, in its varied lines of work.

Resolved, That we wish to emphasize our thanks to the general press, who have kindly aided our work by advertising and publishing.

Resolved, That the hearty thanks of this convention are hereby tendered to the citizens of Tacoma for their hospitality, for the open doors of this, the First Congregational Church, to the committee on decoration, music, to the press for favors conferred, to the Tacoma union for their hearty welcome, and to all others who have contributed to the success of our convention.

Centralia was selected as the place for the next meeting. Mrs. St. John occupied the platform on the closing evening of the convention and spoke generally and squarely for prohibition and against the license system, which she denounced as merely a powerful subterfuge of the enemy. She arraigned business men and church members for their apathy in the elections and for voting to put men in power who would license saloons. The speaker denounced the apathy of the nation as being one of the greatest dangers that threatened its perpetuity and then passed on to note some of the great economic problems.

A chorus was given and the benediction closed the exercises. The convention throughout was characterized by the greatest harmony. MRS. E. R. MCCULLOUGH.

CONNECTICUT.

A MAY GATHERING.

The Tolland county W. C. T. U. held its annual meeting Wednesday, May 14, in the Congregational Church, Vernon Centre. A misty morning was followed by a perfect day, the sun lending his rays to add to the general brightness until the twilight when with the setting sun came a hard shower. The exercises commenced with a consecration meeting led by Mrs. E. A. Moody, whose words gave an uplift to all the after hours of the day. Several of the ladies assisted in this service by prayer or word testimony. At 10:20 Mrs. C. T. Chapman, the president, took the chair. The church was beautifully decorated with flowers and a banner was suspended over the desk conveying silently but eloquently the greeting "Welcome." After the appointment of the committee on credentials Mrs. Chapman introduced the page, Miss Williams, whose kindly service was appreciated all the day. A hearty welcome was extended to the convention by Mrs. Moody, president of Vernon union, to which Mrs. A. M. Bancroft made a fitting response. The minutes of the last convention were read, also report of the treasurer, and reports from the local unions. The county is quite small, containing only six unions and two Y's. These last are very active, and mention has already been made of the Rockville Y in these columns. They sustain a Hope Club, composed of working girls, which is doing grandly. A pleasant variation in the exercises was made by a recitation by Miss Linda L. Kimball, who is one of the most earnest workers in the Ellington union.

Mrs. Forbes, state president, and Mrs. Andrews, state secretary, were introduced, and Mrs. Andrews led the noontide hour of prayer, and then our state president gave a short address, helpful and interesting. The whole company were invited to a bountiful collation, and exchanged pleasant greetings while enjoying the good things provided by the hospitable friends of Vernon Centre.

Promptly at a quarter of two the convention was again called to order after a praise and promise service led by Mrs. O. W. Scott. An address was given by Mrs. Dr. Morgan, of Springfield, Mass., who spoke especially of the need of intelligence in our work, and the necessity of being conversant with temperance statistics and facts relating to historical and scientific temperance. Mrs. A. J. Quick then read a fine paper on the subject of "Scientific Temperance Instruction in Schools," and Mrs. W. T. Hutchins, an interesting one on "Mothers' Meetings." Mrs. R. N. Stanbey, editor of the White Ribbon Banner, spoke earnestly for that paper, and twenty new subscribers gave their names as a result. Several members of the Loyal Temperance Legion then entertained us with a recitation of welcome and a song.

The election of officers resulted in the following: Mrs. C. T. Chapman, president; Miss Mary Kimball, secretary; Mrs. Laura Hall, treasurer.

Mrs. Chapman was introduced and accepted the reëlection in a few well-chosen words. Miss Linda L. Kimball gave a short psycho-physical culture talk, illustrated by charts, which was not only highly interesting but instructive as well.

The question-box was conducted by Mrs. M. M. Andrews in the absence of Mrs. J. H. James, who had been appointed to take charge of it. The convention closed with the hymn, "Blest be the tie that binds," and the benediction.

The union in Middlefield held an open meeting in the Congregational Church, April 28, which was addressed by Mrs. L. B. Forbes, state president. The exercises opened with Mrs. S. Marvin at the organ, and singing by Masters Sammie and Willie Marvin; reading of the Scriptures by Mrs. R. A. Cook, president of the local union, and prayer by Rev. Alpheus Winter.

Mrs. Forbes urged the ladies to work with singleness of purpose for the suppression of the saloon; to be active in all good works; to be adorned at all times with the "little white ribbon," and told of her pride in the union baby, The White Ribbon Banner. The whole tenor of her talk was uplifting. She compared the process of working the Gobelin tapestry with our lines, and that one opportunity lost will show in an endless eternity, and one well used will influence likewise. The magnitude of the work of the W. T. P. A. was mentioned. The meeting closed with singing and benediction by the Rev. L. P. Perry. M. BELLE SMITH, Special Correspondent.

NEW YORK.

FRANKLIN COUNTY CONVENTION.

One of the most enthusiastic and profitable conventions we have ever had was the one held at Burke, May 8. The church had been beautifully decorated with flags and blooming plants, our motto artistically arranged where all eyes could rest upon it, and a sumptuous dinner and tea provided for us in the basement.

Miss Fannie Looker welcomed the convention in a few well-chosen words, Miss Whitney giving the response in a beautiful manner. The reports from local unions and superintendents of departments were very encouraging.

The president, Mrs. Stevens, read an excellent paper comprising a variety of thought. Two essays, the subject of one, "Looking Backward," and of the other, "Looking Forward," recorded the advance along temperance lines since the Crusade and organization of the W. C. T. U., in the one case, and foretold the victories we expect to achieve in the other.

The workers' conference was most helpful, the members giving and receiving suggestions. I would like to recommend this feature to other conventions if they are not in the habit of such a conference. One-half or an hour of time cannot be spent more profitably. It has always been our custom to secure a speaker from a distance for the evening address, but this time we departed from the usual plan and invited several of the pastors of the county to be present and give short addresses. They responded happily with speeches appropriate and to the point. It is extremely gratifying to the ladies to know that the gentlemen are holding less conservative views of "woman's sphere," and can even, as in this case, speak words of commendation of women and their work. A beautiful recitation, entitled "Warden, Keep a Place for Me," was given by the county treasurer.

The convention closed about nine o'clock, all feeling amply repaid for any effort or sacrifice they had made to attend. REC. SEC.

OSWEGO COUNTY CONVENTION.

The Oswego county W. C. T. U. held its semi-annual convention at New Haven, May 16 and 17. In the absence and severe illness of the president, Mrs. Rachel Goodier, the first vice-president, Mrs. B. S. Stone presided. During the session, Mrs. Goodier's written resignation was sent to the convention, which, bowing to the inevitable, was accepted with expressions of sympathy for their stricken leader, and Mrs. Stone was elected to fill the vacancy.

The opening devotional exercises included many precious promises repeated by individual members of the convention. This spontaneous exercise, multiplying pledge upon pledge of God's love and faithfulness to those who aspire to be "laborers and co-workers with Him," was peculiarly impressive and inspiring to those present. The welcome by Mrs. Burhaus, and response by Miss Coit, cheered the workers with brave words, in their "moral warfare with the crime and folly of an evil time," so much harder than a physical conflict, and reminded all that temperance, though an "old, old story," like the story of the Cross, is not, therefore, an outworn cause. The works of the flesh, and the fruits of the spirit were clearly contrasted. Miss Byington's paper on "Narcotics," gave "in a nutshell" appalling facts, sustained by the highest scientific authority, and by incontrovertible statistics as to the physical and mental deterioration which they cause. Would that the W. C. T. U. might place these fearful facts before every boy in the land, so that none might perish through ignorance. Cheering reports of work were given by the local unions. Press work and the distribution of leaflets are made special features. Public meetings are frequent. A degree of success has attended the efforts to enforce the cigarette law. Oswego still retains a police matron. The value of petition work in local affairs has been proved

Mrs. Theodosia Foster (Faye Huntington) gave in the evening an earnest plea for the boys and girls; for their early and thorough training in the fundamentals of temperance. Seven-eighths of reformed men fall, while seven-eighths of those pledged in youth remain loyal. These significant figures should be carried in the mind and heart of every white-ribboner. A Y hour and a Loyal Temperance Legion hour entertained and heartened the convention, for these are the fresh and vigorous "reserves" who are coming on to keep the ranks good, as one after another our "promoted comrades" pass on.

Measures were taken towards completing the organization of the county. The recording secretary, Mrs. Gardenier, gave a point in economics, which cannot be too earnestly impressed upon W. C. T. U. workers. Much time, physical strength, wear on clothing, no small item, and traveling expense, could be saved to our speakers, if care were taken by local unions to make several consecutive appointments in contiguous localities. It is often the case that a speaker travels many miles to give an address, speaks the next night far distant, and in a few days returns to the vicinity of the first address. They could afford lower terms if this waste were avoided.

ONTARIO COUNTY CONVENTION.

This was held at Clifton Springs, May 9, in the Y. M. C. A. rooms, which were decorated with plants from the conservatory and wild wood flowers. Miss Balcom, president of the local union, escorted the delegation on their arrival, to the parlors and hall conveniently located and arranged. The president being absent the meeting was called to order by the vice-president, Mrs. L. S. Bowerman. After singing "Jesus, Lover of my Soul," a consecration meeting was opened with Scripture reading by Rev. Mary S. Knowles. Mrs. Foster led in prayer, followed by others. Mrs. Rowley remarked upon the great need we have of prayer as we continue in the work. Our work was born in prayer, has grown with prayer, and will succeed with prayer. We were welcomed in a most graceful and hearty manner by Miss Balcom. All hearts felt to unite with the words of Mrs. Dr. Pritchard, who kindly responded in behalf of the convention.

The secretary being absent, by motion of Mrs. Foster Miss H. L. Payne was unanimously elected, pro tem. Miss Balcom read a letter of resignation from our beloved president, Mrs. E. M. J. Decker, which was sorrowfully accepted; also a letter of resignation was read from our secretary, Mrs. J. W. Neighbor, who has served so faithfully and efficiently for fourteen years. This was accepted by the convention with many regrets. Reports of the secretary and treasurer were read and adopted. Reports of superintendents of different departments were read, discussions following each. Scientific Instruction report called out some expressions on voting in school districts. This was considered both a privilege and a duty, and as such could be used to create an influence over teachers for temperance instruction in our schools which will result in immeasurable good. Report of superintendent on narcotics contained Mrs. Bullock's letter in regard to the cigarette bill, and aroused the attention of mothers to the dangers threatening their boys. The subject was not passed over lightly, and the president appointed the superintendent to write a letter to our assemblymen urging them to give their immediate attention and influence to the amendment which is needed to make the bill effective to save our boys. The noontide hour of prayer having arrived, a short petition was offered by Mrs. A. H. Wood.

The afternoon session was opened with singing "Rock of Ages," followed by a mothers' meeting. Mrs. A. H. Wood opened the meeting with prayer and Scripture reading. The Loyal Temperance Legion of Clifton Springs, numbering nearly one hundred, was presented by their faithful superintendent, Mrs. Foster. Their exercises consisted of singing and recitations by classes, at the close of which the audience expressed their thanks by the Chautauqua salute, and the band repeated in concert the New York state motto, "All New York for temperance."

Mrs. E. C. Clark read a very interesting report of the work that has been done in Naples during the past winter, to rid the place of its saloons. After adopting appropriate resolutions on the resignation of our president and secretary, also expressing appreciation for the entertainment given by the ladies of Clifton Springs to the convention, it closed with singing the doxology followed by the benediction.

FIFTH DISTRICT DOINGS.

The Boone county W. C. T. U. convention was held May 22, at Poplar Grove. Miss Emma S. Norton, district president, presided, giving the day's session the nature of a conference instead of the usual routine of convention work, thus providing a pleasing variety for the workers. Cordial words of welcome were spoken by the president of the local union to which the district president responded. Informal reports were given of the work done by the various unions in the county, and from none of them was sounded a note of discouragement or failure. The district superintendents of foreign work, literature and young woman's work, read papers urging the claims of their respective departments, and beside these there were four most excellent essays interspersed during the exercises of the day upon the themes, "Drunkenness our Nation's Sin," "The Power of the Pledge," "What we are Doing and Why" and "Our Work."

Afternoon devotions were led by the president of the Belvidere union, and by request she gave an account of her jail and prison work; our hearts were touched by the recital of this ministry of love: "I was sick and in prison and ye visited me." Rev. Montgomery, pastor of the church in which the meeting was held, and Rev. Howard of Harvard were introduced and spoke words of cheer and helpfulness. We are learning to look forward with great anticipation to the "children's hour" at all our gatherings. At four o'clock the troop of little folks marched in and furnished one of the pleasant features of the day with their songs and recitations. They were then addressed by Mrs. Beede, district superintendent of Loyal Temperance Legion work, in a most happy and impressive manner; indeed so much enthusiasm was aroused that as a result Mrs. Beede organized a Loyal Temperance Legion the day following.

The program for the evening consisted of a gold medal contest enlivened with excellent music. There were eight contestants, the winning one being Miss Rose Adams of Capron, though all acquitted themselves creditably.

W.

CHAMPAIGN COUNTY CONVENTION.

This was held in Champaign, May 22 and 23. Eight unions were represented by twenty-five delegates. The afternoon session was devoted to appointing committees and reading of papers. In the evening Mrs. R. A. Emmons, of Chicago, gave an address.

Friday morning was spent in hearing reports from unions and committees, and in electing county officers. All the unions present gave good reports as to membership, attendance and work. Resolutions on evangelistic work, scientific temperance instruction, and of loyalty to the state and National officers, were adopted. There were reported nearly $20 in the treasury after paying expenses. The success of the convention and of the work done in the county is in a great measure due to the untiring efforts of our district president, Mrs. Replogle.

MYRTLE E. SPARKS, Rec. Sec.

JERSEY COUNTY CONVENTION.

This was held in Jerseyville, Friday, May 9, Mrs. W. P. Khul, district president, presiding. The previous evening was devoted to a Demorest contest, in which Miss Bertha Hansell secured the silver medal. This was the second of the three contests held in Jerseyville recently.

On Friday the exercises of the convention were as follows: Reports of local unions, three of which, Grafton, Delhi and Elsah, had been organized within the previous month. Then followed the question drawer, conducted by Mrs. E. M. Orr, address of welcome and response, reports of committees on resolutions and reorganization, the latter resulting in appointment of Mrs. Theo. Dodson, president; Mrs. Isaac Harbert, secretary; and Mrs. Rhoades, treasurer. The last hour of the afternoon session was devoted to the Loyal Temperance Legion, which is well attended and doing a good work under the able superintendence of Mrs. James Barr. The evening was occupied by Mrs. Khul and Mrs. Orr. The former gave us some excellent thoughts upon "Individual Responsibility;" the latter favored us with a stirring address upon "Woman's Suffrage."

OHIO.

JOTTINGS.

May 6 the second annual convention of the second district was held at Kent. Delegates were present from each county in the district. Excellent papers were read. Miss Jennie L. Olmstead gave a talk on mothers' meetings, which helped to swell the audience in the evening, as so many were anxious to hear her beautiful address on "Social Purity." Miss C. S. Burnett took charge of the question box in an instructive manner. Miss Lizzie George, had a grand paper on "Personal Responsibility." Mrs. Ludwick, Campbellsport, discoursed on "You have an Enemy in Your Midst," with telling words right to the point. The welcome by O. W. Holmes, pastor of M. E. Church, was outspoken for the grand cause. The response was given by Dora G. Dickson. A paper on "Suffrage," by Mrs. H. T. Mossgrove, was an earnest appeal for fatherhood as well as motherhood for this nation; a most effective showing of the one-sidedness of this government. Miss Jennie L. Olmstead is the new state superintendent of White Cross and social purity work, and won all hearts in the evening by her address. The beautiful rendering of the solo, "Just as I am," by Miss Clara Warner, was a fitting prelude to the thoughts so tenderly and earnestly uttered by the young and devoted Christian girl as she spoke in kindness and pity of the lost and wayward, and warned the mothers of how to shield them and train them. The kindness of the people of Kent cannot be spoken.

The officers for the coming year are: President, Lucinda M. Davis; corresponding secretary, Mrs. E. L. Sanford; recording secretary, Mrs. Dora G. Dickson; treasurer, Mrs. E. A. Lindsey. The convention was invited to meet at Youngstown next year.

Mahoning county convention was held May 27, at Garfield; and such a meeting! a crowded house in the daytime! Four ministers (gentlemen) all stanch Prohibitionists, and four lady ministers, one in the pure Friends' dress, were present; all but one gave most earnest, helpful words. Mrs. Esther Haldeman, the county president, and inspiration of this meeting, was duly reëlected for the year to come, and so we are at work. At our district meeting we elected Miss C. S. Burnett and Mrs. E. E. Truesdall delegates to the International Convention at Pittsburgh, June 24-27. May God help us all in Ohio to "keep to the front" always in the line of duty till victory comes!

NEWS AND NOTES.

The spring conventions in all our counties, twenty-one in number, have been held, with very marked success in every case. They have been "schools of methods" and have wonderfully developed our workers. I am amazed as I listen to those hitherto silent tongues, which seem loosened to do service for the Master. While a few new unions have been formed since the year opened, the increase has been mainly secured by our effort to double our membership, by each member obtaining one or more. The education which has come to us in these schools has been mainly along department lines. We are learning ourselves what we can do! Hidden mines of influence have been opened up, and latent talent developed. Members amount to but little unless brought into action against our common foe. We need to appreciate the bearings of each department upon the one great object of our organization, viz., the overthrow of the liquor traffic, and not give undue prominence to any one branch, but with our sure foundation stone, Christ and His righteousness, laid deep and wide, build up a magnificent structure of our many-sided work, which, striking telling blows at evil of every kind, will, with God's great blessing, secure the end for which we were called and divinely appointed. The more I study department work, which, under wise and judicious management, is the life of our system, the more I see the beautiful symmetry of the noble work our leaders are doing, and the more I am impressed with the great value of the hearty coöperation they are receiving from every part of the country. Without prompting from state or national influence, every one of our county conventions has passed resolutious indorsing our beloved National President and the action of the National organization.

Death has been busy among our workers, and many of our unions mourn the loss of valued members. This is especially true of the union at Ocean Grove. Within a month three lovely Christian lives have blossomed into glorious immortality. First, Mrs. Ellen C. Brooks, who was last year our state superintendent of evangelistic work, died very suddenly in New York; next, Mrs. Rhoda L. Field, who, since the organization was formed has been most faithful and helpful, and now, Mrs. R. A. Downs, for years our treasurer, "Not lost but gone before."

We are now in the midst of preparations for our midsummer meetings. The first occurs at Ocean Grove, July 5, continuing till the evening of the 7th. Mrs. M. T. Burt, of New York, Mrs. Barney, of Rhode Island, Mrs. Lathrap, of Michigan, General Fisk, and many of our own women will participate in the services. Then will follow, Pitman Grove, Camp Tabor, Malaga camp-meeting, Ocean City, etc. Our summer gatherings are becoming more and more valued in these communities, and sentiment for total abstinence and prohibition is created every year.

MISSOURI.

FOURTH DISTRICT CONVENTION.

This was held in Hopkins May 8 and 9. Miss Lillian Wood, president, in the chair. Mrs. Manly conducted the praise meeting; reports from the different counties were then read, showing good work done in the district. Mrs. Cobb, of Hopkins, gave the address of welcome for the W. C. T. U. and Rev. Frank Lonsdale in behalf of the citizens; the response was given by Mrs. A. H. Kelly.

A children's medal contest was held Friday morning. Miss Wood delivered a delightful annual address. She was unanimously elected president for the coming year. Mrs. Sue Dehaven read a paper on the "Franchise" with great credit to herself A unanimous vote was taken that it be printed in The Crusader. The subject of dress reform was discussed Mrs. Lytle and Mrs. Lonsdale read papers on the same theme, showing their zeal in this much needed improvement. In the evening Mrs. Hoffman spoke to a full house, in spite of the heavy clouds that hung overhead. The delegates were all enthusiastic in the cause for God and humanity.

NEBRASKA.

SIXTH DISTRICT CONVENTION.

The W. C. T. U. held a very successful convention at Stromsburg, May 7-9. Our president, Mrs. Carscadden, was unable to attend on account of the severe illness of herself and husband. Earnest prayers were offered for their speedy recovery. A message of love and sympathy was sent her, by vote of convention. The vice-president, Mrs. Wing, presided, and won all hearts. One year ago there were ten unions in the district; now there are twenty-two. The reports were all very encouraging. A contest was held, on Wednesday evening, and a gold medal was awarded to Miss Eva McCune. The time was all crowded full of matters of general interest. Papers were read by Mrs. Paley, subject, "The Modern Moloch," and by Mrs. Ferguson, on "Temperance Lesson in the Sunday-school."

Thursday evening three young ladies from the Y's gave beautiful recitations; Mrs. C. M. Woodward delivered a lecture that was well received and highly complimented. The singing of Mrs. Butler and Mrs. Shaw was greatly enjoyed. The young ladies and the children are falling into line and materially aiding in the work. Last year five superintendents of departments were appointed. This year, eleven. One hundred and sixteen dollars were raised for amendment work. Great anxiety was manifested as to the result of next November's election. Readers of THE UNION SIGNAL, we pray you, let your hearts be turned toward Nebraska, and let your prayers ascend Heavenward for the success of the prohibitory amendment.

The officers for the ensuing year are as follows: President, Mrs. Lizzie S. Ferguson; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Kate Northup; recording secretary, Mrs. J. L. Johnson; treasurer, Mrs. M. A. Ruther. Our convention closed at noon of the 9th. We believe all in attendance went home with stronger determination to persevere in the work than ever before.

DAWES COUNTY CONVENTION.

This was held at Crawford May 16 and 17. Mrs. C. M. Woodward and Mrs. Abbey Dustin, together with a number of Chadron delegates were present, and contributed to the interesting program. Mrs. Woodward's lecture was the great treat of the occasion. Mrs. Olive M. Leader, the new county president, fulfilled her duties in a most satisfactory manner, showing herself to be the right woman in the right place.

County officers were appointed for the different branches of the work, a general plan of work was adopted, and all questions bearing on the subject were freely discussed. Saturday afternoon the Crawford ladies took the delegates out to ride, showing them the principal points of interest, and at last took them to the depot, from which they departed in high spirits with the white ribbon floating from the car rail.

We consider the convention a decided success, and think it will be the means of more faithful and more efficient work in the great cause.

H. E. B.,
Supt. of Literature.

HOLT COUNTY CONVENTION.

This was held in Ewing, May 13 and 14, the president, Mrs. N. S. Lowrie, in the chair. After devotional exercises the different committees were appointed. Then followed a discussion on scientific instruction. The evening was filled with recitations, music, and a fine lecture by Mrs. Taylor.

Wednesday, plans were proposed for carrying on the good work, followed by a debate in which a number of visitors joined, making it an interesting session.

In the afternoon officers were elected, committees reported, etc. In the evening, Mrs. Woodward gave an able address, strong, clear, convincing. Thus closed a convention that will be an inspiration to go forward.

M. E. VANZANDT.

WORK AT SEWARD.

Our union was organized March 29, 1889. Including officers, we now have forty-five members. Have held four silver medal contests. Have sent delegates to two conventions at Lincoln, to state convention at Norfolk, and to district conventions at York and Stromsburg. Have seven departments of work. There is one temperance paper in the city in which we have edited a column for nearly a year. We pay for twenty-five copies of the paper, to be sent out for the general good.

We had a lunch-room and distributed temperance literature during the county fair; had one oyster-supper. Have some funds in the bank; have been having cottage meetings during the winter, but have secured headquarters in a prominent locality. This is the home of Mrs. C. M. Woodward, who aids us by her presence, advice and sympathy, whenever she is at home. The state convention will be here in September, at which time we hope and expect to have our beloved National president with us, and many more who are interested in the freedom of Nebraska from the thralls of intemperance. We take several copies of THE UNION SIGNAL and our state paper, The Union Worker.

Our county convention was held here, April 22, with a goodly representation from Utica, Tamora and Milford unions. The following resolutions were adopted by the convention:

Resolved, That we will with renewed effort, work for the advancement of every department of W. C. T. U. work, trusting in Him who promised to His followers ultimate success.

Resolved, That the W. C. T. U. of Seward county, seeing with sorrow and shame the growing tendency to Sabbath desecration and immorality of every kind we will use our influence against these vices whenever possible until they cease to exist.

Resolved, That we recommend and use our influence to obtain subscribers for our National and state organs, THE UNION SIGNAL and The Union Worker.

Resolved, That as W. J. Demorest is doing much to further the cause of temperance by the medal contests, we hereby express our appreciation of his efforts and will endeavor to hold as many contests as possible before the coming election of November, 1890.

We appreciate the interest our sisters abroad are taking in our coming struggle, and feel that Nebraska needs the united prayers of all God's people, that victory may perch upon our banners at the coming election.

B. A. BAYLES, Supt. Press Work.

FOREIGN WORK.

The department of foreign work in this state is being well worked. Mrs. Grubb has sent over forty thousand pages of literature free into the hands of those interested in its distribution, and still the cry comes "More, more!" Every one who has given anything to this work may rest assured his money is made to count. We are hopeful and working day and night. The Germans are organized against the amendment, and the tactics of the liquor league in other states are being tried here. The newspapers are being bribed to insert misleading articles and these are translated into German and Swedish. We must meet their statements with facts and figures. Oh, for some German speaker to work among his countrymen personally!

BELLE G. BIGELOW, Supt.

FRANKLIN COUNTY CONVENTION.

This was held in Bloomington, June 4, 1890. The meeting was called to order by the president, Mrs. Nellie Owens, and devotional exercises were conducted by the Rev. Mr. Thomas. Mrs. Loveland was appointed secretary pro tem, in the absence of the secretary, Mrs. Cross. The following unions were represented: Bloomington, Franklin, Riverton, Naponee and Upland.

The reports of the several unions showed them to be in good working condition, and doing all they can in their prescribed lines of work.

Devotional exercises in the afternoon were led by the Rev. Mr. Hadden. The officers for the ensuing year were elected as follows: President, Mrs. Nellie Owens; recording secretary, Mrs. M. R. Cross; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Harrison; treasurer, Mrs. Julia Hunter. The report of the treasurer showed $7.20 in hand.

MINNESOTA.

FOURTEENTH DISTRICT CONVENTION.

The Fisher Band of Hope, the Y. W. C. T. U. and W. C. T. U. organizations took the train for Red Lake Falls, May 12, to attend the fourteenth district convention. The meeting lasted three days and it was one of great interest and real enjoyment. The Band of Hope gave their entertainment, called the "Prohibition Shoe," on Monday evening, together with their military drill. Miss Estey lectured on Tuesday evening, and Professor Dobbyns, of Minneapolis delivered his famous discourse on Wednesday evening, entitled, "The Responsibility of Society." Interesting reports were given during the day sessions.

In the afternoon of the last day, the visiting and resiiding ministers delivered felicitous remarks on the progress of the W. C. T. U. work. The following officers were elected to serve during the ensuing year: President, Mrs. Fanny Ames; vice-president, Mrs. Frederick Meyers; secretary, Mrs. H. B. Herrick; treasurer, Mrs. R. Cowing. The convention voted to send $20 to the Nebraska campaign work. All seemed inspired by enthusiasm, and went to their homes cherishing good hopes for the cause, and good wishes for the generous people of Red Lake Falls.

CALIFORNIA.

CONTRA COSTA COUNTY CONVENTION.

This convened in Antioch May 21-23 with forty delegates present. A spirit of love pervaded throughout all its sessions.

Dr. H. P. Van Kirk, of Oakland, was present with her ever genial smile and timely counsel which were to us all an inspiration. Also Mrs. Nellie B. Eyster with her "Man Wonderful and House Beautiful" for the children.

The first evening's exercises were devoted to consecration, short addresses and prayer whose blessed spirit seemed to follow us through the entire convention. Reports showed that the county had not been idle during the year and the resolutions adopted spoke of aggressive work in the future. Dr. Tracy Cutler, represented the franchise department very clearly, setting forth the need of the ballot in the hands of women. Many excellent papers were read and followed with pleasant discussions, special attention being given to evangelistic work, social purity, Sabbath observance, Sunday-school work, press work, and working women's department.

The last evening was devoted exclusively to the young ladies of the county, who showed by the trend of thought running through their entire program that they were well up to the high standard of temperance work as set forth by the W. C. T. U.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Mrs. L. I. Wills; recording secretary, Mrs. M. B. Lander; corresponding secretary, Miss Loesa Schott; treasurer, Mrs. M. E. Larkey.

WALWORTH COUNTY CONVENTION.

The eighth semi-annual convention of the county W. C. T. U. was held at Spring Prairie, May 21, 22. In spite of rain and mud, each union in the county was represented, and a large audience greeted the speakers each evening. Our state and district presidents, Mrs. Amy K. Morse and Mrs. Vie H. Campbell, were present, and did much to make the convention a success. Mrs. Morse gave an able and eloquent address Thursday evening. Wednesday evening was devoted to the Y's, and a platform talk by Mrs. Eva C. Griffith. The papers upon the different phases of the work were excellent. A parliamentary drill by Mrs. Griffith attracted much interest in a too often neglected part of our work.

Resolutions were passed renewing our allegiance to the National union; disapproving of the law just passed by our legislature in regard to the Bible in the schools; urging the passing by Congress of the two bills then before it regarding interstate commerce; and thanks to the sisters who so happily entertained us. Eleven superintendents were appointed. A new feature was a literature table, where the publications of the W. T. P. A. were exhibited and attracted much attention. Over two hundred papers and leaflets were distributed.

Ten dollars were voted to be sent the Temperance Temple, the same sum to the lumberman's missionary, and five dollars each to the Eau Claire Home, and for district organization work

MARY R. SMITH,
Corresponding Secretary.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

MRS. ANNIE M. PALMER has been spending the month of June in Northern Iowa, in gospel work. She goes home for her vacation early in July.

TWENTY-FIVE promising unions have been organized in Maine this year. The Penobscot county convention met in Dexter, June 17. Mrs. Stevens, state president, is untiring in her labors. Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap has given grand service in the state.

THE fifteenth district of Illinois now has fifty active unions as against seventeen of last year. The membership of the district is quadrupled. Five county conventions have just been held which were attended by one hundred women as delegates. Mrs. Rounds was present at three of these and Mrs. Emmons at two.

THE W. C. T. U. of Nunda, New York, has lost a dear and valued member, Miss F. I. Hammond, who passed away the evening of June 3. The secretary of the union writes: "She was our superintendent of flower mission work, and left us just when the blossoms she loved so well were filling the air with their beauty and fragrance."

APPROPRIATE resolutions were adopted by the Venango W. C. T. U. on the death of Mrs. B. R. Minich, who has served in the capacity of corresponding secretary ever since the formation of the union, nearly five years ago. The society mourns the loss of an active and zealous member and faithful officer, but realized that its loss is "her infinite and eternal gain."

IT is pleasant to record the fact that Dr. Grace Danforth, state superintendent of heredity and hygiene for the Texas W. C. T. U., has been appointed second assistant upon the medical staff of Terrill State Insane Asylum. Gen. Griffith, chairman of the board of directors, said, in asking her appointment: "It is time our people should recognize the fact that our women are capable of something besides washing dishes and sewing on buttons."

A PITIFUL appeal has reached this office from a W. C. T. U. member who is now left a widow with four children, their ages ranging from six to twelve. The father was a drinking man, and the family are left in very destitute circumstances. The mother is not able to support all the little flock, and asks help in securing a good temperance home for two of the boys. Any one whose heart is moved by this case to give help can write to THE UNION SIGNAL office, Room 62.

MISS C. S. BURNETT organized a new Y at Orwell, Ohio, recently, of thirty-two members, with a Loyal Temperance Legion; a union of twenty-two at North Bloomfield; also a new union in Green, of twenty-one members with a strong Loyal Temperance Legion. A large W. C. T. U. was organized May 6th at Lordstown, Ohio. Trumbull county, Ohio, has pledged a hundred dollars for the Temple, and elected Miss Ella Fuller, of Gustavus, superintendent of this work.

A CORRESPONDENT writes as follows: "At New Douglas, Ill., a mother showed her faith in and love for our cause by naming, on her dying bed, her baby after two of its leaders, i. e., Clinton Willard. This was Mrs. Lucy Olive. Another namesake of Miss Willard in this town, is the little daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Kennedy. The W. C. T. U. has lost a worthy member, by the death at New Douglas, of Mrs. E. Redding. Faithful to the end, she desired that in being robed for the grave the white ribbon be surely placed on her. So "being dead they yet speak."

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "The temperance workers of Georgetown, Ky., feel that earnest efforts are needed so near the fountain-head of Bourbon whisky. There is, in our town, a thriving Loyal Temperance Legion, where effectual work is done for the children, and a few faithful men and women labor here with courage and hope. May 21, a temperance entertainment was given under the direction of Prof. J. J. Rucker. It consisted of inspiring temperance quartettes and choruses, exercises by the Legion, addresses by some of the young men of the Georgetown College, and a dialogue, written for the occasion, aiming to bring the responsibility of the sale of whisky in Georgetown upon the Christian voters of the place. The lesson of the evening was emphasized by stirring remarks from Professor Rucker, and it is hoped that the seed-sowing will bear fruit."

BICKLETON, Klickitat county, East Washington, has a live and prosperous union numbering eighteen members. On May 25 a public meeting was held, and ten names were secured for the pledge roll. Ritzville, Adams county, has a newly organized Y. W. C. T. U., which is actively at work in the interests of the good cause. A very pleasant entertainment was recently given in the M. E. Church, which was well filled with an interested audience. The program was a credit to the bright young ladies who carried it out, and whose treasury was increased by fifteen dollars and sixty-five cents profits. Miss I. C. DeVelling came to Walla Walla on her lecture tour in March, and spoke in the Baptist Church in the morning and in the M. E. Church in the evening, also in the United Brethren Church on Saturday evening. The audiences were good at all the services, and Miss DeVelling was much encouraged. At Dixie, a railroad town ten miles from Walla Walla, where Miss DeVelling spoke on Monday, a life membership was secured for the union.

A DEAR invalid of Rushsylvania, Ohio, Mrs. Elvira A. Cameron, desires, through the columns of THE UNION SIGNAL, to express her thanks for a happy surprise from the unions of Zanesfield, Rushsylvania, and West Mansfield, also the Rush Creek Sunday-school, and kind neighbors. The friends came with well-filled baskets, and much pleasure was enjoyed socially, after which a beautiful propelling chair was wheeled to the bedside of the invalid, and Mrs. Josie Bates gave a touching presentation speech. Mrs. Cameron was deeply moved and could only reply in a few words of joy and gratitude for such evidences of affection. A short address followed, by the Rev. Mr. Miller, also from the Rev. Mr. Harriman and wife, Mrs. Miller and Mrs. Day, Mr. Potee and wife. This sufferer of nearly nine years closes her letter of thanks in these words: "The day which to me was a special blessing, was ended with singing, and many fervent, effectual prayers. How such Christian sympathy makes the four walls fade away! Oh, for words to express the gratitude of my heart for such tokens of love!"

THE following report comes from Newport, Ky.: "Thursday, June 5, we observed our annual flower mission day. We assembled promptly at 2 p. m., at the residence of our president, Mrs. Dr. Lewis, where a basket of beautiful flowers, previously prepared, consisting of one hundred and three bouquets, artistically arranged, with the usual Scripture card attached by a knot of white ribbon, awaited our distribution. We were assisted in our work by the Rev. Mr. Nutting of the Congregational Church, Mr. Shield, of Louisville, and the Rev. E. H. Bullock, of London, Ky. The first remembrances were bestowed upon our noble firemen, where we keep a wall pocket filled. Four of the choicest selections were given to the sick. We then visited our own prison. After reading, singing and prayer, we distributed the bouquets. There were eight prisoners in the jail. We then repaired to the Covington jail, where we were courteously received by the officers and cordially welcomed by the prisoners. There were ninety-one poor, forlorn souls confined in the prison, a large majority being moonshiners. We were more than repaid for our labor, when we beheld their eagerness, the pleasure depicted on their countenances, the wistful look that came into their eyes as the flowers brought sweet memories of their mountain home. We lifted our hearts and voices to the Giver of all good in praise to Him for flower mission day, and for our dear sister Jennie Casseday."

EVANGELISTIC DEPARTMENT.

To Superintendents of Evangelistic Work and all Readers of The Union Signal:

The National superintendent is very anxious to be most thorough, and is gathering reports of evangelistic work done this year. A question circular, with blanks for answers, has been sent to each state superintendent, requesting her to order copies sufficient for each local union. From these local returns she will make out a report for her state, and send this summary only to the National superintendent. Local unions not receiving this circular will please write at once to the state superintendent of evangelistic work. A most careful effort is being made to gather a complete list of the names of all women who are preaching the gospel, whether ordained, unordained, or as evangelists and Bible readers. Help from our workers will be gratefully received. Please send to 151 Remsen street, Brooklyn, N. Y., the name, address and denomination of any women thus engaged.

In view of many requests, the recent article in THE UNION SIGNAL upon the "Parable of the Friend at Midnight, or Out of Communion," will be issued in leaflet form for distribution. Those desiring copies can secure them at moderate rates.

One Glimpse.

We quote quite freely from a letter received by H. J. Smith & Co. from one of their agents for G. F. Y.:

"I know I should have written you sooner but I have been so busy since I bought my outfit for canvassing that I have not thought of writing. The first week I spent in getting acquainted with my book.

"I began reading it and could not stop. Can't say whether it was the law of inertia or of attraction that kept me going, but know that the latter was present all through.

"The second week it rained three days, but I got out four afternoons and secured five orders for the cloth and five for the half morocco.

"The third week we cleaned house but still I got a short time two afternoons, less than three hours all together, and secured two more orders, one for the best binding.

"Last week I canvassed steadily four afternoons from two until five and secured eight more orders with a good prospect of getting several more later.

"People everywhere know of Miss Willard and her work and it takes but little effort to interest them in Glimpses."

Note.—This lady earned $30.70 in about twenty-seven hours' actual work.

Coming!

The white ribbon hymnologist, Miss Anna Gordon, is getting ready the new hymn book of the W. C. T. U. It is to be out in time for the convention at Atlanta. Her new book, Marching Songs No. 2, will soon be printed. The plates are all finished. Miss Gordon prepared it, therefore it is wise and bright, sparkling with genuine strength in words and notes, not frothy, not babyish! No. 1 has had a sale of over 130,000 copies. Who can estimate the educational power thereof?

Time Extended.

We have not gained the 15,000 names by July 4th. Many who have interested themselves so kindly to help us will say, "What, then, is our work gone for naught?" No, the new subscriber will get the paper one year, but the picture cannot be sent. Few realize the cost to us in even making a conditional offer like this. Our postage bill alone has been nearly $500, and the time of clerks, printing and stationery besides. But why give up the effort? To-day we have received the original painting from which the reproduction can be made. It is lovely. It is wonderfully life-like; no photograph or steel engraving ever made so caught the delicate, life-like tints. All who see it are charmed with it. It looks like a water-color in that the tints are so life-like.

"The best picture we ever saw of Miss Willard!" That is the verdict of Mrs. Carse, Miss Pugh and Miss West, from whom we will hear more next week.

Now, even if it is August, do lend a hand, you seventy odd thousand people that we have not heard from, and send us one new name with $1, or five new names with $5, before August 1? For the first you will get the picture providing we get up to 100,000 by that date; for the second, the picture handsomely framed under the same proviso. Send in the dollar or the five dollars, and to getting the name if you need to. Could any work be easier? We guarantee you will be with the reward of your effort if the 15,000 new names are gained.

PRESS NOTICES

GLIMPSES OF FIFTY YEARS

It gives the careful reader more than glimpses of a beautiful and pure life devoted to the carrying out of a high ideal. Its pages breathe a remarkable love for humanity, and every movement for the uplifting of humanity has, as is here shown, found in her a cordial friend and active helper. . . . . The style is singularly lucid and straightforward, while abounding in anecdotes relating to nearly everybody who has taken any prominent part in the woman's temperance movement or the Prohibition party. The book cannot but have a large sale, as it is a notable history of a notable woman, abounding in illustrations, and enriched with the many devices of the bookmaker's art.—Boston Globe.

Books written to order are generally not worth reading, but this one is an exception to the rule. Miss Willard is a truly interesting person, she has seen and done a great many things which merit record, and she is so clever with her pen that she is by all odds the best equipped person to write a volume of reminiscences about herself. . . . Some may be inclined to say, after reading her story, that her last state is worse than her first; but we are confident that the ladies of the W. C. T. U., by whose order the volume was written, will not adopt any such conclusion.—The Interior.

Her magnetic touch would put life into anything, and with such a subject in hand she makes the book vital in every line. We cannot keep up with this great little woman in everything, but we can say, God bless her!—Christian Advocate, Nashville, Tenn.

In the book just issued, under this title, the reader is struck by the utter frankness and spontaneity of its author, Miss Willard, whose autobiography it is. She has evidently opened the windows of her soul, not only to get a glimpse of the outside world, but to come into perfect unison with her friends, the White-Ribboners, and let them see into the very penetralia of her life. In this age of conviction such frankness is as unusual as it is facinating. Since the days of Rousseau there has been no such unreserve; yet how unlike Rousseau is this pure life with its magnificent ideals, its lofty aims!—The Woman's Journal.

Miss Willard is no ordinary woman. No part of her life has been ordinary, and fully as we recognize the public importance of this autobiography in its bearing on the reforms to which Miss Willard has devoted her mature life, the story of her childhood, girlhood and early womanhood is by no means the least interesting part of her work. . . . . What a story does that tell of American pioneer life! . . . . The Independent, while it has agreed with Miss Willard as to prohibition, and as to the inadequacy of high license as a cure, has differed with her as to the wisdom of seeking to promote her principles by the formation of a third party. Miss Willard is, however, entitled to her own stage, and to free speech on it. She has at least, in her severe arraignment of the old parties, presented the strongest case for herself and the members of the W. C. T. U. . . . . The versatility and fullness of her powers, her woman's wit and spirit, together with her self-forgetful devotion, have wonderfully carried her through.—Independent, N. Y.

No public character can take the radical position that Frances Willard has taken on the temperance question, setting principle above policy, and conscientiously adhering to it, and resolutely asserting it, without incurring the displeasure and, indeed, enmity of many—even of such as are aiming, at least by indirection, at the same ends toward which this sturdy little woman and her devoted followers have set their faces. These objects, dear to us all, however much we may differ as to methods, make the volume before us, recording, as it does, a large and important phase of the battle with the saloon—that outlay in our American economy—interesting to all. But temperance is not the only, indeed, in a large part of the book, is not at all the theme of presentation. It is the life of a typical, wide-awake, aggressive American woman, Education is, in large part, its major topic of consideration, and the problem discussed is the growing question of female self-help. Miss Willard had made her mark here before she became known as the leader of that wide-spread movement to which she seems to have now consecrated her days. The story is told in the simple, direct way characteristic of the writer, and the pages of the book are embellished with numerous engravings and illustrations.—The Standard.

Her public work has been a gift to the women of the nineteenth century, for she has enlarged their sympathies, widened their outlook, and every field of inquiry or investigation which would be likely to promote their interest has received her quiet and intelligent support; besides this every movement for the uplifting of humanity has found in her a cordial friend and active helper... It is a true story, a home book, written for her great family circle, to be read by those who wish to learn from her experience to lead better and stronger lives. Those who read between the lines of the book cannot fail to see how largely the evolution of the mighty organization which she represents has been the work of its gentle yet magnetic leader, and will admire her superb tact and wonderful administrative talents. They will also find a world of interest in the reminiscences it contains. The beautiful illustrations of the book are entirely the work of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, which has prepared this part of the volume in an unusally original and artistic manner. Altogether, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union may look upon this book as the most creditable witness to the valuable and successful working of the organization...—New Orleans Sun.

Deer Park and Oakland

On the Crest of the Alleghanies,

3,000 Feet Above Tide Water.

Season Opens June 21st, 1890.

These famous mountain resorts, situated at the summit of the Alleghanies and directly upon the main line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, have the advantage of its splendid vestibuled express train service both east and west, and are therefore readily accessible from all parts of the country. All Baltimore and Ohio trains stop at Deer Park and Oakland during the season.

Rates, $60, $75 and $90 a month, according to location.

All communications should be addressed to GEORGE D. DESHIELDS, Manager Baltimore and Ohio Hotels, Cumberland, Md., up to June 10th; after that date, either Deer Park or Oakland, Garrett County, Md.

Praise from Sir Hubert.

A more agreeable journey through diversified and attractive scenery than that which can be made by one of the two daily vestibuled fast trains of the Baltimore & Ohio railroad between Chicago and Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia and New York would be hard to find. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad of to-day is a vastly different institution from that which it was a few years ago. The antiquated locomotives and cars which then constituted its equipment have given place to rolling stock of the latest and best patterns and the through trains, vestibuled from engine to rear sleeper and including dining cars and Pullman cars of the most modern and luxurious character, compare favorably with those of any in the world. The sleeping cars especially built for these trains a few months ago have some admirable improvements. The elegant simplicity of the interior decorations is in marked contrast to the louder ornamentation which not long ago was considered the height of art in such places. The wood is of mahogany with little carved or raised work, but brought down to the highest finish, carefully selected for fine grain and texture and showing highly artistic cabinet work which the eye does not tire of admiring. The improvement in the locomotive equipment is equally remarkable. In order to climb the Alleghanies, from whose heights the passenger enjoys views of sublimity and beauty which he never forgets, heavy grades and numerous curves were necessary in constructing the road and until recently it required the help of extra engines to get a train to the summit. Now when the foot of the mountain is reached, instead of two or more engines being called into service there is attached to the train a single engine weighing 67 tons, having six coupled drivers and cylinders 21x26 inches in size, and this powerful machine takes the heavy train up the long stretches of grades, reaching as high as 118 feet to the mile, at a lively pace. The daylight ride over the mountains, especially in the time of verdure, shows a wonderfully attractive panorama in which grandeur and beauty are constantly mingled, and indeed the entire journey between Washington and Chicago proves the propriety of calling this road "Picturesque B. & O."—Railway Age.

Money-Making Entertainments.

The list is worth your attention, as it comprises all sorts and kinds, and if your union seeks to occasionally make some money by amusing the people you will find here ample material. In many instances the entertainment will result in not only making the coffers heavier but in silencing the scoffers! Why? Because the planning has been not only to amuse but also to arouse thought while being amused, and a new idea that comes to you on the wings of a hearty laugh has a good-natured way of settling down quite at home in its new quarters. Here is the list:

Prohibition Program. Price 10 cents. By Anna A. Gordon. Song recitations and exercises of the brightest and best kind. High license is fired at in a way that tells. A dialogue by Mr. E. J. Wheeler on "Senseys. License," is full of vigor, fun and education!

Gained? The 15,000?

At this writing—June 26—it is impossible to say whether the offer to send out Miss Willard's picture as a reward for getting 15,000 new names will be successful or not. Particulars in full will be given in the issue of July 10. The indications are that the 15,000 names will not be reached. Undoubtedly the very hot weather has prevented many from working. If we have the promise of 10,000 names the picture will be ordered, but not otherwise. Doubtless some will say, "But you promised the picture anyhow." No, only in case the 15,000 new names were promised. We have gone to an expense of over six hundred dollars already in pushing the offer but must withdraw it unless we get the desired results, for it is an impossibility to send out so expensive and elegant a picture as the one we plan, unless we can order at least 15,000 copies. We have never made a more liberal offer than this and had not the least idea but that it would be eagerly accepted. The single responses have been very good, that from the unions has not been so general. We will extend the offer till and make the same offer to individuals that we have to unions, viz.: For the sum of Five Dollars, sent by August 1st, we will allow five subscriptions (new names only) to be sent in any time during the current year, and for this work will agree to send a handsomely framed portrait in oil colors, of Miss Willard, providing 15,000 new names are received by us between May 15 and August 1. Those who have sent in one or more names already can add what is necessary to gain the framed picture.

The time positively cannot be extended beyond date named, as it will take five months to get the picture out. Shall we have a fresh start and success?

DR. WILFORD HALL'S HEALTH PAMPHLET.
SHOULD BE IN THE HANDS OF EVERY FAMILY.

BECAUSE—it acts radically, but gently;
" It does not emaciate before building up;
" It requires less time than other means;
" It succeeds when other treatments fail;
" It is simple, and easy of application;
" It does not require semi-starvation;
" It relieves the person immediately;
" It is incapable of doing injury;
" Its complete cost for a lifetime is only the price of a consultation.

Why Superior to Drug Medication?

BECAUSE—It saves expense:
" It removes risk of careless prescribing;
" It restores the sick to health speedily;
" It saves life when drugs have failed;
" It lengthens life for valuable work;
" It hinders cases of drug poisoning;
" It does not complicate disease;
" It is not nauseous;
" It enables one to do more for those we love;
" It preserves health in those who are well;
" It enables applicants for life insurance to pass medical examinations and become first-class risks, where they otherwise would have failed.

Business people, as well as professional people, who have tested the treatment, are universal in its praise.

For further information regarding this medicineless treatment call upon or send a 2-cent stamp to A. T. BATES, Room 46, 161 La Salle St. Chicago.

Publisher's Dep't.

Discontinued.

The Deutsch Amerikaner will not be published later than July 1st. All unexpired subscriptions will be filled with THE UNION SIGNAL. One simple reason is given. The paper has been published four years at a loss—for "the good of the cause." The English-speaking temperance Germans do not support the paper, and the directors have ordered its discontinuance. We regret the necessity as much as any one possibly can, but the W. T. P. A. has done its full share in the matter.

A Noble Example!

MR. G. C. HALL, Dear Sir:—Your letter received. I read it to our union and urged them to respond favorably, and they voted $10 to be used in that way, in addition to which Mr. Mann has given $5, so I inclose with this an order for $15 for subscriptions to THE UNION SIGNAL for one year. Very truly yours,

MRS. T. R. MANN.

Social Purity Manual,

by Frances E. Willard. This is the first number of a new series of publications named "Superintendent's Series." In its numbers we expect to bring out manuals fitted for the various phases of work as represented in the many departments. This is a notable manual and will be sent in all directions.

Here are some of the suggestions amplified by Miss Willard:

1. That the mothers' meeting be made the leading feature of each local union.

2. That through the influence of these wives and mothers local Boards of Education be induced to arrange for morning talks to boys, ten years old and upward, and as a safeguard against the vile literature that is sure to meet their eyes sometime.

3. That the state should furnish industrial homes, giving the reasons therefor. Dr. Kate Bushnell has a chapter on "How shall I go to Work?" and giving instructions to all workers under the four phases, Educational, Legislative, Evangelistic and Preventive. Mrs. J. H. Kellogg writes on "Mothers' Meetings;" Mrs. Ada H. Kepley on "Purity in Literature and Art," and Miss Maud Remington on "Traveler's Aid," the meeting and protecting young girls, strangers in great cities, or small ones. The price of this invaluable Manual is the same as the Gospel Purity Series, viz.: Price each, 5c; per 10 or more, each, 3c; per 100, $2.50.

Gospel Purity Series No. 4.

Mr. Wm. T. Stead's letter to the National W. C. T. U. Strong, brave words from a man who has a right to be heard on the subjects he here discusses, Hereditary Effects, Legislative Work, and the Establishment of a Brotherly-Sisterly Ideal in their line of Social Purity Work. Ten or more copies, each, 3c; per 100, $2.50.

A White Life For Two.

by Frances E. Willard. A plea that there be only one law of purity binding upon men and women alike, and that woman be allowed to take her place as man's equal in every way. Prices, single copy, 5c; ten or more, each, 3c; per 100, $2.50.

"Her Talisman."

"Be a good girl, come home as soon as you can," are the words and the story of their life in one girl's heart—their power to help her when tempted—graphic picturing of the temptations—the flight back to a mother's protecting arms. All this and much we have not spoken of make this leaflet the very thing to give to girls—girls in all stations of life, but particularly to such as you know to be under no one's love and care. It is an evangel of purity and we greatly desire to have it known by our readers and name a special introduction price. Regular price, each, 3c; per 100, $2. Special introduction price, good till August 1st, only, three copies 5c.

Look It Up.

See what A. Major, 230 William st., N. Y., advertises in our columns. Patronize him and say you saw this notice in THE UNION SIGNAL. Mr. M. is a good Prohibitionist. This good word is given by the publisher as a sort of introduction—hope it will cement friendship. "Help one another" is a good motto.

Started late in 1889 with no population or improvements, the development already made is surprising. Five factories are building, and several companies organized to build others. No booms, but steady, substantial progress. A knitting factory company is organized, the stock to be all owned, and entire business managed by women. It will pay large profits. Those who want homes in a "clean city," where the rumshop, brothel and gambling den are perpetually excluded, should buy soon, as prices are rapidly advancing.

WESLEY called the money received in exchange for drink "blood money."

THE annual meeting of the National German American Prohibition League will convene July 8, at 10 a. m., in room 60, No. 57 Washington street, Chicago, Ill. Members of the League are cordially invited to attend. Papers interested in the cause of prohibition are kindly requested to copy.

CANON WILBERFORCE was to have spoken at a demonstration at Tunbridge Wells, Eng., but he declined to attend, and states that he will not again speak on the platform of the Church of England Temperance Society until it has purged itself of the leaflet issued in favor of the government compensation proposals.

MISS AMY FOWLER, daughter of a noted divine of the Church of England, has left a luxurious home to devote her life to the leper outcasts of Molokai, the island on which Father Damien lived and died. Miss Fowler studied medicine in Paris for several years, and was at Pasteur's Institute. She will have charge of all the leper hospitals, and will introduce new methods of treatment.

GERMANY'S own papers and statistics refute the claim that little drunkenness exists in that beer-loving country. The following is a current item from the German press: "Germany annually spends 430,000,000 marks for its army, but not much less for alcoholic drinks, which cost 406,000,000 marks. Statistics show that the intemperate class furnishes thirty per cent of all the poor, and seventy-five per cent of all the criminals.

DR. MENDEL, a noted nerve specialist of Berlin, in pursuit of the origin of a certain form of nervous disease, has hunted down a form of inebriety, not before recognized. He terms it "coffee inebriety," and says it is rapidly increasing in that country, especially among working women. He has found large numbers of them who consume more than a pound each every week. The effect is manifest in frequent headaches, insomnia, great depression of spirits, trembling of the extremities, irregular action of the heart with all the accompanying distress. These symptoms constantly grow worse and are relieved by increasing quantities of coffee; sometimes the tincture is used. Dyspepsia in aggravated form is usually present, as well as blotches and pimples on the skin. A bruise or slight injury proves the starting point of inflammation, erysipelatous in character. Melancholy and fear of death accompany this form of inebriety in all cases.

Three months old when cured by the use of Steketee's Worm Destroyer.

Read what its mother says:

"The undersigned has a child only three months old. It became sick with pains in its bowels and stomach when scarcely two months old. It cried and whined nearly all the time, and was completely run down in flesh. We gave it everything that we thought would relieve the child, but it grew worse all the time. We made twenty powders from a teaspoonful of Steketee's Worm Destroyer, gave it one powder three times daily. To our astonishment it was relieved of thousands of worms. We have given the child but twenty powders It is entirely cured. I shall always recommend Steketee's Worm Destroyer. MRS. B. BARENDSE,

THE FAMOUS

Shenandoah Valley, Va.

This valley is not only full of historical reminiscences, but is one of the finest agricultural, fruit-growing and dairying countries in the world. Here is THE place for the farmer, the manufacturer, the dairyman and the stock raiser. The hills are full of high-grade iron ore and coal, and the valleys abundantly productive. The climate is a golden mean, pleasant in summer and delightful in winter. The water is abundant in quantity and pure in quality. Lands are cheap, contiguous to market and can be secured by home-seekers on the most favorable terms. Come and look over this region, so favored by nature, while the growing crops and grass demonstrate the fertility of the soil and the genialty of the climate. If you wish to make an investment that you will never think of except with unalloyed pleasure, or to secure a home which will be the delight of yourself and family, don't let this opportunity pass unimproved. A wonderfully fertile country tributary, abundant coal within 60 to 80 miles.

The capital of South Dakota, which in 1888 raised 40,000,000 bushels of wheat and 20,000,000 bushels of corn. A State too, that in 1870 had 6,000 population and to-day has OVER ONE THOUSAND Sunday-schools.

Pierre is to be to South Dakota, what Omaha is to Nebraska, Denver to Colorado, Detroit to Michigan, etc., that is, the commercial and wholesale center.

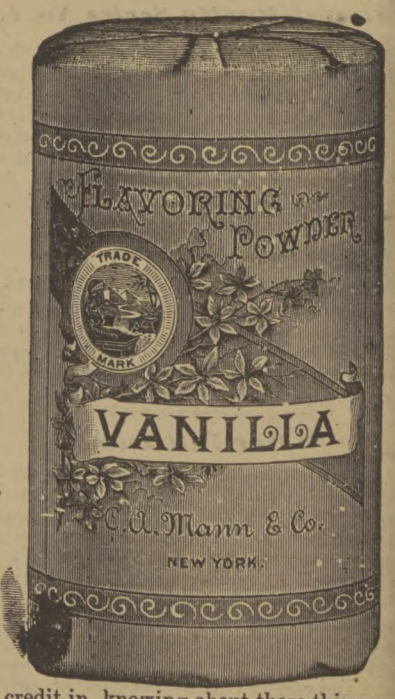
Flavoring Powders.



Winter pleasures have been put away with furs and heavy cloaks. Summer has come, and we have already welcomed her June roses and balmy sunshine. Now our tired nerves may relax for a little. Rest and change become a pleasant duty, for both are necessary for efficient work next season. The city stores have taken on a blaze of color, and gay-looking caps, jackets and sashes are in constant demand for mountain, valley and seashore. Houses seem places to stay away from.

So do ceremonious dinners, or house entertainments of any sort.

Who can pack a dinner for a picnic? It may look simple, but like everything else that is well done, it takes practice, thought and pains. You may be able to paint on china and satin with taste and skill, or to render effectively the most difficult musical compositions, and you deserve credit for it, too,—but can you cut the thinnest of sandwiches, and pack them so they won't get mixed up with the cake? Can you look ahead, and remember that lemonade is much relished at a picnic, and so save the apparently useless empty bottles that are around in the way to put the lemon juice in?

Can you invent new and attractive ways of arranging edibles, so that the conveniences of the home table will not be missed, or even thought of? If you don't feel like taking the trouble, you will have to give place to her who knows about these duties, for it is her time to shine now. Don't think there is no particular credit in knowing about these things. There is. Competence always shows, and is recognized at once; even if nothing happens to be said about it, your skill will be noticed just the same. After all, the trouble in getting up a picnic dinner is not very great compared with the pleasure it gives. There are canned fruits, jellies, pickles and meats of every description, which will save a great amount of labor.

The chance for invention and work comes into the making of fine chopped meat for the sandwiches, and the seasoning, as well as the cake, for a picnic without cake is unheard of, and nobody likes baker's cake as much as a good, home-made article. Not the cheap sort, all spongy and heavy, and covered over with icing, so familiar at "basket picnics," but a rich and generous cake, such as nobody but a born cook can put together, flavored with our Powders. Haven't you tried them? Well, if you can't get them at your grocers, send us 50 cents, and we will mail you a 1-ounce bottle each of Lemon and Vanilla to try. They are good in all cooking where a flavor is necessary. Don't neglect to try them. (Also Powdered Perfumes in satin packets, sent by mail for 30 cents.) Agents wanted.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Governor Nicholls vetoed the Lottery Bill on July 7.

The corner-stone of Colorado's new Capitol building was laid in Denver, July 4.

Senor Canovas del Castillo, the new Premier of Spain, is a strong protectionist.

The French senate last week voted a duty of three francs on corn, and six francs on corn meal.

In Holland, Mich., there was a light frost on the morning of July 3. In the afternoon of the same day the temperature was 102 degrees at Huron, S. D.

P. T. Barnum celebrated his eightieth birthday on July 5, by giving a dinner and reception to his employés and their families, at Sea Side Park, Conn. About 250 guests were present.

Representative Laws has introduced a bill in Congress authorizing the President to appoint a commission of five persons, to make thorough investigation of the social vice in all its phases, and as related to labor and wages, marriage and divorce. The bill provides that the results shall be reported to the President, who shall transmit the report to Congress.

We are obliged to chronicle the defeat of Mr. Caine, but as the licensing bill with its compensation clauses had been dropped in Parliament before the election took place, his defeat can not be considered a victory for the publican. The Tories were also defeated. Mr. Duncan, the successful candidate, is Gladstonian, and Mr. Gladstone, in opposing compensation, fairly committed himself to prohibition.

The National Commission of the Columbian Exposition adjourned to meet Oct. 8. Jackson Park was added to the Lake front, making the Fair site dual and adding five hundred acres to the space. The chivalrous commissioner from Tennessee offered a resolution requesting Congress to compensate the members of the Woman's Board of Managers at the rate of $6 per day, and traveling expenses. It was decided that they were regular members of the Commission, and as such would be paid from its funds.

THE California Knights of Pythias, bringing a car load of vine products with them to the Milwaukee encampment, were much chagrined to find that Major-General Carnahan had ruled all intoxicants out of camp. The General was never braver than in the firm stand he has taken on this occasion. The opposition voices its ignorance by saying: "He wants us to drill in the hot sun and then bring on sunstroke by drinking ice water," yet every physician says that beer and spirit drinkers are the ones who succumb to the heat.

THE National Educational Council just adjourned, appointed a committee on the education of girls. In its report co-education is disposed of in a single sentence, saying that it has been too unanimously accepted to be longer debatable. Evidently it has ceased to be a question, and become a period. Some old teachers remember when it was not a question because it was as yet an exclamation point! These great guides of youth declare that identical education is the real issue of the new decade in school circles. The only real objection can be removed by physical training according to the most enlightened science. Vigorous health rather than great strength should be the object of such exercises. The conclusion reached by the committee is that the sexes should be educated together in all schools of general learning, and that in all essential particulars their education should be identical. The report excited a spirited discussion, finding its most radical supporters among the men.

SENATOR BLAIR'S joint resolution requesting the President to invite an international conference to meet in Washington with a view to the formation of an international alliance for the suppression of slavery and slave-trade, of the traffic in intoxicating liquors, fire-arms and destructive substances with uncivilized peoples, and to promote the establishment of schools of common knowledge and industry among them; also to secure the disarmament of nations and the organization of international courts, was read twice and laid on the table. Can anybody tell why this is the fate of all bills which have the least relation to any great moral principle?

WE are sorry for the individual "with soul so dead" that his patriotism does not rise at sight of the flag and sound of the fire-cracker, on a Fourth of July morning. Of course "there was no sleep after four o'clock" that morning, but if our heroic fathers had slept after four o'clock any morning, there had been no Fourth of July for us. Woe to the land of the free, when the blue blood of her self-knighted aristocrats refuses to mix freely with the rich red of the common people on the nation's birthday. The foreign-born trespasser on our sacred soil drapes the door of his saloon with bunting, and uses flag and fireworks to advertise his unholy trade, and the worst "casualties of the day," so often given as an excuse for not celebrating it, are traceable to that very door, where treason hides behind the national colors. Where saloons can not be closed every day in the year, would it not be truly patriotic to begin a movement for Fourth of July closing in 1891? It would save the brewers' big horses decked with flags, from hauling loads of beer through the streets, while grog-sellers multiply their profits, from the fact that all dealers in honest goods close in respect for the day.

THE world poised its telescope and looked for two new stars in the Western heavens, which it had been prophesied should appear in the great constellation of America on the night of July 4. It was expected that bills admitting Idaho and Wyoming to statehood would receive the executive signature on that day, but the House adjourned on July 3, without reaching the Senate's amendment which gives the national government exclusive control of Yellowstone Park. This delayed the advent of Wyoming. At the last moment it was remembered that the constitution provides for the addition of a star in the flag on the fourth of July succeeding the admission of every state. The senators from Idaho being consulted chose to come in on the third, securing a place on the flag this year, thus furnishing the last link in the chain of states that reaches from ocean to ocean. The little family has increased rapidly of late; practically six members have been added since the fire-crackers went off in 1889. Columbia now wears forty-four stars in her matronly girdle.

YOUNG America travels, making friends everywhere, hence our National fête day is broadly observed, and despite the deplorable fact that we have no navy, our flag is widely known. The phonograph was the Fourth of July orator at Edison's house in London. It reproduced speeches from President Harrison, Mr. Wanamaker, Generals Sherman and Schofield, and closed by playing "Star Spangled Banner," and "Yankee Doodle." The American Art Student's Association in Paris raised over their building the flag sent them by Postmaster General Wanamaker. Gen. Horace Porter was the orator, and Miss Emma Abbott the singer of the occasion. American students in Germany honored the day with feasts and toasts. The "red, white and blue" was nearly as profuse in Canadian cities as in those of the United States. At home flags floated over the Capitol building for the first time when Congress was not in session. It being illegal to run up the flag on its own staff during an adjournment, four flagstaffs at the corners of the building had been erected for the occasion. But the genius of patriotism found highest expression in the West. Two barrels of coal oil, one of red powder and a large supply of rockets were carried to the summit of Pike's Peak, and at dark the immense pyrotechnic display began. Until far into the night the frosty old peak masqueraded as a huge volcano, sending up a column of red fire variegated with rockets of all colors, visible a hundred miles in every direction. A sensation occurred among the 10,000 people assembled in Ottawa, Kansas, caused by the report that a brewer's agent was on the ground with original packages. The exercises were suspended long enough to denounce liquor and beer in every kind of package, and to indorse measures preventing the sale. The soaring eagle sounded no truer note than this from the lips of Professor Wayland at Woodstock, Conn.: "We are in sore danger from Italy and Ireland and Hungary and a horde of foreigners steeped in ignorance, ruled by the priests, wielding the tremendous power of the ballot. Will you help to make laws that shall check this menace?"

THE "original package" string may have been overworked by the press, secular and otherwise, but we shall continue to play upon it while it gives such harmony as this: "In Girard, Kas., on the afternoon of July 5, Mrs. James A. Smith went into the Fordheim Original-Package House and commenced breaking bottles, when the new agent, Gust Steinbach, interfered. She assaulted him with a buggy whip, striking him half a dozen times before he ejected her from the room. He had her arrested. She was fined $1 in the police court, the amount being paid by the by-standers." The Mayor and people of Columbus Junction, Iowa, constituted themselves a high tribunal and closed the original package house of the town on July 3. More arrests for drunkenness had been made in the preceding twenty-four hours than during several years previous. The people, regardless of "opinions," unite in saying they will not support the liquor traffic.

THE name "Temperance Society of the Blue Cross" of Paris has been changed by vote of its membership to "The International Federation of Temperance Societies of the Blue Cross." The result will be, as the circular states, "to give a greater liberty of action and of organization to persons in different countries disposed to work under the Blue Cross banner."

ON July 3 the veteran heroes of the Army of the Potomac, true blue from first to last, held their annual reunion in Portland, Me. Though some are gray-haired and bent, all are "boys" again when they rally around General Sherman. Hannibal Hamlin was greeted with hearty cheers, as were many others who have helped make American history. On the same day at Chattanooga, in sight of three contested fields, the first general reunion of ex-confederate veterans was going on. We believe they were sincerely ex-confederates. Of the thousands of flags displayed not half a dozen were other than the stars and stripes. Among the mottoes were these:

"We wore the gray, but truly say, we honor the flag that floats to-day."

"Backward looking are our thoughts to-day, but in the glorious future of our re-united country live our hopes."

"Union distinct as the billows, yet one as the sea."

"American patriotism is bounded by neither state nor sectional lines."

"The Republic—united, invincible."

"The stars and bars, a sacred emblem; the stars and stripes, a living symbol."

"The Constitution given us by our fathers has no truer defenders than the sons of the South."

This reunion lasted three days, and it was estimated that 35,000 people were in the city. Gen. Wheeler, a Federal veteran, gave the welcome; Gen. John B. Gordon, the response. On Independence day, three thousand veterans were in line, together with three regiments of State Guards, and a number of military companies from other states. Not a Confederate flag was seen along the line. At night, Lookout Mountain and Missionary Ridge blazed with the bonfires of peace. Let us hope that in Northern nor Southern camp no ghost of sectional strife appeared among the spirits of loyalty and comradeship.

ALONE, ALONE.

BY ADAIR WELCKER.

To move with iron will on to the end,
With no applause; against the world's regard;
With enmity and hatred to contend,
Whose icy winds men's onward course retard;
Who fight for truth, find this their sole reward,
'Mid jeer and groan, to dare or die alone,—alone.

For men distrust the truth when first 'tis known,
And he who told the secrets of the sky,
Reading night's sparkling pages one by one,
Spread on the bosom of the heavens on high,
Where stars are words until the night is by—
Was then forsworn, and held the truth alone—alone.

Jeered at and mocked 'till eighteen years were gone,
In rags, a beggar and a madman deemed,
Was he who dared the trackless seas unknown,
Who found new worlds where hell alone had seemed,
When land had faded as a dream is dreamed,
*And then, alone he died, his grave unknown—unknown.

Hated, maligned, despised and spit upon,
A God, Christ yielded up His life for good;
And when the midnight gloom of death sunk down,
His head bent low beneath a blood-stained crown
His tireless mockers still around Him stood
And jeered each groan; till dead, he was alone—alone.

THE STORY OF SILQUAIAN.

BY C. C.

Evening and the newspaper had come, and I was turning the pages idly, reading here and there as fancy dictated. But the pleasant thoughts died out as my eyes fell upon the title, "Another Good Indian." The paragraph said:

"Last night the Indians had a great 'fire water' celebration near Deep Creek. They made the night howl with their jollification and even frightened each other. While the fun was going on, a good-for-nothing old woman died. It's a pity that more did not follow her to the happy hunting ground, for only there is the Indian good."

That is what it said. I re-read it to make sure that I was not having a bad dream, but no, it was all there, every word of it.

"Good-for-nothing old woman." There seemed to stand before me a form, bent with work and trouble, while sad eyes pleaded that she might be cleared from this title. And so I tell her story, both for its own sake, and as a type of the Indian's treatment at the hands of our nation.

Before white faces had seen the western side of the Rockies, a little girl came into the tent of a chief. The night was weird and out of tune. Winter lay upon the ground and kept the hunter from the chase, and the very air was dark with silence. No sound of wild beast was heard, but in a distant tree, sharper and more ominous for the stillness, came the hooting of an owl. To the Indian mind there could have been no omen so unfortunate; the soothsayers shook their heads sadly and filed out of the wigwam. Thus it was that Silquaian came into the world.

Five winters go by and on the anniversary of Silquaian's birth a great wind storm swept through the country, tearing and wrecking everything which hindered its course. A broad avenue through the unbroken forest marked its way, but no lives were lost. Yet the wind brought deeper calamity. There is a superstition among the natives that a "sweat-house" is sacred, and any harm that may come to it foretells great trouble. There was no way of appeasing the evil spirits, and when Epwawa, Silquaian's father, found a great pine tree lying across his sweat-house, he could only stand back in stoical silence and let the disaster come; but Silquaian, all unconscious of the future, enjoyed all the happiness of childhood.

Still other years went on, and across the mountains from the northeast, the first fruits of civilization came. It was the Hudson Bay Company with its adventurers and pack trains. The Indians had heard of them from eastern tribes, yet they could not but look with surprise upon the bold, reckless men who first introduced them to the white man's ways.

Eastern Washington was a good trading country, and by use of gold and ponies these men made their paths smooth. They even went so far as to attempt flattery upon Indian minds. Strange as it may seem, they were successful. The white men had especial charms for the girls, while the braves regarded the thieves of their sweethearts with secret hatred. They would have enjoyed a speedy settlement, but the old chiefs counseled peace and they submitted.

Among the Hudson Bay men was a Dr. Jackson, one of those men, "too good to be bad, and too bad to be good," yet, a person of some good qualities as later circumstances revealed. Epwawa was highly pleased with the manner in which the doctor treated him, and Silquaian—well, she was like many another girl. A hundred horses was the price set as her value.

The business-like courtship was closed with a great feast in the central tent, which was the headquarters of their winter camp. Even in those early days the braves were happy with "spirit water," and lost a little of their bitterness against the white face. Dr. Jackson viewed his new surroundings with a peculiar smile. Perhaps a far-off eastern home came to his mind, where a mother waited for her only son, but he furnished the tobacco for the pipe that was passed around, and turned his thoughts to the gain he had made for the company by his transaction.

Silquaian was highly pleased, when, a few days after the feast, he took her to live in a little log cabin that he had built. During the immediate years that followed she was happy, and so was he—in a way. Dr. Jackson's good qualities were shown in his uniformly good treatment of his wife. All his knowledge of housework and a part of his books were transferred to Silquaian. She was a bright, active woman, and her great devotion for her husband made her an apt scholar.

I can almost see them, as five years after their marriage, they gathered around the open fire-place on Silquaian's twenty-fifth birthday. Four children are playing on a great bear skin in front of the fire, and were it not for the dark-faced woman watching them, a better specimen of a pioneer home could not be found than this little room and its six occupants. There is happiness and great content in Silquaian's face, and the owl may hoot unheeded for all that she would think of danger. Dr. Jackson's face has lost its easy, shrewd look and there lurks in it discontented, hard lines. Why?

Back at Fort Hall is heard the rumble of the emigrant wagons,—the second and permanent step in the civilization of the West. The missionaries and sturdy pioneers are on their way to snatch the land from the slavery of the Fur Company. As the days go on Silquaian watches her husband with wonder and asks herself why he is so often absent? One day the horse came back with his saddle on, but where was the rider?

Reader, we will follow him as he rides toward the Columbia river a hundred miles away. He reaches a steamboat landing, dismounts and takes the bridle off his horse. The captain watched him and said: "Pity to let such a fine horse go when you might sell him, but I understand."

"Yes," rejoined the Doctor, "mum, that's the word." At San Francisco, a telegram—for the Union Pacific, that wonder of the time, had just been finished—is sent to the New York home, and the waiting mother hastens to make ready a suitable welcome for her son. To admiring friends he tells of the greatness of the West and of the wild adventures he has passed through, but adds, "that all in all, the East is best." It is for us, not those friends of his, to know the why of that remark, and I hardly need to go into details over a second home that became his, or tell you that a certain chapter of his western experience had slipped from his memory.

But what of Silquaian? "Can he be hurt? Or who hated my dear husband so much as to kill him?" she moaned in tearless grief, then prepared for a search. Months were counted, and still no clue. Then with despair, and a hope stronger than life, Silquaian said, "He still lives, and I will find him." The farm was sold, and she went to Oregon with her children.

Myron Wilber and family were among the first of those missionaries who had heeded the call for help made by the Flat-head Indians. You remember they sent delegates from Northern Montana to St. Louis in the days when that place was a mere trading post. They brought with them the self-sacrifice and zeal that characterized the pioneer missionaries and their work had told mightily for the "shining Jesus way." It must have been the Father's hand that brought Silquaian to them, and they ministered to her as only Christian love can minister. The old, new story had saved another soul from the despair and hardness that was creeping over it. The ceaseless grief was softened by the One who was a man of sorrow and despised and rejected of men. She still felt that her husband lived, but said, "If the Father wills, I will see him again here, but if not I will be patient until we are over there."

Her cup of sorrow was not yet full; the daughter, who had always looked at her with the father's eyes, closed them in a beautiful sleep. Oh, broken, weary mother, you must needs cling with all your strength to the Comforter's hand now. May He help you to understand that His hand has been laid upon you with the benediction that finally gives strength and peace.

Silquaian cannot bear the place so full of bitter-sweet recollections, and goes back to live near her old home. A city of a day, one of those Western wonders, has planted itself on the banks of a surging water-fall. Here she came and went, washing and ironing for the happy white women.

It would seem as if this woman had borne her share of grief. One cannot look upon the usual results caused by combining savagery with the worst elements of civilization, without a cry of pain.

As long as there are Indians who call for whisky, so long will there be white men who will put it where the red slave can get it. The Indian, and especially the half breed, possesses a desire for liquor that is little short of insanity. They will risk anything to get it, and once drunk, will act the very demons of revenge and hatred. It was in one of his wild sprees that Silquaian's youngest son threw himself into the river, and never appeared again below the white mist of the lower fall. Silquaian did not say anything about it, but she watched her other boys with all a mother's anxiety and tried in every way to keep them out of trouble. It was no use helping them, for within a year after the youngest boy was drowned, the eldest had set a price on his own head for murder.

Zachariah Brown, the sheriff, one of those uneducated, self-conceited men, who stand ready for a finger in the public treasury, boasted of his ability to catch the Indian, and he did succeed in bringing him to the home of one of the missionaries, to get some interpreting done, when John raised his gun, and all that was seen of the brave sheriff was a flying necktie and a pair of long legs as he disappeared up a staircase, leaving a woman and some children to confront the murderer. A sardonic smile crossed his face, and with an oath he went out into the darkness. Later he was shot while resisting another sheriff.

If the remaining son would only do better, but, no, the same curse follows him. Wild with drink, he makes the settlers of the isolated districts tremble as he rides by. It was only a little while ago that Silquaian told me what a good boy he really was and how kind he could be, but added: "I can't do anything for him as long as he can get whisky. Oh, why don't the good white people see that he cannot get it? Can't you save him?" And must we tell her "no"; we who boast of our care of the oppressed and downtrodden?

Silquaian's troubles were slowly wearing her out, her chatter getting foolish and her hands slow, but kind friends are doing what they can to help her.

And now I seem to see her as she is dying. The face lights up, the eyes burn with a brightness of new vision; and she says, "I am going to meet him and my Jesus." Then all is silent, and the flickering firelight shows a face that many a white person might like to wear in his last rest, it is so full of the calm and peace that only suffering and fire can bring.

Ah, newspaper, you were in a hurry that day, and you did not know all the facts, for you would not have said such hard words intentionally. And so I think it must be with our nation. It is busy making as great a record as possible for the last days of the nineteenth century, and it does not feel like looking into the facts; the Indian question is so small compared with the other things that are agitating the thoughts of men and, therefore, can be overlooked. But, I beg of you, stop and learn, so that when history shall be read centuries hence, the broader, nobler life then may not say that our treatment of the Indian was the black mark that the last decade of the nineteenth century could have but did not wipe out.

UNRESTRICTED DISCUSSION OF THE TRUTH, AND A PLACE TO BE HEARD.

BY REV. E. G. UPDIKE.

There is, to-day, a wonderful fertility of projects for the salvation of the world. This is the most ethical of all the ages. It is emphatically an age of reforms. Recently, in a southern city, electric cars were introduced. The colored people looked on in blank amazement as they saw them move through the street with invisible motive power. Finally, one of the most philosophical among them exclaimed, "It is de white man of de Norf, dat do dis. Twenty-five years ago he come down here and free de niggers, and now he come and free de mules."

This is the age of cranks, and yet, as some one has tersely put it, the greatest crank is the man who does not believe in cranks. There is, perhaps, danger in unrestricted criticism. Criticism of this kind is the seasoned timber out of which cynicism is made. The pessimist is the man who wears his coat wrong side out, especially if the lining happens to be shabby. The world is growing better about as fast as one can reasonably expect, and no one who hopes to assist it can do anything by croaking. There is an optimism, however, quite as dangerous as pessimism. The one is as senseless as the other is faithless. It expresses itself in the proverb, "God takes care of the children, the fools and the United States." It bounds the Republic on the east by the beginning of time, on the north by the aurora borealis, on the west by the setting sun, and on the south by the Day of Judgment."

Wendell Phillips was not tinctured with this kind of optimism, for sometimes in the great anti-slavery agitation he grew stern, and was accustomed to say, not "God bless the commonwealth," but "God damn the commonwealth!" and he spoke in moral earnestness simply as a Hebrew prophet might have spoken.

We all have ground for pride in that we are American. Dr. Lyman Abbott says it means much or little to be American. In "Pinafore" you hear the chorus sing:

"It is greatly to his credit,
For he himself has said it,
He is an Englishman."

You laugh when you come out, and you say,

"It is greatly to our credit,
For we ourselves have said it,
We are American."

What does it mean to be American? Washington, the first in the hearts of his countrymen, was an American; Benedict Arnold was also an American; John Adams, the statesman, was an American; Aaron Burr, the Satan of American history, was a typical American politician; Lincoln, with charity for all, American; Jefferson Davis, with chains for every man of color, American; Valley Forge, American; Andersonville, also American. The church, the school, the college, the home, American; the brothel, the gambling den, the saloon, American. If we are to be optimistic, let us see things as they are. Not every man is qualified to remedy our social disorders. Mark Twain's ship captain sometimes practiced for the benefit of the passengers. He had his medicines all numbered. He wished one day to give a sick man number seven. He found himself out of that remedy, so he took number four and three, which make seven, gave them to the sick man, and killed him. No man himself not renovated, can hope to renovate society.

A governor of Wisconsin tells the story that once the friends of Lincoln and Douglas had a controversy as to the length of the legs of the respective statesmen. The friends of Lincoln claimed that the legs of Douglas were too short, and the friends of Douglas that the legs of Lincoln were too long. They came finally to Lincoln for his decision. He said he had never given the matter profound consideration, but it seemed to him "to be of importance for a man's legs to be long enough to reach the ground." Lincoln was a man whose head was above the clouds, but he had practical, plain common sense, and he always walked on the ground. We have some profound social problems to solve, and nothing but sanctified common sense will do. There will be no special revelation made to anybody.

Men say, "Preach the gospel, and these problems will solve themselves." Nothing will solve itself. The gospel was preached, and out of the very aristocracy that owned slaves great churches were built. Not till a definite, specific gospel of "Slavery as the sum of all villainies" was preached did the problem secure a solution. And so to-day there is a demand for unrestricted discussion of the truth and a place to be heard. No man, no church, no political party should be afraid of the truth. Something is the matter when this is the case.

We want concert of action, but more than that we want the truth. All the men in the world cannot make a statue laugh or speak; cannot make one drop of blood, any more than one man can. But give one man the truth, and a place to utter it, and something will happen. Such a presence must be felt. The familiar experiment of the hydrostatic paradox, in which a capillary column of water balances the ocean, is an illustration of the relation of such a man to the whole family of men.

We do not seem to be able to appreciate truth till the man who advocates it has been dead long enough to have his bones turned to dust. We are building monuments to-day for the Abolitionists. Fifty years ago we were twisting ropes to hang them. A saint has been defined as "a man of convictions who has been dead one hundred years, cannonaded while he lived, canonized now."

We think more of consistency than we do of the truth, and so we stand where we are and say "No," when the truth, full-orbed and heaven-inspired, knocks for admission. I am inclined to think with Emerson that "Consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds. With consistency a great soul has simply nothing to do." Speak what you think now in hard words. To-morrow, speak what to-morrow thinks in hard words again, though it contradict everything you said to-day. The voyage of the best ship is the zigzag line of a hundred tacks. See the line from a sufficient distance and it straightens itself to the average tendency. So it will be with every earnest searcher for truth. All genuine action will explain itself. Paul said, "I have kept the faith." How did he keep it? By believing at the end just what he did at the beginning? He kept it just as the majestic oak has kept the acorn from which it started; just as the old man has kept the baby body with which he started. There is a vital relation between the first and the last, an unimpaired identity, and yet continuity and growth. Duty can never be stereotyped. It is the application of principles that never change to circumstances that are constantly changing.

"New occasions teach new duties,
Time makes ancient good uncouth."

We are afraid we shall not be orthodox, and we say, "I will not hear the other side." We are partisan. All truth has to run the gauntlet of our creeds, and what a pelting it gets. If the devil can only get over into the political arena, there is a general cry for the church, press and the pulpit to keep hands off. "The great end of all political action is to secure morality as the basis of legislation," and yet practically the church is ruled out from the whole political discussion. Party is everything, truth is of minor consideration.

Orthodoxy should be the consensus of the best thought of the age. It is sometimes conservatism gone to seed. Two politicians were discussing the value of their respective parties. One said to the other, "Well, what does your party mean, anyhow?" "It means God, liberty, Hail Columbia, and Yankee Doodle." "It once meant that," said the other, "but so much has been dropped out that now nothing is left but the doodle."

A wounded soldier in the late war had lost his reason. Subsequently the skull was lifted and the brain relieved of its pressure. The man opened his eyes and instantly said, "We were at Manassas yesterday; where are we to-day?" I would like to see a discussion on the great issues of the hour so thorough that it would not only lift the skull, but enlarge the diameter of the brain of the average American citizen, so that he would open his eyes and say, "Yesterday we were at Appomattox; where are we to-day?" "Yesterday we settled the question of slavery; what new problems are we solving now?"

I will let no man go beyond me in appreciation of the value of the secular press, but I wish to say that seldom does a great moral issue get a fair hearing in the secular, partisan, political newspaper, and the man who reads but one such paper has no comprehensive grasp of the situation. These papers are not published in the interests of philanthropy, but to make money, and yet the editor assumes the right to have the first and last word on everything that has a political bearing. Preachers must keep hands off. Whose meat do these Cæsars eat that they assume such prerogatives? I would like to suggest to the next man who has $5,000,000 to give away, what to do with it. I would not found a college, nor establish a library or art museum. I would not give it to the missionary cause or to the worn out preachers. I would establish a great daily journal, with sufficient endowment to float it through any emergency. I would make it independent, and fearless and clean and strong. I would put at the head of every department a master and a specialist. I would make it so fair and thorough that it would command the respect of the best thought of the land. I would make it the platform on which every social and political question would get the most candid and complete representation. Such a paper would not be an experiment, but might be made the greatest educator of public sentiment in the country.

The truth in some way must get a hearing. Whatever else we miss this one thing we must have. Neither orthodoxy, nor consistency nor denominational or political partisanship must stand in the way of such attainment. Direction, not distance, is the thing that should most concern us. Head the people in the right direction by free and fearless discussion and you may be sure they will get there at last.

INTERNATIONAL TEMPERANCE STUDIES.

Author of "Physical Education," "The Poison Problem," etc.

VI. SCANDINAVIA.

The rum-seller's argument that only inferior races are apt to be injured by the effects of the alcohol habit is strikingly refuted by the history of the Scandinavian nations. A thousand years ago the natives of Sweden, Norway and Denmark, and of their far-spread colonies, had no equal among the nations of Christian Europe, either from a physical or an intellectual point of view. They had effected the capture of nearly every desirable seaport in the Northern Ocean, their buccaneers had gained a foothold in France, in the British Islands, on the south shores of the Baltic, in Italy, and even in the Grecian archipelago. The rulers of the Byzanthine Empire trusted their personal safety to a body-guard of Northland mercenaries, the Varingians, who, by sheer strength of iron-gloved fists, repeatedly protected their patrons against the rage of rebellious millions of their own subjects. Northland sailors were the first to discover the islands of the Arctic Ocean, and reached the coasts of the North American Continent several centuries before the birth of Columbus. That the intellectual faculties of those dauntless adventurers were not inferior to those of their most civilized contemporaries of Christian Europe is proved by the rapid development of Norman poetry and literature.

About the end of the Thirty Years War the martial prowess of the Protestant Swedes had made them the arbiters of Europe, and might have lifted them to the summit of political power and national prosperity, but about that time the brandy-vice, spreading gradually from the seaport towns to the villages of the interior, began to assume the form of a national epidemic, and soon sapped the vigor of the bravest and stoutest race on earth.

In the army, actual drunkenness was kept down by the Spartan discipline of Gustavus Adolphus, but in the rural districts and among the working population of the larger cities a veritable alcohol plague perverted the habits of a naturally frugal and industrious nation, and the intemperance of the privileged classes soon became a scandal, even among their bibulous neighbors of Northern Europe.

"Proceedings were interrupted by the incapacitation of His Excellency, the Swedish Plenipotentiary;" "Negotiations had again to be adjourned on account of the intoxication of the Swedish representatives," are frequently repeated memoranda in the records of the Treaty of Westphalia. The excesses of Swedish soldiers prejudiced many of their former allies, and the shipmasters of the Baltic seaports discriminated against Swedish sailors in much the same way as British landlords discourage the application of Irish laborers, "No drunkards need apply."

In Sweden itself a similar fastidiousness of work-masters would have brought commerce and industry to a total standstill. Drunkenness, among the adult males of the kingdom became the rule and abstinence the rare exceptions; breweries and distilleries multiplied till their taxes became a principal item of national revenue, and at the beginning of the present century the evil had assumed proportions which at last opened the eyes of the nation to the real significance of the alcohol habit, and found expression in that memorable report of a "Committee of Inquiry" appointed by the National Diet of Sweden.

"The researches of the philosopher and the honest feelings of the workingman," says the memorial of that commission, "have led them to the same conclusion, viz.: that the comfort of the Swedish people, even their existence as an enlightened and industrious people, is at stake, unless means can be found to check the evil of intemperance. A cry of agony, as it were, has burst forth from the hearts of the people, and an appeal and prayer made to all having influence in the fate of the country, for deliverance from a scourge which previous legislators have planted and nourished."

That pathetic appeal was followed by mass-meetings throughout the reclaimable districts of the kingdom, and at last bore its fruit in the development of the "Gothenburg System" of local option and restricted license—restricted gradually to a degree equaling the practical effects of total prohibition—especially in the rural communities where the worship of physical vigor and the hatred of health-destroying vices has retained much of its old-time influence. In less than five years after the first repeal of the general license laws the number of distilleries was reduced from the tremendous total of forty-four thousand to less than six thousand, and the annual product from 26,000,000 gallons to 7,000.000. Year after year the work of reduction went on, till the number of licensed distilleries has now been brought down to less than five hundred (457 in 1889), or to just one per cent of the original multitude.

Total abstinence is now nothing rare among the hard-fisted farmers of the northwestern uplands, and temperance unions are found even among the poor villagers of the pastoral districts, where tea and home-made coffee (a sort of broth prepared from roasted acorns) besides milk and oatmeal water, are fast superseding the alcoholic tipples of former generations.

In the cities the result has been less encouraging, and proves that prohibition is, after all, the only radical cure of an evil which manages to hold its own against all sorts of palliative remedies. "After personal and minute observation," says Prof. Bailie Lewis, "I found that the grog-shops of Gothenburg are as fertile of mischief as those of Edinburgh and Glasgow. . . . . In the first house which I visited there were four active young women in addition to the wife of the man charged with the management of the place, all as busily employed as possible, every moment being required to supply the wants of their numerous customers. With a view of economizing time, a long row of glasses was arranged along the counter, filled with bran-vin (rye-whisky), and which were every minute emptied and as summarily replenished. In numerous instances not a word was spoken. The money was laid on the counter, the glass drained and the customer departed in silence. While a brisk counter-trade was thus being prosecuted with a promptitude and energy unsurpassed in any Scotch liquor shop, numbers were to be found in groups of two, three and upwards, drinking at tables in different parts of the establishment. In the course of the seventeen minutes which I remained in the place described, no fewer than eighty-three persons were supplied with brandy. To show how successfully bran-v n competes with less objectionable beverages, there were out of those eighty-three persons only four who partook of coffee. On the following Sunday evening I found that no fewer than 102 persons entered the same house in the space of twenty-five minutes."

Still, on the whole, the work of reform has by no means been in vain, and its success among the progressive classes is proved by the number of temperance journals circulating among the Scandinavian population of our own Republic. That population, recruited from the most enterprising and most intelligent communities of the old Northland, supports not less than eleven periodicals published in the interest of temperance or of total prohibition, like the Framat (The Advance), of Lindsburg, Kansas, and the Minneapolis Veckoblade (Weekly Gazette), which, in spite of its fearless denunciation of the liquor traffic, has about as many subscribers in Sweden as in Minnesota.

OUR ROUND-THE-WORLD MISSIONARY.

(Concluded.)

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Mr. Smart kindly arranged for me to speak at an English service at Madeira one Sunday afternoon, and at the Portuguese another, both of which were well attended. There was no possibility of forming a union now, but I left all the documents with Mrs. Smart, who with her husband and sister are abstainers. Mrs. S. will continue and increase her work with children, and I hope will begin one with women. The Portuguese steamer arrived in good time, and closed a very pleasant and profitable stay at Mr. Smart's. Any one wishing a comfortable Christian home in Madeira will do well to go to Mr. Smart's.

To my great relief I found two English gentlemen on board, and the engineer was Scotch, so I was not condemned to silence and signs. I thought the weather fine, but every lady was very sick, and nearly all the Portuguese gentlemen.

As showing the difference between these people and ourselves, a word about the parting scenes as we left Funchal may not be out of the way. All were talking and laughing most merrily till the time came for going ashore. Then every woman fell into some other woman's arms, and every man into some other man's, and they hugged each other, stroked and patted each other's backs and shoulders, kissed each other on both cheeks, again and again. The noise of the kisses resounded all over the deck, and was really like numerous bunches of fire-crackers going off on the Fourth of July, only each individual crack was not quite so loud or dry. And the tears; yes, actual tears, rolled down nearly every face. This lasted only a very few minutes, when those for shore dried their eyes and descended into their boats, and those that remained dried their eyes, then dried their handkerchiefs, waving them over the side, and smiles resumed their sway, till pallor and sickness drove them below.

The approach to Lisbon is very pleasant. A palace, forts, more or less, a very extensive convent in connection with a large church, claim attention one after another. I remained only twenty-four hours in the city. I delivered a letter of introduction to Rev. Stewart, given me by Mr. Smart, and chatted with him about the present condition of protestantism and temperance in Portugal, both of which are more cheering than I had supposed. I promised to give some time to that city should I sail thence to South America.

Rain kept me indoors till I went to the train. Starting at evening I crossed the frontier at daylight, and shirked custom house troubles by handing my keys to a man, and going to sleep again on the sofa-like bench of the car, where I had been "catching winks" all night. I was surprised to see so much snow upon the mountain tops so late as the eighth of May, as, if I remember rightly, none of the Spanish mountains are more than 4,000 feet in height. In consequence the mercury dropped to fifty-two degrees Fahrenheit toward morning, and the air had the penetrating, damp feeling of snow.

Arriving at Madrid, I had a perplexing time in getting from the station to Pastor Fliedner's, whose name Rev. Stewart had given me. All the men said "parley-vous-francais," but I could not understand their French, nor did they mine when I spoke correctly, but when I said a noun or two, making motions for the verbs, they began to comprehend. Later I find no trouble with the men at French stations.

I regretted that I saw nothing of Pastor Fliedner's little work, but as my stay lasted only from evening to morning and other affairs occupied him, there was not time. I esteemed it very kind of him to take me in, and was very happy that I had in my possession a letter of recommendation from a D. D. whom he knew, as W. C. T. U. documents and indorsements seemed to carry no weight with him.

An all day's ride through interesting, but rude and barren scenes, plenty of tunnels, cuts, embankments, all night, of which I only know that I woke chilly and uncomfortable many times, and a few hours by daylight through a beautifully cultivated country, with oaks, maples, Lombardy poplars, lilacs, clovers, white, pink, and red, real blood red, with heads three-quarters of an inch thick, and four times that length, brought me to San Sebastian and to the Colegio Norte Americano, a station of the American Board. I was welcomed by Rev. Mr. Gulick, brother to all those noble men who helped on W. C. T. U. work so gladly and effectually in Japan and China, and Mrs. Gulick, sister to our own Bessie and Anna Gordon. This was Saturday morning and the last Sunday morning I had started from sunny Madeira. Here there was much cloud, wind and chill, and some driving rain, in consequence of the rapidly melting snows. This place is situated at the depth of the Bay of Biscay, and only a few miles from the French frontier. Only two or three miles away is the little cove from which LaFayette stole away to give comfort and help to America, and thus to political liberty in all countries, and in all times.

A party of six, all Alexanders by birth or marriage, and descendants of the old Hawaiian missionary by that name were visiting the Gulicks. In the afternoon of Sunday I spoke to the Sunday-school, mostly young girls in the college, several from Madrid and other parts of the state, and again on Monday evening to all who would come. Mr. Gulick interpreted both times. Both Mr. and Mrs. Gulick are total abstainers, of course, and their family follow in their footsteps. Mrs. Gulick is to leave for home in about a month, her hope being quickly to raise a fund to build or purchase a building for the school. Should a renewal of lease be denied them, the excellent school, the work of years, must be scattered at once, as there is not another place in the city to be had. I hope the women of the United States, and of Canada will remember this excellent girls' school in Spain, and give quickly and freely to build an "Isabella Memorial College," to help spread a pure gospel in Spain, while they raise a memorial to her in the form of a statue on the other side of the water. Which will be best, to form a dead memorial of that superior woman, or to form living images, in the mold of those who were last at the cross and first at the resurrection, to go through the length and breadth of Spain and bring her back to a pure faith?

About an hour and a half from Madrid, at a little distance at the east, but near enough to be distinctly seen, is the Escurial. Extensive walls, scarcely more cheerful than a prison, a large central dome, two smaller ones, on opposite sides, four towers at the outer corners of the surrounding walls, are the chief characteristics to be noticed from the train. Doubtless there is much magnificence and beauty within, but I prefer a palace as small and plain as our "White House" and good houses for all the workers of the country, and good and comfortable garments as well, to such a palace covering acres, and filled with all expensive things, while workers live in little huts, often of mud and scarcely bigger than haycocks; with temperature at about fifty degrees, are nearly all barefoot, and in garments so patched that it is difficult to tell which is the original. I counted thirteen sorts of cloth in the back of one woman's gown, below her shawl, as she stood at the station, barefooted, trying to sell some things she had knitted. This had evidently been made out of fragments, and was fully entitled to the fashionable epithet of "crazy."

On Tuesday morning Mr. Gulick accompanied the Alexander's and myself across the frontier. Again, the Custom House business was very light. At Bordeaux the Alexanders and I parted company, they going straight on to Paris, and I turning East toward Lyons. I made the change at Bordeaux, and another a little farther on without difficulty. After a tedious wait of two hours, I was finally settled for the night in a compartment reserved for ladies, and as no other one appeared, I was very well accommodated.

After daylight, I found the country very beautiful, very highly cultivated, but such numbers of vineyards. The same had been the case at and around Bordeaux. The vines are little, gnarled stumps, with the grass shoots just putting out at this season of the year. They must be cut back very severely every year. The stalks are frequently two inches thick, and considerably less than a foot in height.

I drove to the post-office on arrival at about two o'clock, got my letters, all containing good news, and then proceeded to the house where I had been invited when in Geneva last September, Madame Müllers.

Lovingly your sister,

MARY CLEMENT LEAVITT.

A PROHIBITIONIST ABROAD.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—When a question is to be thrust into politics, there is no body of men so effective in accomplishing the work as the judges of the Supreme Court. Theoretically that court of last resort has no business with political questions, and yet, sooner or later, in some form, every political question will come before it for adjustment. The legality of the legal tender act was passed upon by a tribunal, and the Dred Scott decision made slavery a national issue. Abolitionists no the one side and pro-slavery fanatics on the other, had striven to make the question a national issue: while on the other side it was everywhere made a plea that it was a local question to be settled by each state. The exclusion of the Chinese and their right to citizenship has been up in the courts again and again. With great diligence prominent politicians in prohibition states have been ardent Prohibitionists on the temperance question in their own state; but they have carefully insisted that the temperance question must have no influence on the conduct of political parties touching national questions. Prohibitionists of other states have pleaded with the Prohibitionists of the states where liquor and the saloons have been made a legal nuisance, to make common cause so far as national matters are concerned. To a very great extent these pleas have been unheeded; but it has now been decided by the highest tribunal of the land that no state can make a law which shall prevent the citizens of neighboring states from selling any and every kind of liquor in prohibition states, provided it is shipped in to the purchaser and received by him in "original packages."

The London edition of the New York Herald for June 15, and quite a considerable number of other papers on this side of the water, are putting an interpretation on that decision which enlarges its scope to an extraordinary degree. It is possible that their interpretation is for the purpose of increasing the sale of stock in recently organized companies on this side of the water, which have been created for the purpose of dealing in American breweries. Whether the interpretation is editorially adopted for financial reasons or not, it is being pushed vigorously on this side of the water. It is that "since ardent spirits, distilled liquors, ale and beer are subjects of exchange, barter and traffic like any other commodity, and are so recognized by the usages of the commercial world, the effect of this decision is to repeal all the prohibition laws existing in the country, and to make it impossible even for the United States Legislature to bring them into existence again." It looks as if three articles in that London edition of the New York Herald for June 15 were all for a purpose. One is the advertisement occupying two columns and more of the "Illinois United Brewery, Limited." Another is in the financial column under the head of "American Breweries," and is about the length of two-thirds of a column, quoting much of the Supreme Court's decision; and the third is on the editorial page. It is quite obvious that this decision will largely promote the rage for brewery stock companies and the possession of shares therein, which is now running quite wild in Great Britain, and to some extent is having its effect in Germany.

It is very gratifying to see the energy exhibited by some senators and congressmen from a few prohibition states to secure the passage by Congress of a law lending the aid of the general government to the enforcing of the prohibition legislation of prohibition states. For years that plea has been made, that it was an outrageous thing for the general government to give the prestige of its official stamp on liquors to be sold contrary to state law in prohibition localities; but that was looked upon as a dangerous question to touch. It is obvious now that local option goes by the board with this decision quite as completely as state prohibition. It will be a matter of curiosity to watch the attitude of the advocates of high license toward this decision. If the decision of the Supreme Court is correct, then to an outsider it looks very much as if high license was only another name for an inter-state tariff. The Constitution expressly prohibits each state from taxing the products of other states by assessing a tariff on these products when they are transported from one state to another. If now, in Kentucky, liquors are without taxation and in Cincinnati a heavy tax is assessed on them, there may be some technical way of evading the conclusion, but it looks very much as if that was the same situation of affairs with relation to liquors that now exists with relation to silk. On the Canadian side of the St. Lawrence river they have free trade, and on the United States side that silk when imported must pay a high duty. There is room again for the Supreme Court to exercise its technical analytical power of logical acumen.

In Paris last week I dropped into the "Philadelphia Salle" of the McAll mission, and found the "all-round-the-world missionary of the W.C.T.U.," Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt just closing a meeting. I had met her the previous Sunday morning at the American chapel in Paris, and had hunted most of the day for her meeting, having misunderstood the notice. The meeting was not large for so large a city as Paris, but she reports that it required considerable work to find in Paris a correspondent that would enter into her views. She has certainly found one in the person of the evangelist in charge of that mission, as he was hurrying her away to another meeting for the evening. From Paris she was to go to Brussels, and so on and on and on. She said she was "older and weaker." I congratulated her on the fact that she was older. It would be an awful thing if a good Christian woman should cease to get older as time goes by, for no one of that kind of people would ever go to heaven. She did not seem to me to be much weaker; and if she was weaker it was certainly only bodily weakness and not intellectual or spiritual.

Six years ago absinthe and its compounds were only beginning to be sold in the saloons and cafés of Paris. Here and there in the windows would the word be found in the central part of the city. It has now become so common that every place where drinks are sold is expected to have absinthe, or yarmuth, or bitter for the use of its patrons. Not many places in the center of the city now think it worth while to put up the sign; and so the sign is only found in old forms of past years which have not been removed. But the suburb of the city and the smaller towns are advertising it everywhere. It is coming to be the curse of the French people. The absence of the habit of "treating" has saved France, and indeed very much of the continent of Europe, from the evils of drink. We have seen three or four gentlemen sit down to a table and call for wine or beer, and sip it slowly in order to make it last as long as possible, and then each one pay for his own drink. One of the company would call for the waiter and pay his own bill, and bow to his companions and take his departure, without ever thinking that there was any call for his paying for any but his own. If the treating habit had been the law of courtesy among these gentlemen each one of them would have had to pay for six drinks, and so treat the company all around, and they would all have gone home pretty "boozy."

In England, the agitation of the temperance question has suddenly become national by the interjection into party politics of the subject of compensation. The Tory party, under the lead of Lord Salisbury, is proposing to enact a law granting "compensation" to all brewers and saloon-keepers whose business is injured by temperance legislation. Gladstone and the Liberals will probably take the ground that no such compensation is called for. Gladstone is quoted as saying that the property along a street will increase in value more by the destruction of a brewery than the brewery is worth. What the outcome of the agitation will be it is not now possible to foretell. Further than that the political agitation over it will greatly educate the people on the temperance question, and will greatly promote temperance measures in some form or other.

OUR WASHINGTON BUDGET.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL: One of the pleasant events that has transpired since I last wrote THE UNION SIGNAL was the Demorest Medal Contest. The contestants were all members of the Loyal Temperance Legions. The successful candidate was Miss Josie Lee, the daughter of Mr. James Lee, the first convert made by the W. C. T. U. of Washington. A delightful program had been arranged under the direction of Mrs. Alfred Wood, the superintendent of the juvenile department of the District of Columbia, which was well rendered by the youthful temperance advocates. All the performers were members of the L. T. L. This was the first contest ever given in Washington, but Mrs. Wood expects to follow it by others. Mrs. Wood is doing a grand work among the young of the nation's capital, and it is a work that will be felt in less than a generation from now.

The executive committee of the W. C. T. U. of the District of Columbia at a largely attended meeting at their headquarters, May 16, passed the following resolution with reference to the serving of liquor at the Executive Mansion.

"Resolved, That the Woman's Christian Temperance Union deeply regrets that President Harrison furnishes wine to guests at the White House."

The committee authorized the secretary of the society to send a copy of this resolution, officially signed, to the President.

It is said that the resolution passed by the Presbyterian Synod recently in reference to the serving of wine at the President's House, and the selling of it at the Vice-President's has caused them more chagrin than anything else. Let us be glad that something could affect them, for they seem to have been callous on the subject.

The National Amendment Campaign for a National Constitutional Prohibitory Amendment, under the direction of the Amendment Guide, was inaugurated June 14. A joint hearing was given members of the National Prohibitory Amendment Committee by the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, and the House Committee on The Alcoholic Liquor Traffic. The National Prohibitory Amendment Committee consists of the general officers of various National Prohibitory societies of the United States, the general officers of the National Executive Committee of the Prohibition Party, and the National W. C. T. U. Superintendent of Legislation and Petitions.

The committee was formally organized at the Hall Fredonia, the preceding evening, and Mrs. Ada M. Bittenbender, the author of the "Amendment Guide," and the National W. C. T. U. superintendent of Legislation and Petition, was elected chairman.

The speaker claimed, with convincing force, that prohibition was a National question, and that it could only be settled by a National Constitutional Prohibitory Amendment. A large mass meeting to advocate the amendment was held Sunday, (June 15,) presided over by Mrs. Bittenbender. The majority of the committee on the alcoholic liquor traffic are favorable to the amendment, so there will undoubtedly be a favorable report from this committee.

Your correspondent had an interview with Senator Blair, chairman of the committee on education and labor, in regard to the probabilities of an early report of this measure from his committee. The Senator seemed to think that it would take considerable work and good management to secure an immediate favorable report from this committee, as the Democratic members were solidly against it, and some of the Republicans were not favorable to National prohibition, still he is hopeful that he may finally secure a favorable report. He will work with might and main to that end.

Early in this session your correspondent inquired of Mr. Amzi Smith, the chief of the Senate Document Room, and one of the best posted men of the capitol, in regard to congressional legislation, if any measure looking to the prohibition of the traffic in intoxicants with natives of African and the Islands of the Pacific had been introduced into Congress. Mr. Smith examined the records and informed me that no such measure had ever been introduced It seemed strange that with all the petitions that for years past had been presented to Congress praying for the suppression of this iniquitous traffic, and the many hearings that temperance organizations have had before committees of the Senate and the House on this subject, that no practical steps had ever been taken to secure the desired end by the introduction into Congress of a bill or a resolution for the suppression of this traffic.

That Congress, therefore, might have something to act upon your correspondent prepared the following joint resolution which, at her request, Senator Fry introduced into the Senate and Mr. Morse into the House:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and is hereby authorized, to treat and negotiate with such foreign countries as he may be able to open negotiations with, looking to the forming of an alliance of the various civilized nations for the suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors with the native races of the islands of the Pacific Ocean and Africa."

The writer also prepared the following bill which Senator Blair introduced at her request into the Senate, and Congressman Pickler of South Dakota into the House:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be unlawful for any vessel clearing from any port of the United States for any of the ports of Africa or the islands of the Pacific Ocean to take on board, with the intention of landing the same in said ports, any intoxicating, spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors, including rum and gin. That any violation of the foregoing provisions shall be punishable by a fine of not less than five hundred dollars or more than five thousand dollars, and the forfeiture of such liquors as may be found on board of such vessels."

If this bill or resolution passes the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic committee, as possibly the resolution will, and comes before the House for discussion, the subject will get to the attention of the American people as it never has before.

The interests of humanity demand that our government should take the initiative in an effort to suppress the traffic in intoxicants with the natives of the Western Pacific Islands, as it was our government alone which declined to enter into the international agreement proposed by Lord Granvill on the part of the British government for preventing the sale of arms, ammunition, dynamite and alcohol to the natives of the Pacific Islands, and thus the flagrant abuses caused by the traffic in arms and spirits are now being perpetrated by the refusal of the American government to take part in an undertaking which the European powers generally supported. Petitions from various parts of the country are pouring into Congress praying for the passage of a bill to prevent the transportation of liquors into states contrary to their laws.

Senator Wilson's bill to submit original package liquors to the laws of the several states is still pending in the House Judiciary committee, but it is expected that this measure, or a similar one, will be passed by the House this Congress.

There are two similar measures already on the calendar of the House: One favorably reported by the Commerce committee and one by the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic committee. But it was thought best, by the friends of Prohibition in Congress, that the House should pass the Senate bill, rather than one of its own measures.

There has been considerable in the present Congress to encourage Prohibitionists. In the first place the question of prohibition has gained entrance into Congress, and this in itself is a great victory. Some one said years ago "When the question of slavery gets into Congress its end will be near," and this we hope will be true of prohibition. Such a discussion of prohibition on the floor of the Senate and House as they have had this session is unprecedented in the history of the country.

The Oklahoma bill, as it passed, was an acknowledged victory for prohibition, and while the Army Appropriation bill was not what we desired, the proposed appropriation of $100,000 for buildings canteens, etc., was defeated, and the sale of liquor in port, canteens and garrisons was prohibited in prohibition states. The debate on the Wilson bill was an education on prohibition to the country at large, and a similar one which is inevitable on the floor of the House, may be expected to have the same happy results.

PIONEERING IN WISCONSIN.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL.—A recent tour of two months for work in Wisconsin has revealed the fact of an awakened interest on the temperance question among all classes of people, the unions, churches, and the people at large, not excepting a large Scandanavian population. Wide-awake pastors, heartily coöperating with the W. C. T. U. in union services, with the W. C. T. U. women at the front to have all things in readiness, and appreciative audiences, lend wonderful inspiration to the work.

By invitation of the state officers I spent one month in southern Wisconsin, then came a Macedonian cry for work in the ninth district, the president being confined to her home from ill health. Lying upon her bed planning for her district, arranging appointments for me, revealed a loyalty not unlike our brother soldiers of the other war of '62.

But with the aid and faithful correspondence of the secretary, the way opened for me to visit the northern pineries, where I found brave sisters of the union holding the fort though surrounded by a flood of strong drink. Blessed work is being done for the unfortunate woodman who squanders a winter's earnings in legalized dens of vice—yes, blessed gospel work, but the thought forced itself upon me again and again that other teaching was needed, and not the woodman alone, but the profound Christian man who votes in favor of license, the citizen who feels no responsibility for a brother's weal or woe, but for gain, or fear of losing gain, votes for the perpetuation of the liquor traffic; if not guilty in this respect, perhaps forever holds his peace where voice and action is demanded. I am persuaded that the legal phase of the work cannot be too much emphasised in these days, if discreetly done. God is as much in the present uprising, which demands protection from rum by legislation, as He was in the gospel and moral suasion movement of twelve yearss ago; as really in the legal suasion movement of to-day, as He is in the evangelistic agencies of the temperance work.

Northern Wisconsin and Africa need protection from rum equally as much as they need missionaries and evangelists. But little permanent good may be hoped for until both the law and the gospel clasp hands and bid each other God speed, until Christian men count it as much a Christian act to put a check into the ballot box against the liquor traffic as to put a "check" into the missionary box for the support of missionaries or evangelists. Somebody has said "our country is never saved but always being saved." So it is with mankind. We have no assurance of the safety of even the righteous so long as this roaring lion of strong drink goes about seeking whom it may devour. Further evidence is not needed as to God's purpose for his people to press with vigor to secure righteous legislation for men's protection, which is a long step toward his redemption.

Let us pray that the tongue-crippled, intimidated "public sentiment" on the temperance question may be loosed from its bondage, and utilized toward hastening the day of deliverance from rum and its kindred vices.

TEMPERANCE TEMPLE ITEMS.

MATILDA B. CARSE.

We wish the dear white-ribboners, who are interested in the erection of the Temple, and have waited long and patiently for the work to commence, could see the army of men that are now engaged upon the foundation. We are sure the sound of the hammer upon the great stones would be sweet music to their ears. The contract for the entire building is now let, and it is to be completed in twenty-two months. It will be ready for occupancy, May, 1892. A large number of applications have already been made for offices in the building. The new plan for the Temple is finished. The Chicago daily papers have been giving sketches of it this week; they are warm in its praise, and admit that it is unsurpassed for beauty of design, and that it realizes the highest idea of a superb monumental building. One paper says "it will be much the finest building in the city." That means a great deal, when it is conceded in all quarters that Chicago has the finest buildings in the world. The Herald says: "The chief feature of the interior will be Willard Hall, a magnificent audience-room, lined with marble, on the ground floor, and in the southwest corner of the building, with a capacity of six hundred, where daily meetings will be held, and where the incense of prayer for the inebriate and for the temperance cause will perpetually ascend."

The new picture of the building is now in the hands of the photographer, and photogravures of it will be ready in a week; they will be sent as quickly as possible to all who have earned them, and to whom we owe a picture. We will also soon have a picture of it in THE UNION SIGNAL, so all our friends can get a slight idea of what it is like. Let all unions remember that the corner-stone is to be laid September 13. All autographs of members must be in by September 10 to get the names placed in the corner-stone. Each member of a union pays 25 cents for the privilege; the Loyal Temperance Legion pays 10 cents and the Baby Bands 10 cents for each name. Let our unions do good work in this direction for the next two months. We will send free to all unions and Loyal Temperance Legions the linen lists on which these names must be written, if they will send to us giving address. All persons who get up a full Baby Band, or get up a list of ten persons who pay $1 each can secure one of these superb pictures of the Temple.

The large number of Baby Bands that are being sent in again reminds us of the loving patience and earnest endeavor that animates so many of our dear white-ribboners. The women who get up these bands, as we have said before, are "building better than they know." They are turning whole communities, through the little ones, into temperance societies. We would like to make honorable mention in this column of all who have sent in money for these Bands, but through lack of space we can only give the names of those who have raised full Bands. To-day we have received the largest yet reported, the Harriet Chambers Baby Band, of Bradford, Pa. It numbers 148, and is accompanied by a check of $14.80. Mrs. D. A. Bennett who sends it says, "I believe this Baby Band work is a means of promoting the temperance cause, and of doing a great deal of good. We name our Band for our beloved local and county president who has no babies of her own."

The Austin Ill., W. C. T. U., through Mrs. R. K. Rose, has the honor of sending a full Baby Band, which numbers 103. The W. C. T. U. of Stuart, Iowa, (no name sent) sends a full Band of 102.

The W. C. T. U. of Park Allegany, Pa., through Mrs. R. C. Bards, also sends a full Band which numbers 102.

The W. C. T. U. of Clark's Corners, Pa., through Mrs. Kate L. Kitchell, sends a full Band of 100. Mrs. A. E. Thomas, president of the Lincoln, Neb., W. C. T. U., writes, "Enclosed find fifty cents and five more names for Grandma Stoner's Baby Band. She never misses a new baby in our neighborhood, and also works faithfully for UNION SIGNAL subscribers." Let us have a Grandma Stoner in each union. Why not?

Mrs. Ella L. Sabin, of Lee, Mass., writes, "Wishing to see Mother Thomson honored by a tablet in the Memorial Hall of the Temple, Mrs. Juliett Shannon wishes me to forward you $1, in behalf of our Union for this purpose." Will not other unions follow in this work of honoring the beloved Mother of the Crusade?"

Mrs. Emma G. Pitzer, Clarksville, Mo., sends $4.61 in memoriam of her little daughter, Nettie, whose sweet life here lasted but three brief summers. Part of the money sent was found in her little bank; the balance came from the sale of a hen and chickens that had been a gift to her while ill. Her grief stricken mother found the money was too sacred to be used for anything but the Temple. Five dollars comes from Mrs. C. R. Johnson, in memory of her mother, Mrs. Minerva Leavitt, who died a year ago.

Miss Emeline Hathway sends $3 in memory of her father, Paul Hathway, who died at the advanced age of ninety-five years. One dollar comes from Mrs. Stevens, Eau Claire, Wis., in memory of her mother, Mrs. Lucinda Eddy Gaston; she was almost four score. Rosa E. Bennett, "Though dead, yet speaketh." We have received from her loving and faithful mother, another $2 from Rosa's mite-box. This amount comes every six months. Mrs. Bennett writes: "It is our intention to continue it till the step stone of the building shall be laid."

We have a long list of unions that have lately entered the race for the $100 gift. We have only room to give a few names this week. The W. C. T. U. of the Town of Lake, send $46. on their pledge. Charlotte, Mich., W. C. T. U. sends $25. The W. C. T. U. of Hamlin, Minn., send $17. The W. C. T. U. No. 1., New Haven, Conn., send $30.

ALCOHOL'S CONFESSION.

BY EVA JONES.

I am alcohol; have you heard of me?
I'm a spirit of evil, by men set free.
I come from the rotting of fruits and grains,
From spoiling and wasting the farmer's best gains.

The life in the food is turned into death,
And souls destroyed by my fiery breath.
A poison broth doth the brewer brew
From the golden grain God gives us for bread,
That poison am I: the harm that I do
You would never believe if the whole could be said.

When pure, I look like the water clear,
Were a glass of each here, you'd not know us apart,
Merely seeing us so; but if you come near,
My fiery odor might cause you to start.

The water gives life and refreshment to man,
Three-fourths of his life-blood is water, you see;
A constant supply he must have while he lives,
But never a drop of my poison needs he!

Sometimes I am called the water of death,
Shame-water, fire-water, and other such names;
But I'll show you that I am not water at all,
For water won't burn, sir, while alcohol flames

If ignited, and so, sir, that's just what I do;
I'm a poison that burns wherever I go,
I burn on the tongue with a venomous smart,
I scorch the poor stomach till ulcers there start,
I suck the life-juices from rich flowing blood,
As a brooklet is dried by a fierce, summer sun
My fire in the veins is a terrible thirst,
More maddening still as the poisoning goes on.

I am greedy for water, and wherever I go,
I take it from stomach, lungs, liver and brain;
And robbed of the water of life in himself,
The wretch who drinks me drinks but fire and pain.

Above all I harden and injure the brain,
Destroying the reason, debasing the mind;
When all sense is lost through my fiery aid,
Men say, "He's a drunkard; that's all—never mind!"

By rotting of grape juice is made ruby wine,
Now nearly one-quarter of that stuff am I,
Of fermented cider I'm nearly one-tenth,
And of whisky one-half from the corn and the rye.

One tumbler in eighteen or twenty of beer,
Is my pure poison self, there to injure and kill;
And of brandy and rum, and the rest of the list,
I'm a principal factor, drawn off by the still.

The cider, the beer and the wine have least
Of my subtle poison, fearful and dire,
But they are most dangerous of all, because They're the kindling-wood that starts the fire.

Men never begin with the poison pure,
But weak, sweetened, flavored, made to taste good,
Wine, cider or beer; and the ruinous road
Is easy and rapid, downward and sure.

THE BUG AND THE BOTTLE.

BY JEAN HALIFAX.

"Pshaw! you're joking," said Ed Stanley impatiently.

"Honest, I'm not," returned Dick, earnestly. "Come over to the ball-ground, and I'll give the whole story. It was prime, I tell you, Ed, and no mistake. You ought to have gone."

"Hear! hear!" cried Ed teasingly. "The great temperance lecturer is now about to hold forth. Brothers, companions, renounce your liquor"—

"And your nonsense, or I'll be obliged to settle you," concluded another boy, unceremoniously causing the budding orator to turn a sudden and quite unpremeditated somersault, whereupon ensued a good-natured scuffle between the two The high school was just out, and the B class were coming down the outside steps in a fashion that resembled nothing so much as a menagerie let loose—or a crowd of school-boys. It was no wonder that the Benton people sometimes called the school-house "the hyena's cage." Even the "hyenas" themselves acknowledged, in their occasional conscientious moments, that the name was well deserved.

In the midst of all the hubbub, however, a few of the boys had been talking seriously, for them. Mr. Eastman had given an earnest temperance "talk," as he modestly chose to speak of it, in the school building, the night before, from which Ed, according to the established custom of the Benton boys, had carefully absented himself. But Dick, and one or two of his special cronies had attended. Why, they could not have explained, unless it was because they were curious as to what Mr. Eastman, their principal, would say on the subject.

"He's so sensible in other things," said Dick, "perhaps his talk will be as good as he is."

The boys had not been disappointed. The "talk" had been all that they demanded, full of sound sense, but with stories and illustrations which held a solid truth behind the fun. But the most striking of the many and interesting object lessons the high school master had given that evening had been that of the bug and the bottle, and it had impressed Dick, especially, so strongly, that he had spoken of it to his friend, Ed Stanley. And when a boy has reached the stage when he can repeat such a story to boys who will be apt to ridicule, he has proved himself most thoroughly in earnest.

This fact was realized by his companions, who were now decidedly anxious to find out what had made Dick one of the "We-Come-To-Upset Society," as the boys called the W. C. T. U. band, the only temperance organization in Benton. Dick was the acknowledged leader among the B class boys, "first in work, first in play, and first in the hearts of his fellow-mates," parodied Hugh Ainsworth. Accordingly, at the suggestion to go over to the ball-ground, a few rods away, the boys immediately started, and in less time than the telling of it would take, the class were in possession of the ground, some precariously balancing on the fence, regardless of Joe's remarks as to their political instability, some on convenient stumps, while others leisurely measured their full length on the soft, thick grass in the corner of the field, which had been mercifully spared, while the boys' enthusiastic games had worn the center hard and bare of both grass and weeds.

"Well," began Dick, determinedly, for he knew it would not be an easy task to convince his mates of his new position; "it was this way. Mr. Eastman told a lot of stories and showed a sight of things; but the tip-top of them all was that bottle, and in it he had a bug. I declare for it, I felt awful sorry for that bug. It was down in the bottom of the bottle, and it kept trying so hard to get out. Every now and then it made a dash at the straight sides of the bottle, and tried to climb these; but it couldn't do it. I felt somehow as if it were a real live human being, almost, when it was wanting so hard to get out of its prison. And, you see, Eastman told us that it was like a drunkard. It was possible that the bug might get out of the bottle, and the drinker might grow sober; but it would be a tremendous job, anyway. And then he said—and he looked so earnest—Boys, don't get yourselves into the bottle! Don't take the first taste. It's the only safe way.' I just said to myself, 'Dick Arnold, keep yourself out of danger; sign the pledge, and don't take the first step into that risky old bottle.' That's all there was of it,—at least that I know much about. But you know where to find me, fellows, now, on that subject."

Contrary to Dick's expectations the boys had listened quietly, and at last Joe Howard, the last person in the world whom any one would have thought likely to organize a temperance society, broke forth energetically.

"I just tell you what, boys, that's prime. I say, now, what if we should start a kind of club, you know, and—" Joe had not much experience as an advocate of total abstinence, and was rather less assured of himself than usual. "Well, let's go in for this anti-liquor business in a body!"

By the time the boys began to feel the need of some hot steak and rolls, and had separated for their respective tea tables, the new "club" was in full running order.

And this was the way in which, after the older people had despaired of ever enlisting the boys of Benton, a temperance band was started by the boys themselves. And what do you think was on the badges of the new society? A tiny picture of a small bottle with a still tinier bug imprisoned in it! And it was weeks before the curious small boys, who were not initiated into the mysteries of that cabalistic badge until they had declared themselves willing to obey all the rules of the "B. B. B's," discovered that those letters meant the "Bug and Bottle Boys"!

DAILY BIBLE READING NOTES.

(Luke 14:25–35; II Thessalonians 1–3; I Timothy 1–3.)

Sunday, 20; Luke 14:25–35. Verse 26, Our Lord wants children to love their parents (Eph. 5:29; 6:2), but He does not want any of our loves to intervene irreconcilably between the heart and His kingdom. When it comes to this, we must love our kindred less than we love Him, and that is what He means by "hate." He wants no half-hearted discipleship, by which we would deceive ourselves and misrepresent His kingdom to the world. Verse 34, Christ is not concerned about the great number of hearers, but about the honest heart. The inconsiderate and light-minded are like this builder and warrior, and, as salt that has lost its savor, they are of no use.

Monday, 21; II Thess. 1. Verse 3, What must we think of a life which has gone on for years since a profession of religion was made, without any growth? Verse 4, Where faith and love are weak, persecutions and tribulations shake them; but where they are genuine and strong, these things only make them stronger, just as the shaking by the wind causes the healthy tree to send its roots down deeper into the earth. Verse 9, It seems to be the thought with some people that if they say nothing about hell, or ridicule the notion of its existence, that thus they will extinguish it. It is great folly to disregard the threatenings of the Bible.

Tuesday, 22; II Thess. 2. Verse 1, It is right always for the Christian to live in the light of our Lord's coming. We need not speculate as to the time; but each day should be spent by us in view of this great expectation, which shall certainly at some time be realized. Verse 10, The Antichrist, embodying all opposition to our Lord, comes from falsehood and glorifies sin. Beware of the beginnings of evil and unbelief.

Wednesday, 23; II Thess. 3. Verse 1, Our hope for the world lies in the success of the gospel. Every praying person, however much he may feel his incompetency to teach others, is a co-worker with the most gifted to give to men the word of the Lord. Verse 3, Our only sure refuge is our Lord's faithfulness to us. As we come to know ourselves we cannot put much confidence in our own hearts or even in our fidelity as God's steadfast and unchangeable servants, but we can put confidence in our ever faithful Saviour.

Thursday, 24; I Tim. 1. Verse 4, How much time has been wasted in idle speculations. We cannot be saved on that which is about religion, but must have the pure, unadulterated gospel itself. Verse 5, All the commands of God, rightly understood and used, bring us to the one glorious center of the Christian religion—"love out of a pure heart." Verse 15, Notice how simple was Paul's creed, as he now comes close to the end of his life. He sees the gospel simply as a glad message for the lost.

Friday, 25; I Tim. 2. Verses 1, 2, Pray for all men, and pray for all rulers. This intercession for others is the purest exercise of love toward others. Verse 12, There is nothing in the command, "not to teach," that is meant to discourage a woman from using her gifts to help others in the right way, with the right spirit, and with favoring circumstances like those of our times. Priscilla and Philip's daughters taught, and certainly Paul did not forbid their work. Acts 18:26; 21:9.

Saturday, 26; I Tim. 3. Verse 3, Wine leads to quarreling; and the next thing forbidden is to strike another in rage. That such injunctions were needed shows the low moral and social state of the people. Verse 4, Christianity is a family religion, and we cannot exalt too much the domestic virtues. Verse 15, In this world of sin the eternal truths of redemption and salvation find their support in the Church. That is God's instrument by which the truth revealed and manifested by Christ may continually be upheld in order to enlighten and save men.

THE PRAYER MEETING TOPIC.

(Trust in the Lord, "Bible Reading Leaflet," March, 1889. Psalm 118:8.)

The whole teaching of the Bible is epitomized in the text, and it is very striking that i should be, by actual count, its central verse.

1. We cannot safely put our trust in man. The Bible teaches what experience shows in the times of greatest need, that it is useless to put our trust in man. When we trust to human resources, and come to a time where there is absolutely no arm of flesh upon which we can rely, we feel ourselves bereft indeed.

2. Trust in the Lord means that in the things we have committed to His care we have a confidence like that which we have about our money when we have committed it to a perfectly safe and trustworthy bank. We do not go around worrying about the money that we have trusted in this way.

3. All our troubles are designed to lead us into a state of trust. We gather strength by the trials through which we pass. We come to know God as a Friend and Father who is always with us. To know God thus is a knowledge of infinite bliss.

If I can only place one little brick in the pavement of the Lord's pathway I will place it there, that coming generations may walk thereon to the heavenly city.—Phillips Brooks.

The Household.

HOW TO DO IT.

BY AUGUSTA L. STOCK.

You can't start a fire
  That will do your heart good,
If all you've provided
  Are faith and damp wood.

You can't start a fire
  That will burn error out,
Till men are in earnest
  In what they're about.

They won't be in earnest
  Till love makes them so;
And then, let me tell you,
  The fire's sure to glow.

'Tis love to the brethren
  That drives out the cold,
And sends us to seek them,
  To find and to hold.

And love in our hearts
  Will make love spring in theirs,
And so comes salvation
  From sin and its snares.

And God is the giver
  Of this very love;
Reform, to be lasting,
  Must come from above.

Other ways being tried,
  You will find there's no good
In striving to kindle
  With faith, and damp wood.

BIBLE STUDY IN THE HOME.

BY JULIA REDFORD TOMKINSON.

A large Bible with elegant binding and fine engravings lay on the table in the parsonage parlor. It was the gift of a Sunday-school to their pastor and his wife in their early married life; a treasured volume, that little fingers were not allowed to handle.

One Sunday afternoon a restless child of three years wandered around the room, bent on doing the things she ought not to do. "Don't," said the mother, as she soothed the baby and spoke a comforting word to the other little one, standing at her knee. "Don't," she said again and again. "Mamma," said the child suddenly, "it is allus don't on Sunday. I wish Sunday never, never came to my house."

A pang shot through the mother's heart. One of her cherished plans for the home life had long been that her family should "call the Sabbath a delight," and already it was a tedious day to the little daughter whom she was to lead heavenward. She looked about her. The sunlight lay on the gilded corner of the Bible. "Which shall it be, the fine binding or the soul of my child?" "Darling," she said, "would you like to see the pictures in the big Bible? Do you think you can bring it to me?" Every sign of listlessness vanished. "O, may I? I'll be so tareful." For more than an hour they turned the leaves together. Bennie alternated between the pictures and his blocks, gravely folding his dimpled hands behind his back, when told he must be careful of the pretty book.

A new sense of the blessedness of motherhood came to the mother, as she tenderly told the story of the baby Jesus, over whom bent the sweet face of Mary. "Mamma," said Lulu softly, "I love Him. I'll be dood." The mother's eyes filled with sudden tears. "God gave His only begotten Son," she whispered, and drew the child close to her heart. The book that this busy woman was longing to open lay untouched, but the blessed work was begun; and from that time the hour with the "Sunday Bible"—kept for that day alone—was a pleasure to which the child looked forward with delight.

Years have passed. Other children have blessed the home. The "Sunday Bible" has lost its beauty. Many leaves are loose; some of the pictures are torn, in spite of careful handling. Some are soiled with the touch of little fingers, long since folded in waxen whiteness and laid away to wait the coming of the morning. What tender memories are shut between the faded covers. What priceless lessons of gospel truth have been learned that time and care can never efface. Among the precious privileges of her life, that mother reckons those hours with her children, as helpful to her spiritual growth as to theirs. As she has studied the Word, pleading with God to give her light, and given again the beautiful old stories to her eager little listeners, her own heart has burned within her, and the Master himself has drawn near to comfort and bless.

Another line of systematic Bible study has been for years successfully carried on in the same family, in connection with the Sunday-school lesson. The question, "Have you studied your lesson for Sunday?" is never asked, yet each one, from the grandmother down to the five-year-old baby, knows something about it. It is accomplished in this way. At family prayers on Monday morning the verses of the lesson for the next Sabbath are read, the children sharing more or less in the exercise, all waiting while little Mabel laboriously spells out her verse from her father's book. Often, each morning of the week, these same verses are read; sometimes the parallel passages, or connecting links. The children are allowed to ask any question concerning the lesson. A Bible atlas is at hand, and is referred to when necessary, until Galilee, Samaria and Judea become as familiar as the geography of their own state. Great care is taken to give the historical lessons in their relation to the general history.

"But it takes time!" Surely it does. What is time for? Twenty minutes or half an hour of earnest study, not careless reading, each morning for ten years, will give a fund of Bible knowledge of priceless value. In this feverish, restless life, it is very easy to impress our children with the fact—too often true of those who call Christ, Master—that our eager quest is for wealth and social or intellectual distinction, and our spent energies are to be given to our King. If it be impossible to do this in the morning, in the half hour that follows supper, when the hurry is over, much may be done.

Another blessed hour of privilege, in the family of which I write, is the time of evening worship, as soon as supper is over, before the little ones are off to their early sleep. The exercises are short, always including the recitation of Scripture texts. As soon as the baby can say words enough to repeat, "God is love," or some simple verse,—thank God there are so many for His little ones to learn—he has his verse. Night after night the children say the same verse, till it becomes a part of themselves, and a new one is regarded as an accomplishment. There is no forcing to irksome tasks, but almost unconsciously the word is hid in their hearts. Here the ten commandments have been learned, and some of the Psalms, recited in concert by the whole family. Just now they are learning the "Love chapter"—the thirteenth of first Corinthians. It will be many weeks before they all know it perfectly, but little by little the beautiful chapter is becoming their own. Is the time lost? Is the message of the King of so little worth that the din of labor and confusion of tongues shall drown the heavenly words?

A pile of sand has been found very helpful in teaching Bible geography. The mother was trying, one Sunday afternoon, to explain, with the aid of a picture, the situation of Jerusalem and Mt. Olivet. She suddenly thought of the sand. "Come out in the yard, and I will show you," she said to the little ones. "Now make two hills." They did it quickly. With tiny pieces of wood they built the walls of Jerusalem. They marked the course of the Kedron, and planted little sprigs of green for olive trees on Olivet. "Somewhere here was the garden where Jesus prayed. Over the brow of the hill, I will put a stick for Bethany where Lazarus lived;" and what had been dim and uncertain took shape to be remembered always. Another delightful Sunday lesson, in the secluded corner of the yard, was the laying out of the Holy Land in the sand. "Here is Carmel." "Wait, mamma," said the seven-year-old boy, "let me get the atlas to be sure." The mountains of Lebanon, the ridge of hills, and the plain of Esdraelon were carefully made. The waters of Merom, Sea of Galilee, Jordan and the Dead Sea were filled in with moss. It was a happy time. Was the Sabbath broken?

The Bible is needed in public and private schools, but more than anywhere else it is needed in the homes where as families the Word of God shall be regularly, systematically studied as one of the chief duties and most blessed privileges.

WORDS TO THE WISE.—SUPPOSE.

BY ABBY MORTON DIAZ.

Suppose the father and mother of one boy begin with him at the earliest impressible period and train him in the direction of self-restraint and self-dependence. Suppose they seek out ways and means of such training. Suppose that all through his boyhood they hold this aim in view, making it a subject of serious thought, and availing themselves of every possible means of enlightenment. Suppose that having themselves exalted ideas of what constitutes a successful life they inspire him with the same. Suppose they make him know that for him life will not be a success unless he lives out his highest and best—in other words, makes the most of himself—and does all he can to make this possible for others. Suppose their wise training so develops strength in him that it dominates weakness. Suppose they do all this in ways so wise that he will not perceive the doing. It is evident that a boy thus started in life on a high plane would be satisfied only with the highest kinds of enjoyment. An "inward necessity for goodness" would compel him to this. Low companionship, low pleasures, any kind of lowness or meanness would be distasteful to him, would be beneath his plane. His desires would be for advancement. He would delight in excellence. For him the saloon would offer no attractions. For him no temperance reform would be needed, no prohibitory law; this law would be written on his heart.

Make such fatherhood and motherhood enlightenment universal, and the whole temperance movement would be needless. It is directed toward weakness. The true work is to insure the development of strength—strength of character. The home atmosphere is the environment from which character is assimilated, and just as carefully as nourishing and strengthening food is provided for the physical sustenance, just so carefully should be provided all that will nourish and strengthen character. The aims held up; the motives urged; the quality of the conversation; judgments passed on different people; remarks made; the presence or absence of the spirit of love, of kindliness, of gentleness; the manners, looks, tones; all these tell for better or for worse in this atmosphere of the home. How shall its essential qualities be insured? When may we begin to expect this fatherhood and motherhood enlightenment now so rare even among the most intelligent? We may begin to expect it when as much thought shall be given to the parentage and the training of children as is now deemed needful in regard to animals. When enlightenment on these points shall take highest rank in our systems of education, which systems will then be as different from these of our time as these are different from those of the dark ages. And how shall all this be brought about? Let us consider. And while we are considering let us bear in mind that the material for the reformers of a quarter of a century hence is now being made ready in our unenlightened homes.

A SHORT SERMON TO TIRED W. C. T. U. WORKERS.

BY LYDIA STRAWN.

People do not usually go to railroad books for beautiful writing or helpful sermons. They have an impression that from soulless things like corporations, sermons are out of place.

A railroad book, "Vacation Gospel," lying open on my desk, if issued by some noted publishing firm, and paid for over a bookseller's counter would doubtless be considered a handsome ornament to any center table. From the opening pages of this little book I would take a diamond and hold it up for the gaze of all tired W. C. T. U. workers, and that means a very large class. They need some respite from their load, and if they are withdrawn long enough for a brief rest this summer there will be no reason to suppose that the falling stars will prove fatal to anybody. Here is the extract:

"The most healthful rest comes from a pleasant change in one's work, a new outlook, a temporary release from 'the dull drudgery of the desk's dead wood.' He who preaches the new gospel of vacation is a benefactor of his kind. He is a herald of health, happiness and hope. The man whose mind is long and often on the rack of anxious thought needs the change and relaxation which delightful sauntering alone can give. Brain and body need to be released from books and business. Gladstone flees the all-night sessions of Westminster for the woods of Hawarden Castle, and swings his ax right lustily into the heart of English oaks and beeches, hale and hearty at eighty. He leads the liberal thought of England, and is the grand old man that he is in body and mind because he knows how best to take and use a vacation. Bancroft leaves the sultry streets of Washington for his rose gardens at Newport, and at the same time canters along the cliffs of Aquidneck and the verge of ninety years as though he were training for a polo match. Look at men like these and tell me that vacations do not pay. They pay in invigorated bodies, in clearer intellects, in wider sympathies, in everything which goes to make up truest manhood and womanhood. . . . . Listen then to the glad evangel, and when the summer heats wilt your linen and your brains, fling away pen and blotter (and duster) and try the virtues of a vacation trip through some part of that picturesque America of which you boast so much, but alas! 'of which you know so little.'"

HONORARY MEMBERSHIP, WHAT AND WHY?

Honorary membership brings our fathers, brothers, husbands and sons into line with the great work of the W. C. T. U. In its early days the National provided for honorary membership and fixed its conditions—simply two, the same as for regular membership—signing the pledge and paying annual dues. These dues are all retained in the local treasury instead of being, like those of the regular members, divided between local, state and National treasury. Honorary members are not counted in apportionment for national representation.

What are the duties and privileges of honorary members? To further the work of the union and do all in their power for temperance, to pay dues promptly, and always stand up to be counted on the right side. Most of them consider it privilege enough to be connected with this grand organization; besides this they are entitled to wear our badge, to attend our meetings, even to "speak in meeting" if they feel so moved, but we draw the line upon voting. We say, "Gentlemen, we are glad to have you join us, and we follow the precedent you set us, in our treatment of you. We allow you, just as you allow us, to pay taxes, your membership dues, to discuss affairs by word of mouth, or through the press; we often call upon you for service to the state, but when it comes to voting we insist that here we represent you, as you represent us at the polls." Is not that fair?

We believe strongly in honorary membership, and advise unions to make more of it than they do. It pays to make special effort to enlist the gentlemen under our banner. It is an excellent thing for them to be thus brought out squarely on the right side. It is a great educating power, for the W. C. T. U. is nothing if not educational. Most men's organizations work along a single line, that of total abstinence or along the political line. A man cannot come into our organization with its forty departments, without having his ideas broadened, and his conviction strengthened that the movement rests upon sure foundations; he is elevated as well as broadened, for he sees the spiritual element emphasized as it is not done by any other organization, and feels that its secret of power is its hold upon the throne. We believe that this consciousness of the breadth and height of our work is the great thing which makes our brothers so enthusiastic in admiration of our work. For enthusiastic they are, as letters coming continually show. Most of them are too eulogistic to print, but they touch our hearts all the same and we thank our brothers for them. They also impress us with the benefits of honorary membership and make us wish that every man enjoyed these benefits.

Our brothers enjoy our methodical manner of work and many of them are more than willing to aid in it. It is the path of wisdom to utilize this willingness, making it three times blessed, a blessing to them and to us. Here are a few ways in which we have known honorary members to be very useful: First, in juvenile work as superintendents of Loyal Temperance Legions, drill masters in their exercises and manual of arms; teaching various handicrafts in boys' industrial schools, and the like. They can not only do these things better than we can, but the fact that they are men goes a great way in tiding boys over that age when they are wiser in their own conceit than any woman who ever was born. There comes a time in every boy's life when he thinks he knows more than his mother or any other woman; this is the time when he breaks away from Sunday-school, from Loyal Temperance Legion, and good influences generally. If some manly man stands as the representative of these influences during the critical time, he has great power to safely tide the boy over. A very grave danger threatens our boys to-day from the fact that good influences are so largely conserved by women, and men are inclined to leave all moral education to them. When this is the case the boy is sure to feel that temperance, purity, gentleness, are "womanish," and to lose respect for them.

Honorary members can be of great assistance in various forms of evangelistic work. Our experience is that gospel meetings in jails, in the dark parts of cities and wherever hardened, degraded men are found, are much more orderly when in charge of a lady; yet the assistance of men is of great value. They can distribute cards of invitation in lodging houses, on the street and at the door; assist in singing and in speaking, here their aid is invaluable, especially in testimonies; the men expect women to be kept by the power of Christ, and our testimonies have, therefore, little weight; but when strong men of like passions as themselves testify to the saving and the keeping power of Jesus, it tells on men's hearts.

In distribution of literature. A little city was to have a big Fourth of July celebration and not a temperance celebration, either, it was before their day; one of the honoraries of the union there, the leading grocer of the place and thus acquainted with many country people who were sure to be in town that day, came to the union and offered to spend the day in distributing temperance literature, if they would keep his pockets supplied with it; he had too much tact to go around with a bundle of tracts, like a showman's bill poster. The ladies sent for several thousands of the tract, "The Lord and the Distiller—Who got the Corn?" and similar ones.

Early in the morning he came round to headquarters, filled his pockets and started on his travels, returning frequently during the day for renewals. Such an amount of handshaking as he did that day, for he knew almost everybody in the county. After due inquiries for his friend's health, the state of the crops, etc., he drew out a tract—only one, mind you—and gave it to him, remarking that it was a good thing and he thought his friend would enjoy it. In this way he gave out over two thousand tracts, and every recipient, feeling it a personal favor, was bound to read it. And that good brother told me he should never have thought of doing this work if he had not been an honorary member of the W. C. T. U. and felt it his duty to lend a hand in their good work.

Another was a dry goods merchant in a country town. He always kept a supply of temperance literature under his counter, often ordering packages of fifty or an hundred UNION SIGNALS for this purpose. Whenever he did up a package of goods to go into the country he put in a paper or a tract; these were gladly received in those country homes as personal gifts from him, and in the course of a few years they revolutionized that county. We might go through the departments and show how honorary members can work in each.

This working is the secret of securing them, or at least of retaining them. As we said in "The Membership Crusade" a few weeks ago, we can not expect to retain members whose time is precious—the only kind worth having—where there is nothing for them to do, and this is doubly true of men. But if when you invite them to join, you can point to some definite line of work you know them well fitted to do, and say, "Your help is needed just here," you will be much more likely to secure and retain them. For example, secure the lawyer for legal adviser of the union, the physician to give occasional lectures on health topics and scientific temperance, and so on.

Shall honoraries wear our badge? Most assuredly; nothing is more encouraging to us and discouraging to our foes than a bit of white ribbon on a man's watch-guard or in his button-hole. I well remember what a thrill of pleasure ran through me when in Oregon, looking from a car window as it stood at Salem depot, and noting at least half-a-dozen white ribbons in as many gentlemen's button-holes. There was no convention there, so they were not put on for an especial occasion, but seemed to be worn habitually. We passed through Salem without stopping, but it holds a pleasant place in my memory because of those white-ribbon men.

Now comes a message from our brothers and sisters over the border. Helen M. Emery, of Fitch Bay, Quebec, writes: "Please try and find room for the following new idea. It is an entreaty from the honorary members of the W. C. T. U. of Fitch Bay, Stanstead county, Quebec, asking that a badge shall be given them, a metal or silver badge, with the letters W. C. T. U. upon it. They want something that will not soil as easily as the white ribbon, but can be worn constantly, and proclaim to the world that they belong to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

"And more than that they desire and predict not only a local popularity for their idea, but a world-wide adoption. They want something that shall be for the men what the white ribbon is to the women—a universal bond.

"The county convention held there June 11 and 12 was the scene of the request being presented, and several of the men spoke eagerly in favor of it.

"The president and some of the sisters seemed to be under the impression that it would be unconstitutional to adopt or sanction anything except the ribbon, as that was the badge of the W. C. T. U. The secretary reminded them that a celluloid pin had been made already, and sanctioned and worn by the officers of the National W. C. T. U. Now if these men are willing, nay, anxious, to adopt a universal badge which will be the means of gaining us many more associate members, should we not give them all the encouragement in our power?

"It was finally decided to refer the matter to the Provincial convention, to meet October 1, in Waterloo. In the meantime one of the gentlemen is hard at work designing a model."

This is a capital suggestion and we wish the various National W. C. T. U.'s the world over would consider the question and formally adopt a badge for honorary members. Just here a suggestion: since the celluloid white-ribbon pin is now so extensively used by both ladies and gentlemen, why is not it a fitting badge for them? It would strengthen the bonds uniting us more than the adoption of any new design, however beautiful, would do. The pin for gentlemen might be made smaller and with a long pin to wear on the necktie, and, if desired, the letters could be in colors to be more easily distinguished. Let us hear from our honoraries all over the world concerning this matter.

THAT PICTURE.

"How excellent!" was the involuntary exclamation of Mrs. Carse, Miss Pugh and Miss West, when Mr. Hall brought into their business meeting the water-color portrait of Miss Willard from which the premiums are to be printed, IF the requisite number of new subscribers is secured by August 1. We had no idea that the picture about which Mr. Hall has been talking in his department could reach such perfection, for we did not see, nor do we now, how anything so fine can be afforded on the terms offered. The picture was painted from life by one of Prang's best artists; he has caught perfectly the pose of the head, the clear, warm coloring, the eyes with their peculiar characteristics, the firm, sweet mouth, the expression her friends like best to see on Miss Willard's face. No other picture has so perfectly given all these, for all others are founded upon photographs, but this was painted from her living, breathing self.

The painting is now in this office awaiting orders for its reproduction. This process is too expensive to be undertaken for a less number than fifteen or twenty thousand, for the reproduction is even a greater work of art than was the original painting. It will be done by Prang, and will occupy several months; when completed, the copies can hardly be distinguished from the original picture, and one of these copies goes to every one of the 20,000 new subscribers. The union sending five new subscribers will receive the picture mounted and framed. Could we have a few hundred copies struck off to be used by canvassers, we are sure every one who could see them would subscribe for THE UNION SIGNAL in order to secure the picture. As this cannot be done, please take our word for it that the picture "is a thing of beauty," not a stiff photograph nor a dauby chromo, that it is a perfect likeness of Miss Willard in her happiest mood, something you will love to have, even if you possess, as most white-ribboners do, her photograph.

Special Difficulties.

PLEDGE.—"I hereby solemnly promise, God helping me, to abstain from all distilled, fermented and malt liquors, including Wine and Cider, and to employ all proper means to discourage the use of and traffic in the same."

A lady from the Pacific coast calls attention to the report made by a committee appointed by the Presbyterian General Assembly to ascertain the facts concerning the Nation's complicity with the rum traffic on the Congo; a government official told the committee that the United States had no responsibility in the matter, as it was not represented in the Berlin Conference. As this is not in accordance with a statement made in THE UNION SIGNAL, our correspondent asks us to give the facts and our authority for them. We sent the letter to Mr. Wm. T. Hornaday, as the one who is thoroughly posted on this subject, and here is his reply; in his book, "Free Rum on the Congo," published by the W. T. P. A., is a full discussion of the whole matter:

BUFFALO, N. Y., June 26, 1890.

The United States was fully and ably represented at the Berlin West African Conference held in 1885, when the Congo Free State was defined, and the celebrated "General Act" was passed. This Government was represented by Hon. John A. Kasson and H. S. Sanford (am not quite sure as to latter's initials), and these duly appointed and accredited representatives were aided by the advice of two American experts, Mr. H. M. Stanley and Mr. Wm. P. Tisdel. Our representatives took an active part in the deliberations, and signed all the protocols and the General Act, as did the representatives of the thirteen other nations participating. Mr. Kasson did his utmost to secure the adoption of a temperance clause in the General Act, but was unsuccessful. On the whole, up to that point the part this government took in the matter was proper and creditable.

After the adoption of the "act" by the Conference it had to be submitted to each of the governments represented for ratification by official signature. All the other governments save ours ratified it, and bound themselves to respect it. But, through the efforts of Mr. Perry Belmont and the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, this government, in a most childish, cowardly and even pusillanimous way, refused to ratify the act, and thus discredited our representatives and our own dignity and self-respect as a nation. It was about the smallest thing this great nation ever did, and the act subjected us to the contempt of the other nations participating in the conference. I imagine Secretary Blaine is heartily ashamed of what was done then.

Therefore, we have nothing to say now (officially) in regard to anything that is done or not done in the Congo Free State. We have deliberately thrown away our right to have a voice in the direction of African affairs, which we could have had for nothing had Mr. Belmont acted like a man instead of a baby.

Yours very truly,

W. T. HORNADAY.

Our Book Table.

The records of a noble life help other lives to be noble. Such a record is that of the life of George H. Stuart, written by himself, at the earnest solicitation of his friends, during the later months of his life when failing strength shut him out from business. After his death, Robert Ellis Thompson, D. D., of the University of Pennsylvania, who for more than thirty years had revered Mr. Stuart as a father, edited his manuscript, bringing it out in its present attractive form. Like John Grubb Richardson, whom he somewhat resembles in character, Mr. Stuart was an Ulster man, and possessed in a marked degree the best characteristics of the rugged Scotch-Irish race. He came to America as a boy, and in course of time became one of the merchant princes of Philadelphia, yet retained through all changing fortunes the direct simplicity, the strong faith in God and devotion to duty which early characterized him. His philanthropies were broad as the world; America will long revere him as the father of the Christian Commission. His story of war days, in hospital, field-tent and on battle ground, will be read with intense interest, North and South. Indeed, the book is one of exceptional interest throughout. Published by J. M. Stoddard & Co., Philadelphia. $1.50.

PLEAS FOR PROHIBITION, by Samuel W. Small, is dedicated to "the young men of our country upon whom the duties and responsibilities of our nation are daily falling, and upon whose loyalty to the principle of prohibition must largely depend the future peace, prosperity and glory of the American people," and it is worthy of its dedication and its constituency. Whoever expects to find in this book anything eccentric and sensational will be disappointed. It is a most calm, clear, convincing presentation of facts and arguments, proving with irresistible logic that there is no other way to cure the evils which spring from the liquor traffic than total prohibition. These pleas are made in Mr. Small's strong, earnest way, and must convince every unprejudiced mind. We wish every young man—every body, for that matter—would read it, for we believe the book well calculated to be an immense power for good. Alfred Mudge & Co., 24 Franklin street, Boston. Price 75 cents.

Henry Wood, author of "Natural Law in the Business World," has published a novel, EDWARD BURTON. As he says, he has made no attempt to construct a novel upon conventional "realistic" lines. He denies having modeled his characters upon real people, thus escaping the usual dullness of novels "founded upon fact." It aims toward high ideals, presents the bright side of human nature, with just enough shadow to bring out the brightness. The scene is laid in Boston and Bar Harbor, and its local coloring is strong and pleasing. Published by Lee & Shepard, Boston. For sale by A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago. Price $1.25.

MYSTERY OF SUFFERING, by James H. Brookes, D. D., published by the Gospel Publishing Company, No. 10 Arcade Court, Chicago.

"He who would fathom the mystery of suffering must first fathom the mystery of sin," says Dr. Brookes. "Inspired Scripture is explicit in the statement that if there had been no sin, there had been no suffering." He goes down very deep into his subject, and sustains every page by Scripture quotations. "The Spirit of God knows more than the higher critics, who probably know less than anybody," he says while discussing modern attempts to turn Satan, Job, and other Old Testament characters into myths. With vigorous strokes he knocks the props out from under Christian Science, and brings out most beautifully the office of the Comforter, the Holy Ghost, Heart of the church, as Christ is its Head, who presents the mother aspect of the divine nature. The whole book is full of strong points.

AMONG THE MAGAZINES.

In OUR DAY for June, Joseph Cook, in speaking of American opportunities in Africa, takes the nation to task, sharply, yet justly, for its shameful neutrality in the efforts of civilized nations to put down the slave-trade. We agreed in the Ashburton treaty to put our ships side by side with those of England in repressing piracy and the slave-trade on the high seas, but we have kept, only in a negligent, loose sort of a way, that high engagement. We did something for civilization in Africa when we favored the formation of the Congo Free state; we were represented at the Berlin conference in this matter, but while several advanced European nations have formed a league for the protection of that state and the promotion of commerce in equatorial Africa, we have kept out of that noble company. Nor is our record regarding the rum traffic any more creditable. Canon Farrar says that facts justify the amazing statement that the slave-trade is already surpassed by the rum-trade in injury inflicted upon the Dark Continent, along the banks of its great central river. Not everywhere does the rum do the more injury, but in the most accessible regions, and especially on the banks of the Congo, the souls and the bodies that are burned up largely by American rum are more numerous than those destroyed by the Arab slave-trade. "In some parts of Africa the demijohn of rum has recently become the unit on which are reckoned all values of food, produce and labor." Is it not about time that America, "the land of the free and the home of the brave," should, by national power, stop the exportation of American rum to enslave Africa?

Mr. Stanley's paper in Scribner's is a most remarkable one, not so much in what it tells of Emin Pasha's Relief as in what it tells of Stanley himself. Some passages in it read like a nineteenth century version of the seventy-eighth Psalm. Here is one of them: "Constrained at the darkest hour to humbly confess that without God's help I was helpless, I vowed a vow in the forest solitudes that I would confess his aid before men. Silence as of death was round about me; it was midnight; I was weakened by illness, prostrated by fatigue, and wan with anxiety for my white and black companions whose fate was a mystery. In this physical and mental distress I besought God to give me back my people. Nine hours later we were exulting with rapturous joy." At another time when Mazamboni with his myriads was ready to attack Stanley's little company, of whose courage and steadfastness he had grave doubts, it appeared to him as though he heard a voice saying, "Be strong and of good courage; fear not, nor be afraid of them; for the Lord thy God, He it is that doth go with thee; He will not fail thee nor forsake thee." When the next day Mazamboni commanded his people to attack and exterminate the little company, Stanley says, "they found not a coward among them, whereas, the evening before we exclaimed in bitterness, on seeing four men fly before one native, 'And these are the wretches with whom we must reach the Pasha!'"

Miss West left the city June 30, for Lexington, Ky., where she conducts a two weeks' School of Methods at the Kentucky Chautauqua. She reports an excellent school with more than seventy names enrolled on the first day.

A lady asked Dean Wright this question: "The relation of husband and wife just as it was then known, was used by the apostle to symbolize the relation of Christ and the church. Is not this always one of headship?" His reply to her is this: "My understanding of the doctrine in Eph. 5: 23–33 is given in the following statement: 'The relation of Christ to the church is used by Paul to symbolize the real relation of the husband to the wife, not as it was then known, but as it ought to have been known, and as it ought to be known to the end of time.' The difference in the two statements is similar to the following: This is a horse chestnut: This is a chestnut horse."

All over the country an increasing amount of good work is being done in Chautauquas by ladies. At the central Chautauqua, N. Y., Mrs. Emily Wakefield gives a series of lectures on "The Literature of the East;" Mrs. Charles Waldo Richards gives readings from the poets; Mrs. Emma P. Ewing discusses various themes connected with home making; Mrs. Abba Gould Woolson continues her incomparable historical lectures; Miss Jane M. Bancroft and Lucy Rider Meyer discuss Deaconesses; Helen Campbell gives a series of lectures on Social Economics and Women; Alice Freeman Palmer delivers the address on Recognition Day; and other honorable women are on the program. Bay View presents the names of Mary A. Livermore, Margaret Sangster, Marion Harland, Angie F. Newman, Alice M. Guernsey; Fryeburg, Me., those of Mrs. Livermore, Mrs. Alice Freeman Palmer, Mrs. Bottome and Miss Barrows; Miss Willard speaks at a number of Chautauquas, and scarcely one can be found which does not include some woman on its program.

The Chicago Kindergarten Training School for teachers, mothers and nurses is doing a grand work. The courses for mothers and for teachers occupy three years each, that for nurses one year. The teachers' course fits for teaching in kindergarten, after the most approved methods, not differing fundamentally from similar courses elsewhere. The mothers' course is unique, and a sign of great promise, pointing to the time when what Frœbel styles "The Science of Motherhood," shall be recognized as the most important of sciences. The class is the outgrowth of the mothers' meetings so successfully conducted by Mrs. Elizabeth Harrison, in various parts of the city. The central class, at the Art Institute, is conducted by her, and branch classes, at which the tuition is placed very low, are conducted by her assistants in different localities, thus bringing the benefits of the work within the reach of all. Full particulars can be learned by addressing Miss Alice McRoy, Art Institute Building, Chicago.

Old records brought to light in Derby, Vt., show that a Woman's Temperance society was formed there in 1842. Mrs. Maria Newcomb was secretary; she has only lately gone up higher. Her secretary's book gives the constitution and by-laws of this forerunner of the W. C. T. U., and the names of three hundred leading ladies of Derby and adjacent towns as members. They agreed to meet once in two weeks, to give their patronage to those merchants only who did not sell liquor and to do all in their power to discourage its use.

Nebraska state penitentiary has been the scene of much good work by Christian women; the last evolution in this line is a Chautauqua circle of forty-eight men among its prisoners. The class started last October, and is being the means of a great uplift among them, not only intellectually but spiritually. The meetings of the circle are held on the Sabbath, and bring the religious element strongly to the front. It has been a common saying in that prison when an inmate dies: "he has gone to pushing clouds." This Chautauqua work is "pushing clouds" from many a darkened soul therein. The warden testifies to the good result of this work upon the men; says not one of the class of forty-eight has been reported since commencing the course in October. They are serious and in earnest, diligent at their work, respectful, cleanly in person and fulfill all prison requirements cheerfully.

WORLD'S W. C. T. U.

WORK AT HAMILTON, ONTARIO.

We have seventeen active working departments. Under scientific temperance we have accomplished its teaching in our public schools as an examination and prize study on the same footing as other branches of study. Have also this year offered three gold and silver medal prizes for best essay on physiological aspect to collegiate institute students, to be written during holidays. In the department of literature we publish our own leaflets and distribute them in fifteen churches; in this way about eight thousand are scattered monthly. We also have boxes in all our railway stations, city hall, fire stations, Y. M. C. A. rooms and police stations. At our municipal elections we distributed thirty thousand leaflets of local interest entitled "Hamilton Treasury Out of Pocket."

In the department of press work our two dailies give up half a column weekly for temperance work.

We try to have from four to five lectures during the season. We have had unfermented wine introduced into certain churches, and others have it under consideration. In the department of jail work we have a Rescue Home where we take the women from jail, keep them until we are convinced of their change, and then get situations for them. Only one woman has returned to jail and back to her bad habits. We do not find any need of a police matron, and the chief says there are so few commitments that a matron is not required. We find our chief of great assistance, for he telephones the case of any young girl who requires looking after, and in this way we can stay them in their downward course before too late.

We have a library in connection with the hospital of one hundred volumes. Our department of legal work includes petitions, conferences with license commissions, and municipal work during elections. The monthly church prayer-meetings, devoted to temperance, have been a great help to us.

In evangelistic labors we have two Bible women at work; hold two mothers' meetings; two hundred families are relieved in a pecuniary way and visited weekly; also work procured for them, prayer-meetings held and literature distributed; there are two circulating libraries in connection with this branch, of two hundred volumes.

Our Y's are busy with six Bands of Hope, two sewing schools and cooking school, 1,900 children meeting weekly, and 3,000 pledged, also a Dorcas branch of forty young ladies who have made and given away one hundred garments to the poor, beside filling orders and keeping a woman supplied with a basket of aprons, by which she supported herself and family; also a branch of King's Daughters among working girls—fifty-five of these; also a Y formed in the Ladies' college.

The department of social purity is just starting a newsboys' home and working boys' club.

A MONTH IN AROOSTOOK COUNTY.

At the call of the "elect ladies" of the Aroostook county W. C. T. U. a part of May and June were given to work in this most northerly and easterly corner of Uncle Sam's territory, bordering on the Queen's dominions. But four of the towns of this extensive county are situated on the railroad, these being Houlton, Fort Fairfield, Caribou and Presque Isle, so it was hoped that the traveling might become sufficiently settled by the time of this engagement to render carriage driving easy. This proved to be a vain hope; for, owing to the unusual lateness of the season, the roads were in a terrible condition, and days without rain proved to be the exception. But nothing could daunt the courage of the W. C. T. U. women, who took me from point to point of the two hundred and forty miles which we were obliged to cover in reaching unions situated at distances from the railroad varying from eight to twenty-five miles. As for myself, the compensations greatly outweighed the discomforts. There was awakened nature, putting on some new beauty every day in this "garden of Maine;" there were the kindly welcomes that awaited us everywhere, and the inspiration of finding in remote places earnest women, intelligently loyal to our blessed cause. It costs something to be loyal here, for this is one of the few places in the land where the "non-partisans" have gained a foothold, and in doing this they have divided, in some instances, "chief friends," for example, the county president of the loyal unions and the county president of the "non-partisan" organizations are sisters, as are also the county recording secretary of the "W's," and the local president of one of the largest "N. P's." It is a real test of principle to stand firm in such circumstances, and never have I met more shining examples of this than in these county officers and their grand co-laborers. Some women were found who had unwittingly joined a society which had the sweetly familiar sound of W. C. T. U., and were greatly surprised when informed that they were not organized under Miss Willard's leadership, being entirely certain that they desired to be loyal to her. Others, expressing great admiration for our beloved leader, signified their desire to hear both sides of the matter. One Episcopal rector who asked me to explain the cause of division in our ranks, listened carefully to my explanation, and emphatically exclaimed at its close: "Yours is the only logical position."

An entirely unique feature to me were the "Independent Y's" (whatever that may mean), which have been organized here. I kindly informed them, whenever opportunity occurred, that they had no right to the name, and that they were suffering untold loss in their work from their lack of connection with Mrs. Barnes, the Oak and Ivy Leaf, and the many helps prepared for our young women.

Twenty-five public addresses were given, several afternoon talks to ladies and children, two unions organized, four Loyal Temperance Legions started, and instructions given for organizing others. At several of the evening meetings the Legion children marched into the hall and furnished a part of the music. At Limestone, it was their busy hands that had decorated the hall with potted plants, evergreens, etc., while the boys all wore, as decorations, red, white and blue caps, and the girls red sashes, in addition to their badges. At Monticello the whole Loyal Temperance Legion company escorted the speaker to the church, who repaid their courtesy by giving a part of the address directly to them. At New Limerick an apparently insurmountable obstacle opposed itself in the form of an undried coat of paint on the interior of the school-house, the only available meeting place. But woman's wit was not slow to supply the deficiency. A partly completed church was not only made to serve as an auditorium by steps improvised outside and a platform and seats inside, but was turned into a bower of beauty by mottoes, bunting, evergreen and potted plants, and even an organ and home-like decorations for the platform were not lacking. Eight miles in the country one quiet Sunday morning, the speaker addressed the people in a school-house, where even the unsightly stove, and the much-abused desk on the platform had been made to blossom into beauty, and best of all, the assembled company were eagerly waiting for the truth. The wonder in many places, after observing the sparsely settled country and the bad roads, was where the audience came from. In Linneus, with a union of twenty-seven members, twenty-eight copies of THE UNION SIGNAL are taken; the superintendent of literature canvassed the town in its interests, recommending it to those outside the union as a most desirable family paper. With pride she informed me that the W. C. T. U. had just obtained possession of a hall for headquarters, which had been a great source of trouble on account of the questionable purposes for which it had been used.

A visit of special interest was that to New Sweden, a settlement entirely composed of Swedes, who were brought from their own land to this point, which was then primeval forest, in the year 1870, by Hon. W. W. Thomas, of Maine. A few of the original log houses built for them by the state are still standing, but it is wonderful to see what their thrift and industry have accomplished within these twenty years. The choir of young people rendered two hymns in Swedish and one in English; we were sure that the Lord understood the earnest words of the minister's prayer, though we did not. One of the elder women said to me at the close of the meeting, "I tell my husband when we get home what you said, for he could not understand you; but he understands enough not to drink or smoke." At Bridgewater our host was a man who, holding a custom house office, with a salary of three dollars per day for duties which were merely nominal, had deliberately relinquished it on account of his conversion to the Prohibition Party. It was inspiring to hear his manly confession that allegiance to the God whom he serves required this sacrifice at his hands, and he dared not refuse. We think one of the W. C. T. U. members of one of the country unions unconsciously furnished an explanation of the consecrated earnestness which characterizes the loyal unions of Aroostook county, when she said, "Our W. C. T. U. is not large, but every woman of us is a stanch Prohibitionist." In my judgment neither Aroostook county nor any other part of the union has anything to fear from "non-partisan" organizations. Doubtless many conscientious sisters will join them; but they do not embody enough of vital principle to retain for any great length of time earnest women who desire to make their work count most for God and for humanity.

TEMPERANCE AND GOSPEL WORK AMONG THE CHINESE.

For twenty-five years there has been a steady tide of emigration setting into America from China. At first the "little brown man" was cordially welcomed as a much-needed helper indoors and out, a quick-witted, dexterous, tough little human machine, invaluable in a hundred ways. But the Mongolian came in too great numbers, learned too fast, crowded out both Bridget and Pat, and therefore made himself particularly odious to these emigrants from the other side of the world. Brother Jonathan himself began to fear competition, and rivalry took the place of friendliness. Politicians laid hold of the problem, and lo! the "Restriction Act." Nevertheless poor John is here, and in great numbers. Not a large city but has its Chinese quarter, not a little town where Sing Hop is an unknown factor. To the political economist this may mean one thing or another, but to the Christian it means paganism at our door, a call for every child of the kingdom to be a missionary.

But how, when, where? The W. C. T. U. makes answer. We have a foreign work department with its superintendent and her assistants. Nowhere are the Chinese so abundant as in California, and here in San Jose is located an assistant superintendent, Mrs. M. S. Carey, who has the Chinese as her special province. For twenty years she has been a faithful missionary among them, and no one knows their needs better than does she. She loves them and carries them constantly on her heart and in her prayers. They love and respect her, and always speak of her as their friend. She has gathered together a store of leaflets and tracts written expressly for these poor heathen, either by missionaries who speak the Chinese language, or by friends who have found capable translators, and these leaflets and tracts can be bought by any one for a trifling price and then sown as good seed wherever there is opportunity. Here is a list of some of them:

"Have You Thought About It?" a six-page tract telling in clear style the evil effects of opium and strong drink, written by Mrs. Nellie B. Eyster, of California, and translated into Chinese; price two cents per copy or $1.75 per hundred. "Opium, Tobacco and Wine," by Dr. J. G. Kerr, of Canton; same price as above. "Rum and Opium," an illustrated leaflet; one cent each. "An Easy Prayer;" five cents per dozen. "The Book of Proverbs;" two cents each. "Parables," illustrated sheets; four for five cents. "Who is Jesus?" leaflet; eight cents per dozen. "Reward and Punishment, leaflet; five cents per dozen. "God Governs the World;" four for five cents. New Testament in paper covers, twenty cents each.

Every Chinaman can read. Send for these tracts. Enclose postage, which is one cent per ounce on all printed matter. A full list of leaflets sent on application. Address Mrs. M. S. Carey, 506 South Second street, San Jose, Cal. Surely here is an open door for those who long to do something for Christ. MARY H. FIELD.

NEW YORK.

NIAGARA COUNTY CONVENTION.

This met at Newfane June 5 and 6. In the absence of the president, the meeting was called to order by the first vice-president, Mrs. Ruth Frost, who presided with grace and dignity throughout the entire session.

This county is doing work in sixteen departments, under the management of some of our most capable women, all of whom seem deeply interested in their special work, and nearly all report progress. A workers' conference was a very helpful exercise, during a part of the first day and was enjoyed by all. Words of welcome were spoken to us by Mrs. P. Corwin, of Newfane, and these were responded to briefly by the corresponding secretary in behalf of the convention. The clergy also greeted us most cordially.

In the evening session came the treat of the convention, when for an hour and a half Dr. Anna Shaw discoursed on her favorite theme, carrying conviction to the hearts of many. None can listen to this gifted speaker without feeling that truly the good of the country demands that the ballot shall be placed in the hands of women. She was also with us during the next morning, and opened the question-box. This feature of any convention is a means of education. This time it was especially so, her replies being full of pith and point.

Reports of officers were given the second day, that of the treasurer being the most satisfactory, as it showed a balance in the treasury. A little more than one hundred voting delegates were reported by the credential committee, after which officers were elected for the coming year as follows: President, Mrs. Ruth A. Frost; first vice-president, Miss Laura Newbury; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Frances W. Graham; recording secretary, Mrs. Mary S. Williams; treasurer, Mrs. Lucy T. Fuller. A memorial service was conducted by Miss Alma Swain in an impressive manner. Ten members have passed away since our last annual meeting, leaving sweet memories of faithfulness during their life-time.

Arrangements were made for taking up the work at the Lake Shore Temperance Camp, and superintendents were appointed for the different departments for the coming year. An invitation to hold our next convention at Middleport was gratefully accepted, and the corresponding secretary instructed to procure Miss Willard for speaker if possible. Mrs. Emma G. Dietrick was elected delegate to the National convention at Atlanta. This closed one of the pleasantest and most profitable conventions of this county. FRANCES W. GRAHAM, Cor. Sec.

SEMI-ANNUAL CONVENTION OF STEUBEN COUNTY.

This convened at North Cohocton, May 15 and 16; officers all present except one. An excellent program was carried out. Devotional meetings were full of interest and fervor. The convention was called to order by the president, Mrs. Anna E. Branch. Twelve unions were represented. Reports were encouraging. The address of welcome by Mrs. Emily Gilbert gave us at once a home feeling; this was fittingly responded to by Mrs. L. M. Orcutt.

The papers read by Mrs. Maude Thompson on "Sabbath Observance," Mrs. Powers on "Reform," also Mrs. Bella Walker on "What Can we Do About It?" deserve worthy mention. The interesting exercises given by the children, together with the instructive address by Mrs. Way, was appreciated and enjoyed by all. The recitations rendered by Miss Minnie Hatch, Miss Anna Lisenring and Mrs. Eaton, added much to the interest of the occasion. The music was highly appreciated.

The address of the evening was given by Mrs. Lytie P. Davies, state superintendent of scientific instruction; her address was most excellent. The M. E. ministers of North Cohocton and Cohocton were present, and rendered valuable service. The convention was royally entertained by the people of North Cohocton; the church was tastefully decorated with flowers, the tables laden with the choicest viands and everything possible was done for our pleasure and comfort. We shall long remember the good received at this meeting, and expect in future to report growth and advancement in all departments of work.

MRS. E. G. W. HALL.

IOWA.

DELAWARE COUNTY CONVENTION.

This met in the Christian Church at Greeley, May 21 and 22. The convention was called to order by our president, Mrs. F. B. Doolittle. After reading the 23d and 24th Psalms, prayer was offered, followed by singing, "Jesus, Lover of My Soul."

The afternoon session was devoted to appointments of committees, and reports of secretaries of local unions.

The evening session was held in the M. E. Church, Mrs. R. L. Wallace conducting the devotional exercises. Mrs. Drybread cordially and earnestly welcomed the ladies to the homes of Greeley. Rev. Mr. Martindale, pastor of the Christian Church, followed, extending a hearty welcome in behalf of the churches. Mrs. M. U. Wheeler happily responded. Rev. A. M. Collins, D. D., then gave an interesting address on the "Progress and Triumphs of the Temperance Reform." The lecture, presented in an able and convincing manner, was full of truths.

In the morning Mrs. C. E. Merriam conducted devotional exercises. The forenoon was occupied with reports of superintendents of departments. One of special interest was the report of Mrs. J. P. Ball on social purity.

Devotional exercises were led in the afternoon by Mrs.

J. M. Smith. Greetings were sent to the Clayton county convention in session at Edgewood.

A beautiful and impressive service was held in memory of Mrs. Dr. Bradley, Mrs. Cora Allison Porter, Mrs. H. G. Millen, and Miss Laura Minkler, during which Mr. Frank Martindale sang that always new hymn, "Jesus, Lover of My Soul."

In the evening Dr. Collins again addressed the convention, his subject being "High License." The benediction was pronounced by Rev. Martindale. The entire session was full of interest and enthusiasm.

ONE OF THE Y's.

JOURNEYINGS.

We held a large and very enthusiastic meeting at Denison in the handsome hall of the brick building owned by the W. C. T. U. A good number of new members were added to the union. From these, May 22, at Radcliffe a large audience greeted us, and twelve honorary and three active members were added. May 23 I spoke at Albion in the chapel of the Academy well filled with intelligent citizens and students, notwithstanding the enemy circulated the false report during the day that a fee was to be charged at the door for the lecture. I next spoke for the Harlan union to more than two hundred people in the Covenanter's church, five miles from any village.

The following day we organized the Willard union at Clarinda and visited the empty county jail, where they have not had a prisoner through intoxication for two years. In this town the year before prohibition there were five saloons paying a license of $500 each, and beside this a tax of one per cent was called for to pay the running expenses of the town. At the end of the year they were in debt, but the next year after the saloon was outlawed, a one-half per cent tax paid the running expenses of the town and left a surplus in the treasury.

Sunday, June 1, in the capital city, Des Moines, we held a meeting for women only, in the afternoon, and a general meeting in the evening, and eighteen active and five honorary members were added to the Temple union.

June 3, I spoke at the Floyd county convention at Marble Rock, and at midnight started in the most terrible thunder storm for Sioux City to attend the district convention, where I was to speak June 4 and 5.

The storm kept raging, trains were wrecked on several roads, bridges went down, and the track was washed out, causing a delay of twenty-eight hours in reaching my appointment. However, God spared my life and enabled me to reach Sioux City just in time to speak the second evening. The beautiful portrait of that grand martyr, George Haddock, hung back of the pulpit and seemed an inspiration in the convention. Their most worthy president, Mrs. Shesler, was reëlected.

HELEN L. BULLOCK.

WORK OF MRS. BULLOCK.

The Hopkinton, Iowa, W. C. T. U. has recently enjoyed a time of refreshing from the presence and labors of Mrs. Hellen L. Bullock. Some of us voted to have Mrs. Bullock come thinking she was a non-partisan woman; when she came we learned she was not; we also learned that she has little time to devote to anything but her special work, and we fully realize that she has done us good and not evil by her work among us. Her talent and ability in her department work are certainly exceptional. Would that our Iowa unions might all hear Mrs. Bullock on narcotics. The pastor of the M. E. Church, Rev. Mr. Lockard, with his wife, tendered the union the hospitality of their church and home, the use of their horse and buggy during the two days and nights Mrs. Bullock spent with us, kindnesses which were gladly accepted.

The M. E. Church was made attractive and pleasant with beautiful plants and flowers. A large audience greeted the speaker and listened with close and earnest attention to her clear statements, startling facts and unanswerable arguments relating to the evil of narcotics. At the close of the lecture seventeen new members were added to the Hopkinton union. Five gentlemen also testified their interest by taking honorary memberships.

On the 15th an afternoon meeting was held in the Presbyterian Church, and Mrs. Bullock gave a talk to women that was brimful of interest and instruction. At four p. m. Mr. and Mrs. W. F. Doolittle opened their parlors for a temperance tea. The W. C. T. U. ladies met and enjoyed a charming social hour with Mrs. Bullock. At 8 p. m. in Sand Spring, four miles east of Hopkinton, Mrs. Bullock gave her second lecture. An appreciative audience heard with delight and admiration the truths so forcibly and effectually presented. After the lecture a new union with eighteen members and seven honorary members was organized, and will be known as the Sand Spring union. Six new subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL were secured. Mrs. Bullock left us but one regret—the brevity of her stay. Our wish is that she may visit us soon again. MRS. R. T. WALLACE.

TENTH DISTRICT CONVENTION.

Our eighth annual convention was held in Algona June 10 and 11 in the Congregational Church the first day, and holding its sessions on Wednesday in the Methodist Church. The meetings were full of interest throughout. Mrs. L. S. Brown served most acceptably for the first time as district president and was unanimously chosen for another year. Mrs. Gertrude F. Smart was chosen secretary and Mrs. Edna M. Cropley, treasurer. Mrs. M. J. Aldrich was present and gave a most able and inspiring address, dwelling principally upon "Prohibition and Woman Suffrage." The address was listened to by a large and appreciative audience.

Excellent papers were read by Miss May Clark and Miss Tillie Cramer, the one entitled "Benevolence and the W. C. T. U.," the other, "The Central Figure in the W. C. T. U." The convention manifested its appreciation of these papers by rising in a body.

Prof. J. C. Gilchrist, of the Northern Iowa Normal school, spoke upon the power and influence of good literature; all felt very grateful for his excellent words on this occasion. Mrs. Hale read a good paper upon "Seed-Sowing," and with Mrs. A. M. Horton, conducted a children's meeting which was one of the pleasant features of the convention. Col. Duncan was present and gave a talk upon "Franchise," which was listened to with close attention, and was heartily applauded.

Miss Clara A. Stephens, of Des Moines, and her friend, Miss Estey, were present during a part of the sessions. The pastors of the churches rendered efficient aid, and the choirs of the Congregational, Methodist and Baptist churches furnished choice and beautiful music. All regretted the absence of Rev. Marion Murdock, who was to have delivered an address but was detained because of the death of one of her parishioners. Greeting was sent by the convention to the National Temperance Congress, convened on the same day in Broadway Tabernacle, New York. A resolution was adopted to set forth the claims of THE UNION SIGNAL, The Iowa Messenger, and The Woman's Standard. These papers received the hearty indorsement of the convention. Also a resolution that we stand upon the original non-sectarian and non-partisan platform adopted by both the National and state W. C. T. U. Also a resolution that we extend our sympathy and aid to Nebraska in her noble effort to secure prohibition in that state.

We cannot speak too highly of the harmony and helpfulness of the tenth district convention. It was pervaded by a spirit of earnestness and sisterly good-will which was truly commendable, and we believe all present will go forth to another year's effort with stronger faith and courage to sustain the good and overcome the evil, because of the words said and the spirit manifested in this convention. LICKING COUNTY CONVENTION.

This met in the town hall of Johnston, Tuesday, May 20. The meeting was opened with devotional exercises. Delegates were met with cordial hospitality and conducted into the audience room, which was fast being filled with women of the white ribbon army.

The address of welcome was given by a young lady of the Johnston Y; it was an able effort. The report of the National Convention was received. Reports were called for from the different unions, all of which reported constant work.

A letter was read from Mrs. Monroe, stating her inability to be with the convention on account of illness. A committee was appointed to procure a speaker for the evening. Mrs. Bethel, of Columbus, kindly responded.

In the afternoon the election of officers resulted as follows: Mrs. Eggleson, president; Mrs. M. A. Hill, vice-president; Miss Deary, secretary; Mrs. Rusler, treasurer. A paper was read by Miss Mary Boyd, of the Utica Y, entitled "Young Woman's Work." Miss Stella Johnston gave a recitation which had won for her the medal in the Demorest contest April last.

In the evening "A Voice from the Poorhouse" was given by Miss Cumings; song, "A Drunkard's Child;" a paper was read by Mrs. Bovard on evangelistic work, of which she is the local superintendent. A duet was given by two little girls. The address by Mrs. Bethel was full of courage and hope in the realization of the success of our work. After the collection a song was given by a male quartette, and the benediction was pronounced by the Rev. Mr. Hawk.

MISS M. A. ADAMS.

MORROW COUNTY CONVENTION.

The annual convention of the W. C. T. U. of Morrow county was held at Morton's Corners, May 27, in the Methodist Church, which had been decorated with beautiful flowers and plants. The convention was called to order by the president, Mrs. M. P. Robb, at ten a. m. The proceedings of the convention were harmonious and earnest. Each session was opened with devotional exercises. At roll-call each superintendent responded by reciting a verse of Scripture. Reports of the different unions showed a good degree of interest in the work. One new union has been organized during the year, and one re-organized which has taken on new life. Three new Loyal Temperance Legions have been formed.

A cordial address of welcome was given by Mrs. Lizzie Osborne, and was responded to by Mrs. Wood. Excellent papers were read on the following subjects: "The Value of Prayer in our Temperance Work," by Mrs. Minerva Osborne; "The Master's Claim on Christian Women in Temperance Work," by Mrs. Jenkins; "How can We Interest our Women in Temperance Work?" by Mrs. Doty; "Press Work," by Mrs. Hickman; "No new Thing under the Sun," by Mrs. Hammond. A number of recitations were given by the children during the convention. Miss Olmstead, state superintendent of White Cross and social purity, gave a very interesting address on Mothers' Meetings, and conducted the question-box in a pleasing and instructive manner. Music was furnished by the church choir, and Mrs. Mossman, of Westerville, was present and cheered us with her sweet singing.

Miss Olmstead gave the address of the evening, on "High License," which was able and convincing.

FAIRFIELD COUNTY CONVENTION.

Our fifteenth semi-annual convention met with the Central union in North Main street Methodist Church, Bridgeport, Tuesday, June 10. The church was well filled at all sessions. Fifteen of the nineteen unions in the county were represented by delegates, and two more by reports. About seventy delegates were in attendance at the morning session. At 9 a. m. a devotional service was conducted by Mrs. Bulkley, of Southport.

The claims of the Temperance Temple were presented by Mrs. Holmes. A paper on "Narcotics" was read by Grace I. Curtiss. With the noontide prayer the convention adjourned.

After a bountiful collation, served in the dining-hall of the church, the convention resumed its session at 1:15. Devotional exercises were conducted by Mrs. Chapman. An address was delivered by our state president, Mrs. Forbes, who was with us all day. Reports from local unions were resumed, after which a most interesting paper on "Jail Work" was read by Mrs. Devereaux. The pastor of the church was present during a part of the day, and gave us hearty encouragement. The election of officers was conducted by Mrs. Forbes. The officers chosen were: President, Mrs. E. Palmer; secretary, Grace I. Curtiss; treasurer, Mrs. F. A. Nettleton. The workers' conference was most interesting and helpful. This, with the parliamentary drill which followed, was conducted by Mrs. Andrews. A Bible reading by Mrs. E. A. Chapman was held in the evening, prefaced by Loyal Temperance Legion exercises. The company connected with the Central union were out in force with their banner, and did themselves and their leader much credit.

A new and most delightful feature of the occasion was the "convention choir," led by the Rev. Mr. Withington, who were present at both sessions and during the evening, and furnished inspiring music. This is the first time Fairfield county has been so favored, but we hope the custom may be continued at future conventions.

Reports from local unions were most encouraging, indicating activity and growth in many departments of work. We are invited to hold our autumn convention with the Greenwich union. GRACE I. CURTISS, Sec.

NORTH CAROLINA.

JOTTINGS OF WORK.

We are now sending out from our headquarters at Greensboro the call for our state convention at Concord July 17-19, at which time we hope to have our beloved Miss Willard and Miss Gordon with us. We are also issuing the call for the first annual convention of the colored members of the W. C. T. U. to be held in Greensboro July 15 and 16. Miss Willard and Miss Gordon will give them valuable aid in forming a state organization. We are preparing for the feast which Miss Willard is to spread for the people of Greensboro and the surrounding country on the evening of July 16, in the most suitable building that we can procure for the purpose.

Circulars and personal letters in regard to our Summer Assembly at Asheville are going out from headquarters throughout the states of Georgia, South Carolina, Tennessee and North Carolina. This Assembly will be held July 21 to August 4, and among the prominent workers in attendance will be Dean Wright, Miss Willard, Mary Allen West, Miss Gordon, Miss Griffin, Miss Scovel and Mrs. Chapin. The officers of the Assembly are: Mrs. M. L. Wells, of Tennessee, president; Miss Anna Aston, of Asheville, secretary; Mrs. W. M. Cocke, of Asheville, secretary. Our state organizer, Mrs. Sue V. Tomlinson, is forming new unions in Western North Carolina. We believe that the outlook for our work here is hopeful.

NEBRASKA.

TWELFTH DISTRICT CONVENTION.

This was held at Ainsworth May 28 and 29 and was a very interesting session. The white ribbon societies were represented by cheering reports of enthusiastic delegates from Ewing on the east, to the extreme northwest, and from beyond the Niobara on the north.

Mrs. Abbie Gay Dustin was reëlected president; her arduous and self-sacrificing work in past years was indorsed by being given every vote of the convention upon the informal ballot. The remaining officers were chosen as follows: Mrs. Howard, vice-president-at-large; Mrs. May A. Skirving, corresponding secretary; Mrs. C. A. Barleigh, recording secretary; Mrs. Chaney, treasurer; Mrs. Olive M. Leader, district organizer.

Mrs. C. M. Woodward, National W. C. T. U. lecturer, was in attendance during the entire session, a most welcome visitor. Mrs. Woodward confines herself entirely to her own state, and her devotion to Nebraska finds a response in the hearts of the women, who under her teaching and drill in school of methods in nearly all district and county conventions are pushing the battle to the gates. MRS. MAY A. SKIRVING, Sec.

PREBLE COUNTY CONVENTION.

Our third annual convention met in the Universalist church in Eaton, May 27. The address of welcome given by Hon. A. C. Risinger, mayor of the city, was full of encouragement and good cheer to the members of the W. C. T. U., and gave us new zeal in our glorious work of saving the fallen. The response, given by Mrs. Belle Elliott, county president, was fully appreciated by all present. The reports from local unions and county superintendents were very encouraging.

Mrs. H. E. Hammond, of Cleveland, was in attendance during the day; she gave a very interesting speech on "the enforcement of present laws." Her wise answers and counsels in conducting the question-box showed her to be equal to any occasion.

Miss Jennie Defenbaugh's paper on "Temperance Temple Work" was well read and appreciated, giving the hearers a new inspiration to work for its completion. The subject, "The Relation the Church Should Sustain to the Temperance Cause," was well handled by Rev. Rebecca Kershner. We were glad that one of our number could so ably set before the people that great question. A conference on the question, "What is the Vital Need of the W. C. T. U.?" brought out quite an animated discussion by the ladies and ministers present. The thought of some one expressed was, "More faith in answers to prayer and a greater effort on our own part to answer our own prayers."

Mrs. H. E. Hammond gave a good lecture in the city hall in the evening, pleading with the people to work for the overthrow of the liquor traffic.

FLOWER MISSION WORK IN INDIANAPOLIS.

On the morning of June 9, committees from the Central and West Side W. C. T. unions of this city, met in the rooms of the former to prepare for the observance of the flower mission anniversary. Those present were earnest and untiring in this labor of love for the unfortunate. Many tender, loving thoughts went out to that patient sufferer, Miss Jennie Casseday, who planned this work for the comforting and uplifting of those in the bonds of suffering, or enduring the consequences of sin. While we tied the white ribbons upon the cards, the emblems of the W. C. T. U. seemed to lengthen, and enfold the "shut in" unfortunates, who, by reason of illness or errors of life, had found their paths closing around them in pain or gloom. As we inhaled the sweet breath of June roses, we prayed that this mission of love might brighten and cheer all classes, and lead givers and receivers on to sweeter experiences of God's love.

The afternoon was devoted to the distribution of these gifts. Mrs. Emily Kelly, president of the Central union, accompanied by Mesdames Smith and Lockwood, visited the Woman's Reformatory. After a Bible lesson, singing and prayer, the inmates were impressively addressed by Mrs. Kelly and Mrs. Smith. About one hundred and seventy-five cards and bouquets were distributed. The sick in the hospital wards were also remembered. Mrs. Colchaser and Mrs. Wirt took charge of the jail work. Mrs. McKeehan, president of the West Side union, with Mesdames Walden, Tyler, Carey, Prettyman, and Miss Fate went to the workhouse. There were eighty men present in the chapel, and ten women in their own department. When asked the principal cause of arrest, "Drunkenness" was the prompt answer. Mrs. Walden, with her clear, sweet voice, led in singing, assisted by the other ladies. Mrs. McKeehan led in an earnest prayer. We talked to the men from the parable of the seed-sowing; to the women of the ten virgins and the woman of Samaria; all gave close and respectful attention. We left these sad places deeply impressed with the importance of this mission. Beautiful and uplifting to givers and receivers are these lovely messengers from God and nature. Would that the work could be more unanimous! One encouraging feature is, that the cards are preserved, or sent to distant friends by mail, thus fulfilling a two-fold mission. We were welcomed to these institutions with great courtesy by the superintendents in charge.

DELAWARE COUNTY CONVENTION.

The fifth annual convention of the W. C. T. U. was held in the Presbyterian Church at Darby, May 29, our president, Mrs. Thomas McCauley, presiding. A very cordial welcome was given by Miss Della Smith, to which a hearty response was given by Mrs. McKnight. We were disappointed in not having our state president, Mrs. Mary R. Jones, with us, but owing to other engagements she could not attend. We had however Mrs. Dr. French, president of Philadelphia county, who brought us greetings from Mrs. Jones and also gave us a very excellent talk on "Franchise." Among the resolutions that were adopted was the following:

Resolved, That we sympathize in the effort making to erect a Temperance Temple in Chicago and recommend the use of a mite-box in each local union for that purpose.

The evening exercises were in charge of the Y's, the president, Mrs. C. F. Foster, presiding. She had worked very hard to make it a success, and her efforts were appreciated by the audience. The Loyal Temperance Legion of Darby took an active part in the singing and recitations and they acquitted themselves in a most creditable manner. The readings, recitations and papers by several of the young ladies were very good, showing what workers the cause has for the future. The members and friends of the convention were handsomely entertained by the Darby Y's, which is quite a flourishing union.

MONTANA.

NEWS AND NOTES.

The W. C. T. U. in Montana and all its friends have been wonderfully strengthened this year. Miss Henrietta G. Moore came to us from the west in the midst of the February blizzards. The people thronged to hear her, and greatly regretted that her engagements permitted only a brief stay in each town. She has few equals as a public speaker, and has rare tact in enlisting the sympathies and coöperation of both men and women. When en route to her Ohio home for vacation she will favor some of the most important places with a few lectures.

Just as she concluded her month's work in the state, Colonel Woodford, of Illinois, came to us from the east, and has now finished a campaign of ten weeks, the longest and most thorough our state has ever had. Meetings were held in nine of our larger cities and towns. The I. O. G. T. gave royal help, and at Deer Lodge and Anaconda called Colonel Woodford to work for them.

A deep interest has been awakened everywhere; the temperance people are aroused to new effort, and a great many boys and drinking men have taken the pledge.

The Colonel is a powerful speaker and worker. Homes have been made happier; total abstinence and social purity have gained new adherents through his labors. Miles City, Billings, Bozeman, and many other places hope he may soon return.

The state now has a prohibition paper, The Bomb, edited by Rev. W. M. Nutting, at Miles City, and our work is nobly aided by it. We hope for great results from the new venture.

While rejoicing over the great victory won for temperance in Bozeman, Mrs. Chas. Rich, president of the W. C. T. U., and state superintendent of prison work was called to suffer the loss of her youngest son, Lester, a noble boy of fourteen years. This is the seventh time that death has removed a child from her home, and but one son remains. She and her husband have the sympathy of friends throughout the state.

With faith for the present, and hope for the future of our mountain land,

ALMA C. KIRKPATRICK,

REPORT TO STATE CONVENTION OF PRISON, JAIL AND ALMSHOUSE WORK.

I commenced holding services at the poor house September 8, 1888. I will tell a little about the work that has been done within the past two years. I have held a gospel meeting every week on Saturday afternoon. The inmates are nearly all men; but very few women; they are so glad to hear of the Saviour's love, and as I tell them of the Friend who never will forsake them, their faces brighten and often the tears roll down their cheeks.

After I had been holding meetings the first two months I could see no good results and felt somewhat discouraged, and wondered if I was doing the work the Master wanted me to do. Just then the superintendent's wife told me that a man was there who had scarcely ever spoken without swearing, who said after listening to the woman preach he would stop swearing, and he did; his companions say he has not taken God's name in vain since. So I took fresh courage and kept on; the soil seemed hard, but I knew God's grace was sufficient. In the last two years there have been thirty conversions, and seven have died sweetly trusting in Christ. The Saviour's love makes even a poor-house dying bed "soft as downy pillows are." As he was dying one man took hold of my hand and said, "Next time I see you it will be in heaven; I'll watch for you to come." I commenced holding meetings in the county jail on Sunday afternoons, and shortly afterward the almshouse work. The first three Sundays I went the corridors were filthy; on the walls were bedbugs and roaches too numerous to count, and the floors were covered with tobacco juice. But on the fourth Sunday the jailer called me into his office and said that the prisoners worked hard the day before; they scrubbed the floor, and cleaned the walls, and washed their clothes, and said if that lady was going to keep on coming they would clean up every Saturday, for they were ashamed to have a woman see so much dirt.

In the last eighteen months there have been two hundred conversions. You ask, "Do they all stand?" No, but some do, thank God! Do they all stand in our churches? No. When the Saviour cleansed the ten lepers, only one returned to give Him thanks.

I received a letter from a woman living in Greenleaf, Kansas. Her husband had been in the Portland county jail and was converted there. She said her husband was a changed man; their home used to be a hell, but now it is a heaven. As soon as he came home, he called the children together and had family prayer, and sent the children to Sunday-school. And now the peace of Christ reigns in their home.

The Lord has raised up a helpmeet for me in this glorious work in Mrs. Maria A. Smith, who for several months past has been accompanying me to the jail. She has power with God, and as she unfolds the Word and tells the perishing souls the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sins they listen attentively, and very often weep. Mrs. Smith has given each prisoner a copy of the Psalms, nicely bound and in large print, which they read every day. Each one has a Bible; one man has read the Bible through, and has commenced to read it again. The Taylor street church has given them forty copies of the Gospel Hymns.

I wish you could hear them sing; one corridor will sing, "Jesus, lover of my soul;" the other corridor will sing the air and very often people on the street passing by will stop and listen and as they go up and down the street will be heard humming the hymn our mothers loved to sing. In the last year and a half we have given one hundred and twenty Bibles. One year ago the jailer told me there was scarcely a man in the county jail that did not read his Bible. We have endeavored to impress upon the minds of the prisoners the importance of reading God's Word. In the past year we have given five thousand papers and no one will know the good that has been done by circulating pure clean reading matter until the books of life are opened.

During the past year I visited the penitentiary at Salem and conducted the Sabbath morning service, being invited to come by the superintendent. There were three hundred and twenty-seven men there and two women; as I told them of Christ's love and of His power to save many wept, and one man told the sheriff that during that service he gave his heart to Christ, and from that time he has been endeavoring to serve the Master. I find great joy in the work. Sometimes their faces look so black and hard, but as I tell the story of the Saviour's love, that hard, cruel look goes away, and a soft, tender expression is seen instead. Nothing but the power of Christ can reach and save the prisoners, and thank God it can reach them, and save them, and keep them, and make them free!

PORTAGE COUNTY CONVENTION.

The Portage county semi-annual W. C. T. U. convention convened in Stevens' Point the 10th and 11th of June, the union in that city entertaining it. Many of the officers, superintendents of departments, were present beside many delegates; a profitable and pleasant time was had by all. The following is a report of the same. Short but kindly remarks were made by Rev. Mr. Weller, of the Church of Intercession (Episcopal), also Rev. E. S. McChesney, of the First M. E. Church. These gentlemen heartily indorsed the work of the W. C. T. U. and offered assistance in any way in which they could give it. In response to our president's invitation to Father Lorigan of St. Stephen's (Catholic) Church to address us, we received a letter full of kindly sentiment and offered assistance. The usual routine of business was transacted, interspersed with music, of which some pretty duets and solos by local talent were much enjoyed. Some helpful discussions were very generally participated in. Among the papers read, two deserve special mention, though all were good and to the point. "Why I am a Temperance Woman," by Mrs. Geo. Patch, president of our city union, and "Our Duty," by Miss Lane, of Almond. Tuesday, June 10, the first day, Mrs. R. A. Emmons, of Chicago, was with us and assisted in the work. In the afternoon she addressed us, subject "Woman's Work," giving us very logical reasons why all women should be members of the W. C. T. U.

Certainly, all women pray for temperance to prevail, and Mrs. Emmons says no woman has any right to pray for that for which she will not work. After school at 4:30 p. m., the south side Juvenile Temple came in and were addressed by her. The lecture given by Mrs. Emmons in the evening was the best and most persuasive ever given here by a lady.

She handled the subject, "Our Country and Our Home," in a manner which convinced her audience of the paramount importance of the W. C. T. U. as a factor organized to protect both, and appealed to men for the sake of motherhood and childhood to assist as they only can, since they make the laws, which so well protect our great enemy. We can heartily recommend Mrs. Emmons to all unions as an efficient worker and convincing speaker. The unions throughout the county reported about the usual amount of work done and the interest increasing. The Stevens' Point union reported a lecture course having been given the past winter which cost about $257; $5 given to state fund, $1 for mission work, a small mite to buy flowers for prison day, and $40 in treasury. Forty bouquets were sent to Waupun for prison day. Last summer a building was erected on the fair ground at a cost of about $100. I am gratified to tell you that a new department was added to our work. That of forming and sustaining working girls' clubs, in and through which we hope to accomplish a long felt need, as we mean to give to them both industrial and educational instruction as we find they need.

Committee of time and place for holding next meeting were unable to report. Corresponding secretary will notify different unions later on.

MRS. M. L. PUFFER,
Cor. Sec. Portage County.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

MRS. CYNTHIA M. HANCHETT, of Waverly, Iowa, is secretary of the third congressional district. She writes that the Blue Ribbon Club holds out admirably well in Waverly. They have Sunday afternoon meetings weekly, but the thirteen illicit saloons have led away many of their boys.

THE post-office address of Rev. and Mrs. Boole is changed from Port Richmond, Long Island, to West New Brighton, L. I.

THE work of Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman in Colorado, is most highly spoken of. She has filled over twenty appointments, and the verdict is, that "no one has ever so taken the state by storm as she is doing." She will give most of the month of July to Colorado.

MRS. ROUNDS has gone to Clifton Springs, N. Y., to take a few weeks' rest. In the meantime she will fill a few engagements in the old Empire state. She is engaged to speak on W. C. T. U. day at the Silver Lake Chautauqua; at the Alleghany county convention, and also at a camp-meeting at Cuba.

THE third annual convention of the W. C. T. U. of the 11th district, in Minnesota, convened in the First Congregational church, Sauk Rapids, Benton County, Tuesday, June 10, at 9:30, and continued two days. Miss Estey, state organizer, was present to cheer the district officers and delegates, and all who heard her. Able papers were read on "Suffrage," "Cards and Wine," "Rights of Smokers," "Hygiene," etc., and the general verdict is that great good was done. The pastors of the place gave their influence in favor of the work.

A WASHINGTON correspondent writes: Miss Henrietta G. Moore, who has won the love of the white ribbon sisters on this coast, made her fourth visit to Walla Walla just before the opening of the state convention at Colfax; although suffering from la grippe, and weary with continuous speaking and traveling. Miss Moore spoke with her usual eloquence in the M. E. Church on Saturday evening. The opera house had been secured for Sabbath evening and was filled, although but three of the ministers of the city had closed their churches. These gentlemen were on the platform, and gave their cordial approval to all that was said. Miss Moore spoke with spirit and power. We are delighted with her as a sister, a temperance orator, and an eloquent preacher.

IN the issue of June 26, through an inadvertence, the tribute to Mrs. Catherine Storrs appeared under a wrong name, Mrs. Catherine Stone. A friend sends these additional words of love and honor to her memory: "In Missouri we loved Mrs. Storrs, as mother of Ellen Storrs, our pioneer superintendent of press work, and also corresponding secretary of the Hannibal union. When she died in 1885, her mother announced her intention of 'taking Ellen's place in the W. C. T. U.,' and was an unfailing attendant until her last illness. Neither the intense heat of the southern summer, nor the ice and cold of winter kept her from what she felt to be the most grateful memorial service for her gifted daughter."

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The New York W. C. T. U. School of Methods, Mrs. Mary T. Burt, president, will be held at Round Lake, July 10-12. Mrs. Mary H. Hunt will deliver an address on the evening of the 11th. Others who will take part are Mrs. Mary H. Weaver, Mrs. Ella A. Boole, Mrs. H. A. Perrigo, Mrs. C. J. A. Jump, Mrs Helen L. Bullock, Mrs. Frances D. Hall.

MARY T. BURT.

The DuPage county W. C. T. U. will hold its next regular meeting in the interests of the county and local superintendents, July 16, at Prospect Park. In the evening of same day, Mrs. Rev. C. H. St. John will give an address. Friends are invited from other towns.

Publisher's Notes.

Whatever You Don't Do!

Don't fail to read the letters below. When we announced a picture of Miss Willard in colors many said, or wrote, that they feared the result would be unsatisfactory, that such pictures always looked cheap and poor, etc. We recognized the truth of the statements but had a strong determination to give the most critical entire satisfaction. While Miss Willard was East the publisher was also and made arrangements for an artist of great skill to see Miss Willard and make a painting of her from life. This was done while she was surrounded by friends and amid laughing, chatting and earnest discussion. The painting was afterward sent to us, and the day it came we had a meeting of the business committee of the Directors of the W. T. P. A. The picture was then shown and to others whose letters are given and their words of praise were caught for the benefit of the thousands who had other engagements and could not be here! Miss West speaks of the picture editorially. Here is what says:

I have seen the picture of Miss Willard which you offer with a year's subscription to THE UNION SIGNAL, and think it admirable. The wonder to me is that you can give so much for so little money. The picture is full of life and spirit; indeed, the artist caught Miss Willard at her very best, and has given you a picture you may well be proud to offer. I trust there may be a great demand, and the subscription list of the paper doubled, as it should be.

Sincerely yours,
CAROLINE B. BUELL.

Also Miss Pugh:

I consider this by far the best picture of Miss Willard of any description, that I have ever seen. The exquisite tinting will make it an ornament to any room; and the present is a rare opportunity to procure not only a picture of Miss Willard, but a beautiful addition to the household adornment. ESTHER PUGH.

Mrs. T. B. Carse:

I consider the water color painting of Miss Willard by Prang, a gem in every particular. The delicacy of the coloring imparts such a natural, life-like tint to the fair face. The ripple of the golden hair over the smooth, white intellectual brow is most true to life, but the crowning charm is the expression of the soft, loving blue eyes that look into yours with the same frank and kindly light which has won for this incomparable woman the confidence and love of all who know her. Could our white-ribboners see this exquisitely beautiful and life-like picture, I am sure you would sell 100,000—instead of 15,000. MATILDA B. CARSE.

Mrs. E. W. Andrew,

associate editor of THE UNION SIGNAL:

The expression of Miss Willard's face in this picture is very characteristic of her; full of the courage of her convictions and the tenderness of her love for a sinning, suffering world. It will be a light of hope and help in every home it enters.

ELIZABETH W. ANDREW.

Mr. M. D. Kimball,

our cultured Sup't of Printing:

Art ever betrays some shortcoming. In this otherwise life-like picture of Miss Willard, the lips do not move—the image is dumb. In other respects it seems a most natural and perfect presentment of the National president.

Mrs. L. S. Rounds,

Pres. of Ills. W. C. T. U.:

The picture of Miss Willard is the best of the thousands we have seen of her dear face. Every Illinois woman ought to have one, and can if she will get a new subscriber for THE UNION SIGNAL. Let us work for picture and paper.

LOUISE S. ROUNDS.

Miss Helen Hood,

known to all the constituency:

The new picture of Miss Willard, which was shown me the other day, is, without exception, the finest one ever taken of our National president. The expression of the face is perfect, and full of animation; it is as though she was ready to speak to you. Those who are fortunate enough to possess a copy will have a prize indeed. I trust that thousands of them will be ordered; no truer, nobler face can be found among women. HELEN L. HOOD.

REV. J. W. BURKE, Macon, Ga., says: I have found Bradycrotine an infallible and almost instant cure for Headache.

MR. J. H. ESTILL, President Savannah Morning News, says: We keep Bradycrotine for the cure of Headache in the house with other simple family medicines.

Ask for Van Houten's Cocoa, take no other.

It will be well for those inclined to sore throats to read the advertisement of the Physician's Remedy Co. of Cincinnati, Ohio, which appears in this week's SIGNAL, and send for circular. It is a good thing.

Something for the Sick.

In another column of THE UNION SIGNAL will be found the card of the Globe Medicine Co., Cincinnati, Ohio, who have an absolute cure for Piles or the Hemorrhoidal Disease. We desire to call especial attention to the Remedy, and to the fact that money may be sent them with full confidence that they will receive fair and honest treatment, and the statements made will be verified, or the money refunded.

Enterprise and Push Always Win.

If there is a firm in the United States that has got enterprise and push about them, it certainly is the Wilber H. Murray Manufacturing Co., of Cincinnati, O., who manufacture the World-Renowned $55.95 "Murray" Buggies and $5.95 Harness. The tremendous business they are doing shows conclusively what enterprise and push coupled with honest, straightforward business methods, can do. The immense sales of the "Murray" Buggies and Harness direct to consumers is making the oldest business men of the country open their eyes in astonishment. From a small start the "Murray" people have worked up to a business that is second to none. Mr. W. H. Murray, their President, says his motto first, last and all the time, is, Tremendous Sales and Minimum Profits.

The Editors of this paper wish there were more firms like the Wilber H. Murray Manufacturing Co., for if there were other articles beside Buggies and Harness would be sold at prices within the reach of all.

Deer Park and Oakland

On the Crest of the Alleghanies.

3,000 Feet Above Tide Water.

Season Opens June 21st, 1890.

These famous mountain resorts, situated at the summit of the Alleghanies and directly upon the main line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, have the advantage of its splendid vestibuled express train service both east and west, and are therefore readily accessible from all parts of the country. All Baltimore and Ohio trains stop at Deer Park and Oakland during the season.

Rates, $60, $75 and $90 a month, according to location.

All communications should be addressed to GEORGE D. DESHIELDS, Manager Baltimore and Ohio Hotels, Cumberland, Md., up to June 10th; after that date, either Deer Park or Oakland, Garrett County, Md.

Hotter the Weather Bigger the Proof.

As the weather grows warm, the sale of James Pyle's Pearline Washing Compound rapidly increases. This proves that many women recognize the fact that PEARLINE makes washing and cleaning very much easier than when done with the ordinary means. Proves also that summer clothing, being of delicate texture and color, will not stand the rough usage necessary when washed with soap, and establishes the fact that PEARLINE, in doing away with the rubbing, lessens the wear and tear and fills a very important place. Delightful for bathing in fresh or salt water. Its ingredients render it harmless to the most delicate skin. Especially during the hot weather it is to your advantage to use PEARLINE, and only humane to supply your servants with it, and thus lighten their labors; besides you insure much better results. Beware of imitations. JAMES PYLE, New York.

TO MOTHERS.

If for any reason you cannot nurse your child, we can assure you positively that there is but one Food that is practically a perfect imitation of Mother's Milk in composition and digestibility, and that is LACTO-PREPARATA. It is made wholly from milk.

All manufacturers of Infant Food make the broad claim that theirs is the best, but few, if any, tell how it is made or of what it is composed, for the facts told to any intelligent person would condemn most of them.

CARNRICK'S SOLUBLE FOOD contains 62 1-2 per cent. of Powdered Milk and 37 1-2 per cent. of wheat. Both the milk and wheat are partially digested. It is especially adapted for Infants from six months upwards, and for Invalids, Aged People and Dyspeptics.

Before you take the risk of trying any other Food, do not fail to send to us for a pamphlet of 64 pages entitled Our Baby's First and Second Years, by Marion Harland, which also gives a minute description of Lacto-Preparata and Carnrick's Soluble Food and their mode of manufacture. Sent Free.

Read the above pamphlet and then ask your Physician which Foods are the nearest approach to mother's milk.

DR. WILFORD HALL'S
A Marvelous Triumph over Disease Without Medicine.

Mrs. Rev. C. Clark, Thiells, N. Y., writes, Oct. 9:

"DEAR DR. HALL:—Some three months ago I purchased your Health Pamphlet with many misgivings as to its value. But having been a great sufferer for twelve months with spinal weakness, rheumatism, nervous prostration, and coincidently with a strong tendency to Bright's disease, accompanied by insomnia so that I had to walk the floor for hours at night before being able to get any rest, being at the same time under the treatment of a good physician, but without avail, it at last induced me to make a thorough application of your treatment. At once my sleep returned as of old, and as sound and as sweet as ever, and my nervousness and other troubles have left me. I attribute my bodily condition to my critical period of life, and I am anxious that other like sufferers should know about my case and secure your pamphlet. I can not be over thankful to you for this discovery, and would not part with the knowledge thus purchased for $4, for many times that amount.

Gratefully yours, MRS. REV. C. CLARK.

Dr. Wilford Hall's Hygienic Treatment is being used and indorsed by the leading physicians, lawyers, clergymen, and thinking people throughout the country. For further information regarding this treatment call upon or send a two-cent stamp to

THIS SUMMER
IS THE TIME TO VISIT
THE FAMOUS
Shenandoah Valley, Va.

This valley is not only full of historical reminiscences, but is one of the finest agricultural, fruit-growing and dairying countries in the world. Here is THE place for the farmer, the manufacturer, the dairyman and the stock raiser. The hills are full of high-grade iron ore and coal, and the valleys abundantly productive. The climate is a golden mean, pleasant in summer and delightful in winter. The water is abundant in quantity and pure in quality. Lands are cheap, contiguous to market and can be secured by home-seekers on the most favorable terms. Come and look over this region, so favored by nature, while the growing crops and grass demonstrate the fertility of the soil and the genialty of the climate If you wish to make an investment that you will never think of except with unalloyed pleasure, or to secure a home which will be the delight of yourself and family, don't let this opportunity pass unimproved. This is not the veritable Garden of Eden, but it IS one of the best regions to be found in the best country in the world. For further and more definite information, call on or address

Ever So Many

People hear stirring sermons and addresses urging them on to Christian and Christlike activity with a responsive heart and then discover that, after all, they don't know what to do or how to do it! The sermon was all right as far as it went but it did not go to the definiteness of saying, "Now here is the plan and this is the way." We have no sermon to preach but have a straight

Plan, Here Now,

Thus: A book, a good book; a willing soul. The book is read by the willing soul. "Ah, how true, how good, how inspiring!"

And Stop There?

That's the sermon way. No, no. You take such books as and keep them moving—

Keep Them Moving—

in a neighbornood and you will be doing the work of a gospel preacher, and a good one at that. "Folks won't read them?" You were never more mistaken in your life. Parents and children will eagerly read these true words and tell you so.

Look, now, we propose to do all our part in helping this preaching. We will send the whole number listing at $2.05 for

Only $1.50.

This we will do up to Sept. 1st. If you are at a summer resort start these books going; it will be a blessed relief from society's "wobbly" novels and weak vapidities. If you are at home, make out a list of eight families. Leave a book at each place after making a friendly call. Start them in with discretion, which means, first read the books yourself and fit them to characters as you can. Don't go at this as though you were a colporteur, but as one having "just read the most interesting book. I know your boys and girls would like it, or you would like it—please let me leave it with you? Indeed, I have a number that have such good ideas I am passing them around among my friends and neighbors."

See? Some such way as that. Let us tell you how this "preaching plan" was suggested. Some time ago two good friends who lived near here came into the office having $1,950 with them to invest in W. T. P. A. stock. They spoke of the excellence of our publications and bought a number of copies of "Boys and Other Boys." On the first of this month they were again here and this time brought $3,000 for investment and at the same again invested in books named in the list above with the remark that they felt their investment to be a good one for themselves and for the world, and that they kept these books moving from one family to another. The plan as outlined came from this. Don't let it melt away into the fervidness of summer's heat? It's a straight answer to the question,

What Can I Do?

Do this work patiently, systematically and steadily and we say you will be doing a grand and glorious work for the Master. You will be giving more than "elbow touch"—it is a close hand grasp of human love and sympathy.

SPLENDID PROGRESS.

Started late in 1889 with no population or improvements, the development already made is surprising. Five factories are building, and several companies organized to build others. No booms, but steady, substantial progress. A knitting factory company is organized, the stock to be all owned, and entire business managed by women. It will pay large profits. Those who want homes in a "clean city," where the rumshop, brothel and gambling den are perpetually excluded, should buy soon, as prices are rapidly advancing.

Publisher's Notes.

The Report.

Below we give the names of additional pledgers received to date. The total number of new subscribers (or the money therefor) received by us, including July 2, in accordance with our offer to send out Miss Willard's picture is as follows:

From individuals	473
" Unions, 185 @ 5 each	925
	1,398
Number of Unions in addition to above pledged but not yet heard from, 102 @ 5 each	510
Total	1,908

This is not the kind of a report we expected to make. We have no idea of giving up the contest, however. The weather has been intensely hot and this has deterred many from working To those who have helped we extend our most cordial thanks.

The offer has been extended during August. In September the price of the picture and the paper will be advanced to $1.25, and this only in case a new subscriber's name is sent. We do this for two reasons:

1st. The picture will be ordered in a smaller number than first planned and hence at an increased cost.

2d. We feel confident that the mere sight of the beautiful and lifelike picture will create an active demand for it and we will put the price where we can pay our representatives something for the work they will do.

3d. The framed picture will then be offered for six new subscribers with $6 (instead of five names) for the reasons already given.

4th. We want agents for the sale of this picture, to whom we will allow a good commission. Thousands will be sold in this way. Remember. August is the last month in which you can get a picture except your work in getting a new subscriber (with $1) or the framed picture for five new names (with $5) and that you must say when you send in the money that you want the picture of Miss Willard. See what is said elsewhere of it, on page 13 and in the editorial department. Such a work of art as this, will not have to go far for its thousands of delighted friends.

Signal Notes.

ABOUT a hundred type-writers, most of them women, are employed in the census office at Washington.

PHILLIPS BROOKS has decided to take no vacation this summer, but to preach to his own congregation every Sunday.

WORD reaches us that the Omaha Republican, the leading daily of that city, has announced itself for the adoption of the prohibitory amendment. It has heretofore been opposed. The value of its assistance can hardly be overestimated, as it is upon the same ground as the Bee, the organ of the liquor ring, whose influence can be overcome largely, day by day, by the Republican.

DR. B. W. RICHARDSON says we can form no idea what the history of civilized man would be if the effects of alcohol were altogether out of the field. Hitherto we have only heard of a world in which these effects have been present, but with perfect purity all this might in a few generations be changed by education and precept, founded on the treatment of the young who have undergone no aberration from nature.

DURING Mr. Gladwin's recent tour of lectures in California, he gave several addresses for the W. C. T. U. The state president, Mrs. Rosamond R. Johnston, writes thus of his work: "It is with pleasure that I introduce the Rev. W. J. Gladwin, missionary to India, and co-editor of the Banner of Asia, who always talks to the point concerning the curses of opium and liquor, as he has seen them in the Orient, as well as on our occidental shores." Mr. Gladwin expects to labor for some months in Iowa, and the adjoining states. He has had eighteen years' experience in foreign mission work, and his addresses are highly commended. His address is Miles, Ia.

REFERRING to the fondness of the negro in Africa for bright colors, a recent writer says: "A Glasgow firm of rumsellers have quantities of gaily colored handkerchiefs, with a special design favoring their trade, manufactured and freely distributed among the natives of Africa. One has a design of two bottles of liquor flanking a goblet; another has a number of bottles radiating from a center. Each bottle is represented as labeled with the name of its contents, and the trade-mark and name of the manufacturer. I have seen these horrible red flags of the pirates who seek thus to extend their devilish traffic among the hapless heathen, making blood-money and gain by the souls for whom Christ died! Inasmuch as the handkerchiefs bear no dealer's name, it would seem that those who export and distribute them are either ashamed of themselves, or else that, with a fiendish subtlety, they desire to familiarize the natives with the forms and symbols of their trade, with a view to impress the imagination and excite desire. No wonder that when my old-time friend and comrade in many a temperance fight, Mr. Robert Mansergh, of Lancaster, exhibited these products of Christian civilization to the Congregational Union, Memorial Hall rang with cries of shame."

JAMES H. RAPER, Esq., one of the leading temperance speakers in England, writes as follows in a recent private letter: "Mrs. Raper and a large portion of our Kensington women take great interest in the woman suffrage question. Our member of Parliament, Sir Algernon Barthwido, is a supporter of the demand for equal laws, and no disfranchisement on account of sex. Our temperance struggle increased in intensity. During the current session of Parliament, which commenced in February and will go on until August, we have had several discussions. On the 17th of April we had the Chancellor of the Exchequer's budget or annual financial statement. He had to report a large increase of revenue arising from an increased consumption of alcohol during the past year. It amounted to 1,800,000 pounds. This means more than seven million pounds of expenditure in addition, making our drink bill for 1889 above 132 millions of pounds sterling. Our population increases one per cent per year, and our actual expense per individual is not as great as the large increase would apparently imply. However it is an increase, and the government proposes to effect some decrease by a little measure accompanied by compensation. This we resist as unjust. We keep an active watch on your operations, and I read your discussions at the National W.C.T.U. convention in Chicago with great interest. My knowledge of many of your people adds to this fascination. I hope the fight in Nebraska may be useful to consolidate the temperance forces. Let me implore you to secure that result, and be sure you are workingfor the British Empire with its nearly three hundred millions; all your victories help us who are far behind you."

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Preliminary work has begun on the Niagara tunnel.

The Senate has postponed action upon the elections bill definitely.

Miss Willard and Miss Gordon left early Monday morning for Asheville, N. C.

A Boston lady has invented a shoe sewing machine, and sold her patent for $150,000.

Clinton B. Fisk died at his home, 175 West 58th street, New York City, on Wednesday, July 9, aged sixty-two years.

At the marriage of Stanley and Miss Tennant, Saturday, a phonograph took all the ceremony, including the music.

Dr. T. K. Iyanaga, a Japanese who has just graduated from Johns Hopkins University, is a very popular lecturer at Chautauqua this summer.

General Fremont, first presidential candidate of the Republican party, and "Pathfinder" through the great West, died at his residence in New York, on July 13.

Archbishop Ireland made an able, dispassionate presentation of the Catholic side of the school question before the National Teachers' Association at St. Paul.

Miss Helen Leah Reed, of the Harvard Annex, captured the Sargeant prize for the best metrical version of a difficult ode of Horace, from sixteen male competitors.

Ground was broken on July 11, for the first division of the Pan-American railway to connect North and South America. An international salute was fired across the Rio Grande.

Russia has seized an island off the coast of Corea and two British warships at Hong Kong are ordered to keep up steam ready to proceed to Corean waters at a moment's notice.

Peter Iler, Omaha's big brewer, has purchased large tracts of land near San Francisco on which he proposes to establish stock yards at an expense of several hundred thousand dollars. Is he discouraged about Nebraska?

The Compromise Silver Bill passed the House on Saturday. By its provisions the United States treasury will purchase 4,500,000 ounces of silver bullion each month; 2,000,000 ounces will be coined into standard dollars, and the remainder represented in the circulation by treasury notes. These will be legal tender under all circumstances, it being the policy of the government to maintain gold and silver on a parity with each other.

WE wonder if the framers of the amendment to the Wilson bill in the House of Representatives thought of the effect it might have on the lottery question? It will be remembered that the Wilson bill specified intoxicating liquor as that which, on coming into a state, must become subject to the police powers of the state in respect to police regulations of prohibition, regulation or taxation; the amendment makes this apply to all articles brought into a state. It seems to be a warrantable conclusion that it would apply to lottery tickets brought into a state which forbids lotteries. If this bill is not passed, the "original package" decision, as it stands, would furnish a convenient medium for forcing lottery tickets in "original packages" upon unwilling states.

THE W. C. T. U. School of Methods at the Kentucky Chautauqua was unusually interesting and successful. This was largely due to the kindly courtesy of Prof. Wm. McClintock, conductor of the Assembly, and to the efficiency of Mrs. Frances E. Beauchamp, county president of the W. C. T. U., on whom the local arrangements principally devolved. About an hundred ladies registered as members of the class; the departments studied were parliamentary usage, evangelistic, juvenile, Sunday-school and Y work, scientific temperance instruction, temperance literature, health, county organization and School of Methods, Bible wines and heredity. Temperance physiological lectures were also given, illustrated by charts. The interest increased from the beginning and culminated in a permanent organization for conducting Schools of Methods at the Kentucky Chautauqua and county schools throughout the state. Mrs. Beauchamp was elected president, Mrs. Clay, president of the Lexington union, secretary, and Miss Sallie Webster, treasurer.

A NEBRASKAN writes:—"As a resident of Nebraska we ask the amendment lecturers in this state to inform the people what the consequences will be if the license amendment carries. Many people of ordinary intelligence do not understand this, and some of the lecturers do not touch on it at all. Our situation is different from other states, in having the 'double-header,' hence, once more we beg you to explain it to the people at large of this great and growing state." In all previous amendment campaigns the issue has been upon prohibition only. That failing, the people have ordinarily been able to secure a compromise upon some sort of local option law, which afforded relief to the smaller towns of the state. The peculiarity of the situation in Nebraska is that two amendments of the constitution are before the people. One provides for prohibition. The defeat of this means victory for the other. Then the authorities of every county and town in the state will be compelled, under the constitution, to grant licenses for the sale of intoxicants, no matter if every property holder in the community be opposed. The question is squarely stated, Will you so respect the foreign born saloon keeper's "liberty," that you authorize him to catch your children if he can, and pour whisky down their throats, if by any subterfuge he can get their mouths open? Or will you reserve to yourselves the liberty of landing his diabolical wares outside the state and building a constitutional barricade against them?

THE day-star of a new era has arisen in the West—the era of woman in government. God said, "Let them have dominion." That first state contained every element of modern society—fowl and fish, cattle and creeping things. There was the high-born creature of the air gravitating heavenward of its own inherent bent; there were also things slimy and slippery, beastly and creeping. The world was all there in Eden, and God did not say the incongruous four-in-hand could be driven with one rein, and controlled by half of man, though it be the more muscular half. Six thousand years of dominion in the singular have failed to establish the kingdom of righteousness upon the earth. It is time to turn on full power, and bring unused forces into action. The new state of Wyoming has numerous sources of distinction, but chief is this, that it is first to call woman to her kingdom, to grant her the privileges, to put upon her the responsibilities, and demand of her the duties of full citizenship. No subject has aroused such interest and excited so earnest and keen debate, in the fifty-first congress, as the admission of a state with woman suffrage in the constitution. The theme assumed an abstract form. Friends and foes felt the touch of a sharp edge, and knew it was the wedge destined to cleave maleocracy and make way for humanocracy. Meanwhile, the newborn infant lay in the congressional manger, waiting to be adopted and clothed in the habiliments of statehood. A few wise men and seers prophesied heroically for it. They, however, could not have prevailed, but the child was goodly in the eyes of the dominant party, fair to look upon and calculated to increase the weight of their uncertain majorities, so their necessity was God's opportunity to inaugurate a higher form of government than the world has yet seen. It is no experiment in Wyoming. Her first legislature, in 1867, conferred upon women the right to vote. The census reports show less illiteracy in Wyoming than in any other state or territory. Let no one fail to make the connection; the granting of suffrage to women presupposes a high order of intellect. Woman, enfranchised, will see to it that educational advantages are kept at high water-mark. What has been the effect upon "the stability of the family?" Women born of voting mothers are now themselves voters, wives and mothers. Are there more divorces in proportion to the marriages in Wyoming than in Illinois, whose whisky-bought legislators refuse to "unsect" woman, and dissect their own corporate body, by granting equal suffrage? Let some one familiar with Wyoming society answer. Another question which will soon have to be settled without precedent is, whether Wyoming women located in other states will acquire the right of franchise there. The fifteenth amendment says: "No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States." The women of Wyoming are citizens of the United States.

BABY Wyoming is born with a golden spoon in her mouth. Without the Yellowstone Park she is larger than all New England. Her coal fields are twice as broad as those of Pennsylvania, having an area of 30,000 square miles. The oil regions cover a belt thirty miles wide and two hundred miles long. Some large wells are now plugged awaiting facilities for transportation. There are no navigable rivers, and only about 1,000 miles of rail. Water power is unlimited and the greater part of the state is available for agriculture. The potato crop yields from 500 to 800 bushels per acre. Not "small potatoes!" Mining industries offer incalculable possibilities, both in the noble metals and in chemical substances. Building stone of the best qualities abounds. With good government, good schools, unsurpassed beauty of scenery, and healthful climate, Wyoming is fully equipped for her new position.

THE God of the harvest has been good to the Dakotas this year, and the greatest wheat crop ever known in that region is now coming forward. The present fear is that the laborers are too few to reap it. Owing to the failures last year farm hands left in large numbers to seek employment in other states. It is probable that special rates of travel will be secured for harvesters and threshers during ninety days covering harvest time. There is an "idea" here for those grave scientists who are striving to measure the force of thought. Much of the seed sent into the Dakotas for this sowing was charged with good will from brotherly hearts, touched by the need of a brave people, who in the midst of famine scorned the liquor seller's gold and the gambler's bribe. Some of it was good prohibition grain—as the five hundred bushels sent by George Woodford from his wheat farms in Iowa, and contributions just as generous, if measuring less, from many others. All of it had the blessing of the poor temperance editors, who, unable to give aught but ink and prayers, would fain believe these, too, had power in bringing about the glad results. The unthinking secular reporter says, "The growth of the 1889 lambs was phenomenal even among scrub stock," while the wool clip is the largest ever known there. Let them that have no God say this prosperity is accident; but for us, we remember the farmers of the Dakotas who went to the polls with trustful heart and single eye to vote out the rum robber and the gambler, and we choose to believe that in that sovereign act the word of the Lord came to them saying, "Blessed be the fruit of thy ground, and the fruit of thy cattle, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks of thy sheep." May they take the words of warning and of promise in this chapter (Deuteronomy 28) for their business policy. Then shall they "lend unto many nations and not borrow."

A PLEA FOR NEBRASKA.

BY M. J. SHERMAN.

Did you hear the urgent call
From our brave Nebraska?
Does her danger you appall,
Will you help her, one and all,
Save her from disaster?

Working with her might and main,
Yet she needs assistance.
Once let license forge a chain
Round her neck, ah, then! in vain
Will be all resistance.

What a contest! Ne'er before
Since we were a nation
Has an evil covered o'er
With a pestilential sore,
Claimed such close relation.

Advocates of licensed sin,
Thousands freely giving.
Thousands they have gathered in,
While the victim's babes have been Robbed of all their living.

Haste, oh, haste! for God and right,
There's no time to dally;
Sisters of the ribbon white,
We can help them win the fight,
If we bravely rally.

Small each gift? That may be true;
Shall we then refuse it?
We can ask our brothers, too,
What we can let's quickly do,
Then—God help them use it.

A BROKEN VESSEL.

BY ELIZABETH E. FLAGG.

We went bowling along—Prince and I—over the shadiest, sweetest, most fern-haunted of country roads. There had been rain the day before and all nature seemed to wear heaven's baptismal mark on her forehead. But to me she might as well have worn sackcloth. Every step that Prince took was bearing me nearer and nearer to that house of mourning, and already I felt its shadow press on my very soul, black and heavy. This was the reason why I let him walk all the way, only wishing that the mile and a half which lay between could be lengthened into three or four; for what should I say to Mrs. Goldthwaite when I got there? How could I comfort that widowed heart from which had been taken, without a moment's warning, her "strong staff and beautiful rod?"

I was not the minister—he happened to be away attending a convention—but I was the minister's wife, and when the startling news was brought to me that "Charlie Goldthwaite had got drowned in the river, and Miss Goldthwaite hadn't shed a tear but jest acted like a crazy woman," I harnessed up Prince and set forth to fill my husband's place as well as I could. I was young and unused to such scenes. I felt a dreadful inability to say anything. My limbs shook under me, and my very lips were numb as I advanced into the room where she was sitting; not wild and excited as I fancied I should find her, but pale and calm as an antique statue. She did not so much as lift an eyelid when I came in. I had never felt especially drawn towards Mrs. Goldthwaite. She had a stately rather than a gracious presence. She was active in church work; that is to say, she gave freely when asked for the support of missions and benevolent institutions. She was rigidly orthodox in her opinions and practice, and had brought up Charlie to be one of the most exemplary boys in the village. Yet she never seemed to me to enjoy religion or care to talk about it; and I was often at a loss to understand her. It might be owing to a cold nature, utterly lacking in magnetic sympathy; or it might be to a very deep and sensitive one, but neither of these explanations quite suited me.

I sat down by the stricken woman, and tried to speak the heartfelt sorrow that I felt. She raised her great, dark eyes, hot and burning—they were rather remarkable eyes—and fixed them on my face for an instant, then dropped them again. But words could not have said more plainly: "You have all your children about you. Grief asks of joy to be let alone." I tried to murmur a word of consolation—to make some vague offer of assistance. She repelled me almost impatiently. "No, no! I thank you. You are very kind, but there is nothing you can do for me."

I went away feeling baffled—humiliated. She had shut the door of her heart in my face, and there was nothing left for me except to jog slowly home—Prince and I—over a way as checkered as life,—sometimes impenetrable shadow where the trees met in a perfect arch, then broad patches of sunshine as we came to a cleared space, and houses of the neat, trim, comfortable New England type began to grow frequent. It was not a much traveled road, and pedestrians were few, but on our homeward way we overtook Mr. Winthrop Lloyd—a new arrival in Hillsdale, who lived a hermit-like kind of life, guarded about by a wall of reserve which even the most determined village gossip had never yet penetrated. We knew he did much good in a quiet way, though he seemed to prefer working on independent lines of his own. When Zach Greenwood, a rough, profane farm hand in the neighborhood sickened of small-pox, and no one else would go near him, it was Mr. Lloyd who watched by his sick-bed, and himself made a brief prayer, and read a few words of Scripture over his unattended bier. He seemed to bear a charmed life. He went through an epidemic of typhus fever, exposing himself in the most, seemingly, reckless fashion, but he never took the disease.

"I have neither wife, nor child, nor near kin," he once said when I ventured to expostulate with him; "my life is free to use—to throw away, if you choose to call it so—in aid of any suffering human being who can be helped by the sacrifice."

As we came alongside he turned and gave me a pleasant greeting, and spoke feelingly of the sad accident which had just occurred; for there was nothing ascetic about Winthrop Lloyd. He seemed to feel a kindly human interest in every creature that breathed. Cats, dogs and children were irresistibly attracted to him, for all the air of sad, gentle melancholy that hung about him like an Indian summer mist. But I, for one, felt sure that if anything should lift that vail of impenetrable reserve it would reveal nothing ignoble or dishonorable in his past life. How far my woman's instincts were to be trusted the sequel will show.

I had the curiosity to look back, and saw him enter the cottage where the Pellerins lived. The elder Pellerin was a shiftless, drinking Frenchman; the mother, a feeble, discouraged woman. Two of the children were feeble-minded; the eldest, Marie Pellerin, a bright, pretty girl of sixteen, was a veritable human wild rose, but the family was wretchedly poor, and afforded a fine opportunity for some independent missionary work which I should define in a general way as the work that lies nearest, and needs most to be done, but which on that very account is so often "nobody's business."

The summer came and went. Chaste autumn walked like a priestess over the hills, and then came winter, covering the earth with a burial shroud, soon to be rent asunder by the showers of April. And then again the yearly miracle of buds and blossoms, but the widow Goldthwaite moved about her house a strange, silent being, going nowhere, speaking to no one, and wrapped—at least so the neighbors averred—in the deep gloom of settled insanity.

Among other changes the Pellerin family was broken up by the desertion of the father who was never seen or heard of more, and the death of the mother which speedily followed. The children were sent to the poor-house with the exception of Marie, who was old enough to support herself, and accordingly found work in a manufacturing town near by;—poor Marie, with her untaught mind; her gay, bright, volatile nature, and her French love of finery.

Late one August night Winthrop Lloyd sat writing in the little cottage which he had rented and where he lived alone by himself. It was known that he "wrote for the papers," but whether from necessity or for his own amusement, nobody knew; but his nom de plume had come to be recognized, not so much for any special brilliancy in the sketches and poems to which it was affixed, as their helpfulness, their singular insight into the needs of struggling, tempted humanity.

Suddenly there came a low tap, so very faint and low that it could easily have been mistaken for the peck of a bird. It startled him like something uncanny. He opened the door, and there tottered in, pale, hollow-eyed and clasping her infant to her breast, Marie Pellerin; a wretched, forsaken creature, who, in her sorrow and shame remembered the Christ-like soul that had looked from Winthrop Lloyd's eyes and spoke in his voice when he used to visit their miserable hovel; and her seeking him now with the evident idea that he would not despise but would try to find out a way to help her, was not far removed from the feeling that led the woman of old, "which was a sinner," to wash the Saviour's feet.

"Mr. Lloyd," she said, "the folks wan't good to me where I was, and I run away. Don't make me go back. Hide me if they come after me. You were always good to us, Mr. Lloyd."

A fit of coughing interrupted her; she was evidently far gone in a mortal disease, and laboring under some aberration of mind.

"No one shall make you go back," he said soothingly. "But lie down and rest, then you will feel better able to talk."

He made her and the child as comfortable as he could, waited until they had both sunk into slumber, and then started off for help, but with no clear idea to whom to apply. He must get some woman to nurse poor Marie; but who? How many women can nurse the body, but are terribly blundering with a sick soul! He shrank from putting this wounded creature under the ministrations of one who would only tear open her wounds and pour in vinegar instead of oil.

To reach the village he took a short cut through the woods, coming out at the place where Charlie Goldthwaite was drowned, and there, like a silhouette against the silver moonlight, he saw an apparition that startled him more than Marie Pellerin had done; a woman of stately figure dressed in black, and standing with clenched hands gazing down into the hurrying waters. It was Mrs. Goldthwaite.

His first impulse was to pass on. Then a fear crossed his mind that she might be intending to drown herself. The place, the time looked suspicious. He would speak to her even at the risk of a repulse.

She started at the first sound of his voice; then with a repellant gesture she waved him off, and fixed her dark melancholy eyes once more on the water. But so impressed was he with the fear that she contemplated suicide that he did not mind the rebuff. She turned towards him again with very visible impatience; then a strange look came over her sharp, rigid face—a gleam of sudden recognition.

"You are the Rev. Winthrop Lloyd? Didn't you preach in the town of Linden ten or fifteen years ago?"

He bowed his head in silent assent. She continued to look at him searchingly. Then she said, almost hissing it out between her shut teeth:

"Go, Mr. Lloyd; I am a lost soul; I have committed the unpardonable sin. But once I sat under your preaching; I was one of your converts."

For the moment she seemed almost like an accusing demon—this woman who now so suddenly and strangely confronted him with the memory of the past he had tried so hard to bury. She went on: "Do not be afraid I shall betray your secret. I shall never do it. But you are like everybody else; you think I am crazy. I am not crazy. As I told you, I am a lost soul."

"Christ came to seek and save the lost," he said, gently. "Will you not tell me your trouble? As you just reminded me, I, too, have sinned and suffered."

She turned her wild, desperate face to him with a look of sudden, womanly pity. "Yes; I know. It was dreadful."

"Then tell me your trouble," he pleaded, "your fault, your crime even, if it be a crime, and give me at least a fellow sinner's right to help you."

"Mr. Lloyd, I murdered my Charlie."

Winthrop Lloyd stood aghast and silent.

"You don't understand me; I murdered him by my greed of gain, I, his mother, who would have coined my heart's blood to save him. Not till my husband died did I learn that he was silent partner in a liquor saloon. The bulk of his property was invested in the rum business. The revelation shocked me. My whole soul loathed such unrighteous gains. My first impulse was to give them up, no matter at what sacrifice, but when I realized that to do so would leave me in very straightened circumstances, I temporized. I could not make up my mind to suffer so great a financial loss. My boy must be educated, must be launched in a profession. And so the devil fought for my soul—and won. I concluded to let things go on as they were, renting my property for saloons. Then my Charlie was brought home dead. The desire of my eyes was taken from me at a stroke. God took him as a judgment for my sin. My greed of money killed my boy. Do you wonder that reason has well nigh reeled under the terrible thought? He will never come to me, and I can never go to him for I made my choice deliberately. Hush; do not interrupt me—not till I have told you all. I said it in my heart if I did not say it with my lips that I was willing to peril my soul rather than have my noble boy feel the restraints of poverty. God has taken me at my word. I am as truly a lost spirit as if I were already in the world of eternal misery."

"No, Mrs. Goldthwaite," said Winthrop Lloyd, firmly, but kindly. "If you were that no consciousness of guilt would oppress you. The devil would let you alone. God could have punished you by letting your boy grow up to be ruined as many another boy has been by an indulgent parent with plenty of means. Instead, God took him to Himself to show you that you were still His child. See the mercy, the loving kindness of your Heavenly Father's heart."

She listened eagerly, and a pale, wan ray of hope flickered over her features like a torch held out in the wind and rain.

"Mrs. Goldthwaite," he continued, "I must not linger longer, I came out on an errand,—to find some woman who will watch to-night with a fallen, lost creature who has not long to live in this world. And the Lord has sent me to you. This act of mercy which he allows you to do 'in His Name' shall be a sign to you that your sin is forgiven. Come."

She followed him without a word, and together they watched the night through with Marie Pellerin. And she stayed till the end came. She put the rooms in order. She attended to the details of the funeral, and now there was nothing left to remind anybody of poor Marie Pellerin, only her child.

She had put on her bonnet and pinned her shawl to go, but still stood, caressing the baby which was a winsome little thing, with bonny brown eyes, and curly rings of hair, as if loath to leave it.

"What do you propose to do with the child?" she queried. "Send it to some institution, or try to get it adopted?"

Winthrop Lloyd turned to her with a light breaking over his pale face; a serene, solemn, holy light, as of one bearing a heavenly message. "That is just the question I have been waiting to hear you ask, Mrs. Goldthwaite. I believe the Lord has a work for you to do, and if He should speak His will to you in words it would be like this: 'I have your lost darling safe in my keeping. Now take this poor abandoned child of Mine, and bring it up in My service. That I trust you with it is the seal of My gracious pardon—the sign that I have cast your sin behind my back and remember it no more.' "

She bent over the little one. With a sudden motion she clasped it in her arms, the tears falling over her face like rain. Then she turned to Winthrop Lloyd who stood before her silent. Under her gaze his own fell. They seemed for the moment to have changed places. "Winthrop Lloyd," she said, "it is my turn now. Once you fell under the power of the tempter and disgraced your sacred calling. But you fought a brave fight. If there are any scars on your soul they are honorable scars. Is it right that you should let a single slip debar you forever from the pulpit, where you were so successful in times past, and may—God helping you—be just as successful again?"

He paused for a moment before replying. Then he said gravely and sadly: "No. Mrs. Goldthwaite; that can never be. My life is a marred and broken vessel. But a cup unfit for sacramental uses may still carry water to the thirsty, and cordials to the perishing."

. . . . . .

Hillsdale society was much astonished by Mrs. Goldthwaite's sudden return to sanity, and equally so at her becoming the foster mother of Marie Pellerin's child; but it never found out the story of that night encounter, or the secret of Winthrop Lloyd's past life, until his accidental death a year or two after, when on returning (as was supposed) from one of his frequent errands of mercy he was struck by the cars and instantly killed. Then we learned his identity with a certain brilliant young clergyman, a victim of the alcoholic habit, who one day scandalized his congregation by entering the pulpit in a state of intoxication, and the next "mysteriously disappeared." Gifted, high-minded, writhing under the sense of his shameful fall, he had buried himself in a remote country village, and fought his hereditary weakness as only those can who know that the Captain of their salvation fights for them. Did he feel a thrill of joy in that fearful moment when he knew that death, quick, instant, horrible was only a question of seconds; joy that he had reached a place at last of eternal safety from which he "should go no more out forever"? I cannot say.

"We little dream of the conflict
Fought in each human soul;
And earth knows not her heroes
Upon God's honor roll."

SLOJD OR SLOYD.

BY MRS. S. A. SEARS.

I.

Little by little the American people are becoming interested in this word, slöjd or slöyd. We are learning to speak it, because we would understand why the interest in it in European countries is so co-extensive with educational progress, and why it is becoming Americanized. The word is purely Swedish, impossible of exact translation into other tongues. Literally it means cunning, dexterity, handy, and is evidently from the same root as our word sleight, or sleight-of-hand. In Sweden it includes domestic industries as well as work peculiar to schools. They have come to use it in connection with a system of wood-work adapted to pupils between the kindergarten age and the higher grades of manual training in our established manual training schools. To judge of a new educational movement, it is well, sometimes, to look up its history; to go back of that and learn of the motive that led to the conception of the thought, and of the agencies that have formulated and tested the principles upon which it is founded. This we are enabled to do, so widespread has become the interest in the subject.

The word takes us to Sweden, but Swedish writers, who are justly proud of the development of the system and of the establishment of institutions through which teachers are being trained for every country, point to the small country of Finland as really taking the initiative in the work which the word represents. We learn that a great development of this form of industrial education dates from the efforts of M. Cygnæus, who, feeling the great need of educational reform in his own land, in 1858 visited the various countries of Europe, where the ideas of Froebel, as he saw them illustrated, deeply impressed him and convinced him of the necessity of extending those ideas by the introduction of manual training into primary-school instruction.

Everywhere he met opposition, especially in Sweden and Denmark. Not till 1870 was the question seriously agitated by these countries, though at a much earlier period domestic education received some attention.

A fragment of recorded history fully illustrates the fact that such reforms have their origin in the demands of the social condition.

A decadence of interest in domestic pursuits throughout Sweden was attributable to the following causes: The application of steam to industry led to the diminution of the selling price of household articles manufactured before, to a large extent, in the home-circle, so the small farmer, with his family, hitherto accustomed to devote long evenings to the construction of objects either for household use or for sale, showed less and less taste for such work; they cost so little it seemed better to buy them. The child ceased to be the co-worker with the parent; that intimate relation between the members of the household which comes from sharing each other's pursuits, and the joy of mutual growth and happiness, was broken up.

Intellectual education, or book knowledge, advanced, demanding more time from the pupil. Gradually handcraft and its attendant training of the muscles as well as the creative powers, and with it the love of work, became absorbed in the greater development of literary taste on the part of one class and a marked degeneracy in another. A second reason assigned for the decrease in the demands for an industrial training has a deeper significance.

We quote the words of an eminent writer upon the subject:

"In 1800 the manufacture and sale of alcoholic drinks became free. This became a very large business and took the place of domestic work.

"A large part of the population were engaged in their leisure hours in the production, sale and use, of bran-vin.

"Among the working class brandy was even regarded as currency, and taken in payment of wages.

"The public health suffered from the excess, the number of crimes and public offenses increased, and as for provisions for promoting domestic manual occupations, they ceased altogether.

"In 1855 a law was passed restricting the manufacture and sale of liquors.

"The public health improved, crimes diminished, and gradually the people of the country resumed their domestic occupations and habits of work. As early as 1846 an association was formed for further instruction in slöjd, but not till 1872 did the government of Sweden interest itself in this form of education sufficiently to grant annual subsidies for its support."

To account for the phenomenal success of the movement we must look to other than governmental encouragement. Here was a great but peaceful contest in behalf of an idea involving true social progress; a struggle between an established educational system, good intellectually, but insufficient for the broadest culture of the entire being, joined to habits of degeneracy in physical development and to perverted industrial tastes. Through the efforts of nature's true noblemen in behalf of Fatherland a great educational reform has been wrought.

Statesman, artist, and retired merchant joined forces, and behold the result!

We are told that the sculptor, Charles Ahlborn, gave two hundred lectures on the subject of industrial education embodying the principles of slöjd and expounded the subject to more than sixty thousand hearers.

But to the devotion of M. August Abrahamson more than to any other one man is the great success of the work due.

His own career, rising by humble pursuits to become the owner of a large estate; the using of it for the promotion of a deeper spiritual growth and the more complete moral, physical, and intellectual development of the children of his native land—all this appears like a romance as we read of the career of the man and the history of the progress of the work in other countries as well as his own. An account of this, with some of the results, will be given later.

HOW TO UNITE.

BY JOHN G. WOOLLEY.

How may we unite all the enemies of the saloon? This question is "the rage" now, and it has many answers; here is mine:

We can't. We divide first of all as to who are enemies of the saloon. I had a conversation yesterday with an enthusiastic advocate of union. I reproduce the dialogue in brief:

Unionist. "I can't stand the Third Party; it has put itself on a pedestal and says, 'Look at me. I take high ground; we must be out and out or nothing.' What we want is for you to get off your pedestal and join in with all the enemies of the saloon to do the best we can."

Separatist. (That's I, on the authority of II Cor. 6-17) "You want to join with me?"

U. "Yes."

S. "You hate the saloon?"

U. "Yes."

S. "Are you in favor of permitting some saloons, at least for a while?"

U. "Yes."

S. "You believe in reaching prohibition eventually by selling some saloon permits at gradually increasing prices?"

U. "Yes."

S. "You consent for the present to the one hundred and sixty-three legal saloons in this city?"

U. "Yes."

S. "Do you expect me to consent?"

U. "No."

S. "How then can we unite? What use could you make of me in your fight? or what could I use you for in mine?"

U. "I was a soldier in the Civil War. I was in the Infantry. Suppose when I saw a troop of cavalry coming into battle, or a battery of artillery, I had refused to join them? You'd have thought me a fool, wouldn't you? That's you."

S. "Amen! But say, suppose the cavalry had declared that its plan was to gallop into the Confederate camp and—offer to go home for $100. Or suppose the artillery had said, 'We propose to plant a battery right here, and load the guns and—send word to the enemy, under a flag of truce, that if they want to rebel they must do it on their own territory, or if they want to buy and sell men they must not try to compel us to do it.' "

U. "It's no use to try to reason with you!"

* * * * * * * *

Now, this country is fairly represented in its temperance sentiment by this Unionist and Separatist, or "U. S.," and how can these two characters combine to advantage? I don't call my friend "U." an element of the saloon at all, but more accurately a fault-finding and unreliable friend. He doesn't hate the saloon, he thinks he does but he doesn't. He dislikes it, regrets it, thinks ill of it, feels that "if he could, he would." . . . That isn't hate. A boy lying face downward across the master's knee, involuntarily despises the master, disapproves of him, thinks "if he could he would"—but you'd hardly call the boy the master's enemy. You never think of a sheep as the wolf's enemy.

So I am unable to think the man an enemy of the saloon who, in the pulpit, or out of it, makes faces at it, and talks with tears about the drink, and yet consents, under pressure, to let the saloon have his proxy, temporarily, while the sprouted sentiment is cultivated. That sprouted sentiment that is kept so warm is used by the brewers as Christian malt.

Henry Ward Beecher said, speaking of our foreign population, "When a lion swallows an ox, the ox becomes lion." That's true. So is this: "When the saloon power of this country swallows every election, as it does, nineteen-twentieths of the Christian vote, that Christian vote becomes saloon power. If a man wants to unite with enemies of the saloon, one thing is needful; let him be an enemy of the saloon! The fact seems to be that the enemies of the saloon are united. While God is God, every man that is right is united to every other man that is right, and the process of getting right is one of "separation," having to do with God and self without reference to union with any.

To my mind the main question about "union" is: What for? Just to be social—better friends? I haven't time. Union to let the saloon live for a royalty for using the public conscience! I'd rather be alone than with a world on such a basis. Union to hunt the saloon to death, now! I'm there, come on, everybody!

The principal matter is, not to get a crowd together, but for the average temperance man to get himself together; he is now a will-o'-the-wisp—luminous but gaseous—and the more you see of them together the deeper you'll be in the swamp. The woods are full of "just as good temperance men as you," but too many of them are full of nothing but more or less inflammable gas. It must not be thought that I deny good intentions to the complaisant temperance man; not at all; but if God tells me to defend His cause and another man to betray it for money, I must stay apart till God unites us.

I know our placable friends say they hate the saloon—(hatred varying from two hundred and fifty dollars a year to as much a quarter), but I cannot walk with the commercial travelers toward prohibition; our faces are looking different ways, I think. I hate the saloon no money's worth, but my life's worth, my home's worth, my hope's worth, here and hereafter. I am out of "trade" and living on my interest in the riches of God's grace in Jesus Christ and by the blood of the Son of God. I'll traffic with no dramseller. I am impractical, very likely, but I can't help it. Coronation in a "license" temperance meeting sounds to me like this:

All hail the power of Jesus' name!
Let angels prostrate fall;
Bring forth the royal diadem,
And sell it.

Union is not the principal thing, but rightness. We ought to unite in prayer for a baptism of common sense so that we would all see that our matter with the saloon is a fight and not a parade. We have too many drum-majors and too few muskets, so to speak The crying need of our reform, humanly speaking, is business sense. We have abundance of what—by courtesy—we may call "the salt of the earth,"—of a brackish and earthy quality, to be sure—but almost no enterprise.

In downright "strength of material" in this bald travesty of free and Christian government, one saloon-keeper counts as much as a whole church society, pastor, people, sexton and undertaker.

"Figures for that?" There are approximately two hundred thousand dramsellers in this country, and approximately two hundred thousand Christian churches—and the saloon wins. David B. Hill was simply a wise child of darkness when he said he would rather have the saloons on his side than the churches, and it is the same kind of wisdom that puts Senator Quay at the head of his party and thrusts Senator Blair to its foot.

What is to be done? Every Christian man ought to separate from his party—whatever it be, if it does not unequivocally and immediately declare hostility to the saloon. Don't they call threshing machines separators?

THE GREAT SUNDAY-SCHOOL CONVENTION.

[Through an inadvertence the publication of this interesting report has been delayed.—ED.]

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The sixth International Sunday-school Convention had about eight hundred delegates from forty-three states, territories and provinces. It met in the Mechanical Hall of the Exposition Building, Pittsburgh. The local committee made handsome provision for the convenience of delegates, etc., at a cost of $3,000, including the decorations, which were elaborate and beautiful. The weather was of the most melting sort, and the non-acoustic qualities of the great hall, which had accommodations for five thousand persons, were a disadvantage. Major Harris, of Montgomery, Ala., was chosen president, and was a true Southern type in appearance, voice, gallant figure and bearing. Bishop Vincent spoke one evening on the Bible in his usual felicitous manner. There were other admirable speakers and five women were on the program—Mrs. W. F. Crafts, Mrs. Dr. Ostrander, Misses Willard, Van Marter and Wheelock.

Among the results of this great meeting, characterized as it was by remarkable ability and unanimity of sentiment, the following may be epitomized. A better understanding of the international idea, and more hearty cooperation therein; larger contributions; a plan to undertake special work for the colored people and to send expert workers to hold conferences in all parts of the world. But the result of the most intense interest to our white-ribboners is the temperance lessons. This subject was thoroughly considered in the Lesson Committee, Executive Committee and Convention, exciting far more interest than any other that was considered. Fifteen state Sunday-school conventions had memorials for four temperance lessons a year, none of these to be on review Sunday. Chicago had a memorial with fifteen hundred names to the same purport, including very many of our leading pastors and superintendents, Boston, ditto, and Miss Kimball was alert and in earnest, as she has always been. Miss Kimball spoke before the executive committee, and Miss Willard had thirty-five minutes given her in the convention and was made a delegate by the Illinois Sunday-school committee, as was Miss Kimball. Miss Willard was also made a delegate by the convention at large, on motion of Wm. Reynolds, of Peoria, and spoke before it by special invitation, on the day previous to her address relative to the Temperance Lesson. Thus the utmost courtesy was shown to our official representatives. Mrs. Smith, of the Rhode Island W. C. T. U. also spoke in the debate which lasted about an hour and was very spirited. Grand men among the leaders were on the two sides of the question, none opposing the setting apart of some Sundays, the only debate being as to the number. Judge Loomis, of Ohio, offered a resolution for four specific lessons yearly. The Lesson and Executive committee had unanimously agreed to the following substitute, which was moved by B. F. Jacobs, the central figure of the convention and originator of the uniform lesson series:

The executive committee having received memorials and resolutions from various states, together with petitions and memorials from societies, states and individuals on the subject of temperance, and having carefully considered the same, report as follows:

In selecting the course of Lessons for the year 1892, the Lesson Committee found in the ordinary course in one quarter a suitable Temperance Lesson, and therefore, they made the Lesson for the thirteenth Sunday a Missionary Lesson.

In another quarter for the same year they found in the regular course a suitable Missionary Lesson. Therefore, for the thirteenth Sunday of that quarter they have given a Temperance Lesson only.

For the two remaining quarters of that year, for the thirteenth Sunday, they have selected a Temperance Lesson and a Missionary Lesson, leaving it optional with the Schools to use either.

The committee cannot say in advance just what Lesson will occur in any year, but think it is possible that the selection for other years may be like the selections for 1892, in the respect above named.

In conference with the Corresponding Members of the Lesson Committee for Great Britain, these brethren desiring to promote the study of Temperance in the Sunday-Schools of Great Britain, urge that the Committee continue to have optional Temperance Lessons, saying that if only a Temperance Lesson is selected, many schools would not use it, but select other lessons and the plan be impaired. But if the optional plan is used as above suggested, the number of schools choosing a Temperance Lesson will steadily increase, and they hope that the day may come when a large majority, if not all the schools, will use the Temperance Lessons.

And the executive committee of the International Sabbath School Convention desiring to extend the use of Temperance Lessons as widely as possible, and believing that the course marked out by the Lesson Committee will secure this result, recommend the following:

Resolved, That the Convention approve of the action of the Lesson Committee as indicated in the selection of the Lessons for 1892. And further, that they recommend to the publishers of Lesson Helps throughout the United States and Provinces of Canada, to make the expositions and notes upon the Temperance Lessons as full as upon other lessons of the quarter, and also to specially emphasize the subject of Temperance in all lessons in the regular course where it can suitably be done.

Unanimously approved by the Committee.

B. F. JACOBS, Chairman.

This was finally adopted by a vote of 260 to 109, and which, on motion of Miss Willard, was made unanimous amid great good will; the Doxology was sung, prayer offered by Dr. Potts, of Canada, and the great question that will never down had swept onward to a blessedly advance position.

We did not gain all that we asked, but it was worthy of a Te Deum laudamus that we did by God's blessing secure the following from that great convention of devoted Christian workers at Pittsburgh, June 28, 1890: "Two out and out temperance lessons a year, beginning with 1892; two other temperance lessons a year, optional. No temperance lessons to be put in competition with review Sunday. This method to prevail throughout the new series of the seven years following 1892. And, further, all of these leaders" recommend to the publishers of Lesson Helps throughout the United States and provinces of Canada to make the expositions and notes upon the temperance lessons as full as upon other lessons of the quarter and also to specially emphasize the subject of temperance in all lessons in the regular course where this can suitably be done."

So may it be, and God be thanked. A. S.

THROUGH COLORADO.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—A wonderful state is Colorado! Nature tumbled out her resources here, and piled them up with no niggardly hand.

I began at Boulder—a lovely little place older than Denver and as completely under control of the saloons. A little union of women witness for temperance, and so far as I could learn, it is the only witness.

Denver was the next appointment, where in Trinity M. E. Church, I was greeted with a great audience. Afterwards I heard that the pastor was an advocate of high license, and felt that the strong condemnation of that iniquity by the speaker was discourteous—coming from his own pulpit. But how was the speaker to know that that delusion of Satan had captured him? Nobody told her. These high license clergymen should put a notice on their pulpits to that effect, then speakers will know—whether they heed, or no! Without such notice the conclusion is inevitable that a preacher of Christ's gospel is opposed to all compromise with evil. The Central union of Denver is doing a magnificent work. It has control of a fine restaurant where such good, wholesome, homelike cooking is offered that the patronage is large and increasing. The restaurant is combined with a woman's exchange also. The Central union keeps a city missionary (Mrs. Rev E. M. Leonard, who is an ordained minister in the Congregational Church) in the field all the time, has a mission room where regular services are held, and sustains a "day nursery" and "kitchen garden" at a monthly expense of between two and three hundred dollars—which is met by proceeds of the restaurant. With Minneapolis, Denver and Chicago unions making such a splendid financial success of the restaurant business, why do not more of our city unions try it? Of course a woman will keep a better restaurant than a man—and will make it pay better, too! Why not? Isn't that her sphere? Has she not been managing and economizing in the household for centuries? Is it not her high calling to prepare good cooking for the world? Yet in Minneapolis I hear the "men people" who keep restaurants are laying sore charges against the Central union because of its cheap and good menu. O consistency, thou art a jewel!

I visited Longmont, the home of Mrs. Thompson, president of Colorado union, and found they had voted out the saloon—also Greeley, where no saloon has ever been permitted, but a little town three or four miles distant supplies all the thirsty. The same is true of Colorado Springs, which has never had saloons, but has Colorado City, within a mile or two, full of saloons. The southern district convention was held in Colorado City, and here I first met its efficient president, Mrs. Higgins, of LaVeta, who has made most of my appointments in Colorado. The state president was there with timely counsel and encouragement. Mrs. Wallace, of Boulder, gave a parliamentary drill which in skill and suggestiveness was never surpassed by our parliamentarian, Mrs. Benjamin.

At Canon City I attended Flower Day service at the state's prison. It was well arranged by the superintendent of that department, and seemed to leave a good impression.

From Canon I went to Leadville, the highest union in the world, going through Grand Canon and Royal Gorge of the Arkansas river, an iron roadway cut in rock and following the course of the river to its source; up and up steams the iron horse as if determined to find right where that river starts. In some places the snow lies along the track so near that we can almost reach it, and its cool breath fans our cheeks. The union at Leadville has spent its greatest strength in charity work; looking after and doing for the families of men who spend their entire substance in the saloons. Each year hundreds of dollars have gone into this work, while the saloons have paid their bribe money into the city treasury. I asked the union "if it thought the cause of temperance was advanced any by its relieving the town of the care of its saloon victims?" The ladies assured me that the increase of temperance sentiment was not perceptible in return for the outlay of money, labor, and sympathy. I advised them to let the dead bury its dead. If a town must have saloons and derives a revenue therefrom, then it should have the care and support of the victims of the saloons. No obligation rests on the W. C. T. U. to assume this task. Of course some tender heart will cry out, "What should the W. C. T. U. do?" It should educate public sentiment against this infamy—teach total abstinence to the young—reform (if possible) the drunkard, and banish the saloons from our streets forever. That is its work, and not paying rent for the drunkard's family and supplying it with clothes and food, so that the father may give all his earnings to the saloon, and it in turn may furnish revenue for the corrupt officials it creates from time to time.

En route to Leadville, I spent one day in Salida, a lovely little mountain town, with clear, cold water babbling and gurgling along either side of its streets. Spent two days in Colorado Springs where one church was open and one pastor evinced a most kindly coöperation, then on to LaVeta, in the shadow of the Spanish Peaks, and thence over that marvel of engineering through Veta Pass and Toltec Gorge to Durango. Here my hostess, Mrs. Boyle, took me to ancient Indian ruins from which she had dug seven pieces of priceless black pottery. The ruins were flat with the earth, yet the form of building could be traced. Some thirty-five miles southwest of Durango are famous cliff-builders' ruins.

The scenery from Durango to Silverton is awe-inspiring. O the power that piled these mountains, height upon height! I am sure that old Moses felt no more veneration when he stood unshod before the burning bush than I felt as we wound around and ever up, up, among these everlasting, unchanging wonders. I felt not a little veneration for man, too, in his achievements in engineering and his conquest of material forces. But when in all these mountain towns, I found the saloon, the gambling den and the house of shame receiving the same recognition and protection from law as that extended to the bakery and grocery, I must confess to a feeling of contempt for man as legislator and ruler. Yet Colorado is not a sinner above other states.

THE PETITION AND BILL OF THE W. C. T. U. FOR A COMMISSION ON THE SUBJECT OF THE SOCIAL VICE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The petition of the National W C. T. U., praying for a law "providing for a commission on the subject of the social vice," and the bill for such a law, prepared by the Attorney of the National W. C. T. U., were presented in both bodies of Congress today. Senator Edmunds, of Vermont, presented the petition, and Senator Frye, of Maine, the bill in the Senate. Hon. Gilbert L. Laws, of Nebraska, presented both in the House of Representatives. They were referred to the Committees on Education. The wording of the first section of the bill is as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commission of five persons, who shall be selected solely with reference to their personal fitness and capacity for an honest, impartial, and thorough investigation of the social vice, and who shall hold office until their duties shall be accomplished, but not to exceed two years from the time of their appointment. It shall be the duty of said commission to investigate the social vice in all its phases, its relations to labor and wages, to marriage and divorce, its effects on individuals, unborn children, and the general welfare of the people, and its general economic, criminal, physical and moral aspects in connection with pauperism, crime, the public health and morals; and also to inquire into the practical results of legislation and the various methods relied upon for the repression of the evil in the several states and territories of the United States and in the District of Columbia."

The second section provides that "all of said commissioners shall not belong to one sex nor the same political party." The balance of the bill is in the usual form of commission bills, and has the exact wording of the "Bill to provide for a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic" as reported this session of Congress by the House Committee on the alcoholic liquor traffic.

This is the first measure of the kind Congress has received. Nearly all with whom your correspondent has talked on the subject, express the belief that it will receive general approval of the public, and due response on the part of Congress. ADA M. BITTENBENDER.

Washington, D. C., June 30, 1890.

WHAT TO DO.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Another advance step has been taken. On behalf of the National W. C. T. U., Ada M. Bittenbender, our attorney at Washington, has, in her capacity of superintendent of our legal department, asked for a commission on the social vice. Senator Frye, of Maine, a clean man from a clean state, presented the bill on our behalf. This is a significant action. The bill asks for "a commission to investigate the social vice in all its phases, its relations to labor and wages, to marriage and divorce, its effects on individuals, unborn children, and the general welfare of the people and its general economic, criminal, physical and moral aspects in connection with pauperism, crime and the public health and morals; and also to inquire into the practical results of legislation and the various methods relied upon for the repression of the evil in the several states and territories of the United States and in the District of Columbia."

The American people were never so much aroused as now upon this most stupendous of all the "Home Questions." They want facts as a basis for action. I appeal to all churches, temperance and social purity associations to help the white-ribboners by petitioning promptly for the appointment of this commission. Send names to Mrs. Ada M. Bittenbender, Washington, D. C. Let us be much in prayer for the success of this new endeavor in the name of "God and Home and Native Land."

FLOWER MISSION DAY IN NEBRASKA.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—

"Two years in a prison cell;
Farewell, faded flower, farewell."

Such are the opening lines of an apostrophe to flowers, written by one who received the conventional bouquet on Flower Mission Day, 1887, in the Nebraska Penitentiary, and sent the same to the speaker's desk on Flower Mission Day just closed, accompanied by the following request: "Please send this faded flower, emblem of love's ministry, to Miss Casseday, whose errands of mercy through the flowers have been so soothing to the disconsolate. How inspiring her spirit of hope to-day to the sinful and oppressed."

Not often is tribute more pathetic laid at the feet of tireless worker. Carefully preserved within the lids of the little Testament, the Easter gift of the department to every prisoner, two years ago, the white ribbon and Scripture text intact, each tiny leaf, and bud and blossom perfectly preserved, this little souvenir is brought from its treasure-house and sent on its pilgrimage to the shrine at which so many of us have reverently bowed, the shrine of a consecrated life, whose ministry knows no latitude. Who shall measure the power of this single "faded flower"? Multiply that power by a million annually, and this by the decades. One gets just a hint of the far-reaching fragrance of that angel life, who is the author and inspiration of the department.

The fiftieth natal anniversary of such a life! How much the Master meant, for human sorrow, in such birth. The prophecy was not read in the baby eyes. Doubtless, as the years went by, and the furnace fires began to kindle, the unanswerable "why?" fell from many lips. When God puts a soul into the crucible at white heat, He does not answer our questioning. But He gives us the product, refined gold.

Another bouquet bore the autograph of Mrs. ———, who is just closing her ten years' term for the crime (?) of shooting the would-be destroyer of her honor, a woman of refinement and delicacy of feeling, who has borne her incarceration in tearful silence, with a gentleness of spirit as rare as it is beautiful. Often has she rehearsed to the writer every detail of the terrible tragedy, and the agony of despair which seized her in those first awful moments when she found herself a murderess. Every little token she has received on each of the five national days of the jail and prison and flower mission services of each year she has sacredly treasured, and now brings the "faded flower" of five long years' ministry and sends it to Miss Casseday, as the cable by which her heart has been lifted to Him who said, "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as wool."

Never has the mission of the flowers had higher significance than on the day just closed. Sunday, June 15 (as our state institutions are not open to us upon a week-day), was observed throughout the state, in local, county and state institutions. We waive a formal report, that the incidents which are the indices of its potentiality may appear. On Saturday, the express companies, by every train, brought in, gratuitously, baskets of flowers from all the surrounding towns for use at the capital, Lincoln. The school children of Waverly were dismissed and sent to the fields to gather their wealth of bloom. Private gardens and conservatories furnished generous supplies. The lesson of kinship taught this, even to the children. Strange as it may seem to the novitiate in the work, nowhere is flower service more soothing in its influence than with the insane

At the state prison with its 380 prisoners, thirty-five of whom are under twenty-one years of age, each prisoner marched to the service bearing the conventional bouquet of the mission. American flags were grouped about the chapel. Floral designs of exquisite beauty made the air heavy with their perfume. An audience of 400 citizens was present in the chapel and many were unable to gain admittance. The writer was carried from carriage to chapel, and spoke an hour standing on one foot, the other supported by a chair. The convict orchestra of five pieces, accompanied by the organ, rendered a musical selection of wonderful sweetness. A tenor soloist of the convict choir sang, "Take me back to Home and Mother," the choir joining in the chorus, with such pathos as moved the listeners to tears. Under its inspiration the writer summoned the youngest of the group, a pale faced youth of striking features, whose lips grew tremulous with the song, and placed in his hand a bunch of roses with the words, "I give you these in remembrance of your mother."

Tears sprang to his languid eyes and taking a letter from his pocket, he said, "Will you please take this home and read it?" In a delicate hand, the mother, one of our noble W. C. T. U. women, in a far-away eastern city, thus addresses the son:

"O MY DARLING:—What shall I write you this June day, the month of roses! your favorite flowers. I never see them but I think of my dear boy shut away from all he loves. . . . Flower Mission day is next Sunday, and I have prayed God to put it into the heart of some one to give you some lovely flowers on that day. I would send them if it were not so far."

What a wonderful system—this telegraphy between earth and heaven for sundered hearts! A volume of such testimonies is gathered in a single day, another must suffice:

The sweet-spirited girl of German extraction, my nurse since my injuries, said to me as we were grouping the bouquets for the prison: "Two or three times since Mr. B. was released from prison (by executive pardon) I have met him and his wife at our church gatherings, and though I had always known them, I have never spoken to Mr. B. since his return. I have an instinctive fear of a murderer. Last evening he and his wife approached the group where I was standing and he said, 'Lizzie, I see you evade me; I committed murder, it is true. It was the whisky that did it. I shall never again wrong myself or another. You need not fear me. Eight years in that prison, if one has any manhood, will call any one from his lethargy. This prison work has saved many a man from himself.'

"Said his wife, 'I have a little box which contains five withered bouquets, a white ribbon and a text of Scripture are attached to each. They are the souvenirs of five successive flower mission days, at the penitentiary. We cherish them as sacred mementoes. On the ninth of June every year so long as we live, we are to open that box in our home, and together, teach our children how papa found Christ.'"

Such is the cable by which lost souls are reaching unto God. Long live our "sick-bed" superintendent, Miss Casseday.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

[On account of the pressure of matter for "News from the Field," we have admitted this letter into the Correspondence columns.—ED.]

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Mrs. Stevens says that so far since the National Convention this has been the best year of W. C. T. U. work that her state, Maine, has ever known. The lecture field has been well supplied; Mrs. Woodbridge and Mrs. Lathrap have spent several weeks in the state speaking most acceptably. Mrs. Helen G. Rice has visited Aroostook county in the interest of the Loyal Temperance Legion and Sunday-school work. She was warmly welcomed everywhere, and did splendid service. Mrs. M. E. A. Gleason, state superintendent of narcotics for Massachusetts, is already a favorite in Maine. She has been speaking for the Y's, and has given great satisfaction. She is a bright, forcible speaker, thoroughly alive to her subject. The state convention meets in Portland late in September or early in October.

The general work in New Hampshire prospers. We are glad to learn that the state W. C. T. U. is to publish a monthly magazine of thirty-two pages We are sure that it will contain such good, cheery news and valuable information that we shall impatiently wait for it.

Connecticut is "thriving." Mrs. Forbes lately visited a large number of the W. C. T. U's of the state with desirable results, added membership, and greater zeal and activity all along the line. She has organized recently four new unions, the last one coming into the "Union" with a membership of thirty-two. The semi-annual county conventions are being held and are marked by increased interest and enthusiasm, larger attendance and a spirit of loyalty to state and National unions. The state annual convention will meet in New Haven, in October. An all day temperance convocation will be held at Willimantic August 26, at which Mrs. J. K. Barney will speak.

In union with Connecticut and Rhode Island, the Massachusetts W. C. T. U. is arranging for a three days' summer assembly at Cottage City, Martha's Vineyard, August 26, 27 and 28. The Methodist Tabernacle, which has a large seating capacity, has been secured. The mornings will be devoted to different departments of W. C. T. U. work. In the afternoons an hour each will be given to the evangelistic department, the Y. W. C. T. U. and the Loyal Temperance Legion. It is expected that Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, Mrs. J. K. Barney, Miss Fanny Griffin, Mrs. Burlingame, Mrs. Forbes, and Bishop Mallabien will give the evening addresses, while Miss Nichols, of Rhode Island, and Miss Houghton, of Massachusetts, will have charge of the Y hours. A special attraction will be the stereopticon lecture by Mrs. Alice J. Osborne, one of Boston's favorite singers and a strong temperance worker.

The Massachusetts W. C. T. U. shows no abatement in zeal and earnest work. A spirit of devotion and harmony prevails in local unions and throughout the state, while there is a steady advancement in all lines of work. There are at present over three hundred local unions, which number is constantly increasing.

In addition to the work of organization Miss Tobey has given a series of Bible readings in eighteen different cities and towns. This evangelistic service has given the workers fresh enthusiasm and courage and has gained for the unions not only new members but also the sympathy and encouragement of Christian people, especially that class which has been prejudiced to the work of the W. C. T. U.

The Y. W. C. T. U. is prospering under the management of Miss Effie M. Houghton, the state superintendent, and Miss Elizabeth M. Fessenden, assistant superintendent. County conferences have been held with the Y's, which in each instance have strengthened the unions. A larger conference, including five counties, was held in Boston, at which the departments of kitchen garden, Cheerful Home Societies, juvenile work, railroad work, narcotics, flower mission and coffee rooms were discussed. The work of the Boston Y. W. C. T. U. in establishing a coffee house shows perseverance under difficulties. An entire house has been secured, the upper part being rented as tenements, while a café is fitted up on the ground floor where a good lunch can be obtained for a few cents. Hot soups have been added to the bill of fare, which has materially increased the patronage. In the evening the room is occupied as a reading room.

Possibly you may have heard of the work of the Athol Y's, who entertained the state convention in May. At a cost of $2,000 they have rented and remodeled a building, comfortably and pleasantly furnished eleven rooms heated by steam, which they let to young women at $1.50 per week. Two large rooms are reserved for parlors where the Y meetings and socials are held. On the ground floor is a commodious restaurant which is self-supporting, having forty regular table boarders. There is also a gymnasium in connection with the work.

Knowing of their success, it was with more eagerness than usual that we accepted the invitation to the semi-annual convention. And we were not disappointed. With the courage and ability of older workers the active and honorary members attended to the numerous details incident to the entertainment of a state convention, and everything was in readiness when the evening train arrived bringing delegates and visitors. The Y evening proved a pleasant and successful opening for the convention. The business sessions began the next morning with a good representation from the local unions. In place of the usual reports from superintendents, certain departments of work were selected, which were presented by the superintendent, who was followed by three minute speeches from the floor.

Mr. Henry H. Faxon surprised us by a gift of $500. Miss Minnie L. Phelps, who previously had filled a series of engagements in Vermont, where Mrs. Housh speaks in enthusiastic terms of her ability and success, gave the second evening address.

Dr. Julia M. Plummer, of Boston, gave a practical address on social purity, which she treated with womanly tact. We feel rich in securing for this part of our work the aid of this talented young woman. She is associated with Dr. Caroline Hastings, who is well known, not only as a physician, but also for the valuable service she has rendered as a member of the Boston School Board.

Mrs. Susan S. Fessenden presented her department and also gave an address at an overflow meeting. Massachusetts bids fair to lose much of the services of one of her finest speakers, as thirteen states already have written to secure Mrs. Fessenden's dates. EMMA WARD BUMSTEAD.

THE TEMPERANCE TEMPLE.

The Temperance Temple is now an assured fact. It begins to materialize. For many years a brilliant dream in the imagination of that clear-cut business woman, Matilda B. Carse, it has already settled to its foundations upon terra firma, on a site that is the envy of the best business men in the city, and has not its rival within the environs of the national metropolis. For, be it known, Chicago is now that. Second only in population, it is first in enterprise, first in fertility of invention, dauntless business enterprise, resources, and that greatest of all qualities, faith. It is the world's chief railroad center and market. While its shadows are dark, its lights are correspondingly brilliant. It gave to the world a Moody, greatest of evangelists; a B. F. Jacobs, inventor of the International Lesson series; a Philip Bliss, to whom we owe the world-wide gospel songs; it is the center of temperance work for Christendom. The corner-stone of the Woman's Temple is to be laid on the 13th of September; and there has not been, since this was a republic, another corner-stone the laying of which had a significance wider or more benignant. It means the temperance question; it means the woman question; it means the labor question; for in the Temple that shall be reared on these foundations all great ideas embodying the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man shall have a home. We have not at all measured up to the significance of this mighty enterprise. For my own part, not being a financier, I could never comprehend the vastness of the project. But on its philanthropic side it has always seemed to me the most attractive plan that I have ever known, for it sets an object lesson before the people concerning women and temperance, such an object lesson as neither of these vast movements has ever before approached. Let us, then, arise and build, adding ourselves, in great or little, as we may be able, to some substantial token of our loving interest, so that we shall be built into this Church of Humanity, this Temple of the People. I hope the movement for securing $100 from as many different women as can at all afford to give or raise that amount may be definitely pushed. My own $100 was long ago paid in; and that of mother and Anna Gordon will be taken from the proceeds of my last book. Many who cannot give the money outright can raise it in sums of a dollar, five dollars, or ten dollars, from their circle of friends.

The new plans and elevation are ready. They had to be changed, in order to adapt them to this new site; and I am told they are a dream of beauty, considered by the architect, who has no superior in America, to be his most successful work up to this time. Twenty-two months from now, if all goes well, the Temple will be an accomplished fact, and the National W. C. T. U., while not burdened with the responsibility in any financial way whatever, will be the recipient of its tangible results. Among these I do not regard the money as by any means taking first rank. It is the esprit du corps; it is the turning of all our faces toward one point, and uniting our hands in one single great endeavor. For I say it reverentially, much that the building of that sacred Temple of old did to forever unify the Jews, and deepen in their hearts the sense of dependence upon God, this Woman's Temple will do for us, who are the descendants, not lineally, but in spirit, of that wonderful people who gave to the world its Messiah.

Let us all rejoice that it is quite likely we shall be here when not only the corner-stone is laid, but the capstone put in place with grateful prayers and shouts of glad rejoicing.

Our Children.

OUR DUMB BROTHERS.

BY AGNES MAULE MACHAR.

See a countless multitude about us
  Claiming sympathy—our humble kin;
Sadly have they learned to fear and doubt us,
  Driven from our side by human sin;
Yet, though dumb, their hearts to ours are speaking,
Help and kindness from us ever seeking,—
  Kindness hard to win!

Inarticulate voices, groans of anguish,
  Patient sighs, 'neath burdens hard to bear;
From lone places where dumb victims languish,
  Plaintive moans are floating on the air!
Soft eyes, seeking ours with wistful pleading;
Can we turn away with hearts unheeding
  That unuttered prayer?

Innocent of wrong, our own transgression
  Lays on them a heavy load of pain,
Sharing all the misery and oppression
  Man has wrought beneath his iron reign.
Touch all hearts, O Thou Divine Compassion,
'Till they burn with generous love and passion
  To remove the stain.

They and we are in our Father's keeping,
  Whose compassion clasps both great and small;
Not one wrong eludes that eye unsleeping,
  Not one humblest life unseen shall fall.
None can serve Him with a heart unheeding
His dumb creature's inarticulate pleading,
  For He loveth all!

HOW ARCHIE LIGHTED THE FIRE.

BY MRS. ANNIE A. PRESTON.

"I want to read a story for the sake of the story and not for the moral," said Archie Hayden, a bright boy living on a Colorado ranch. "It seems as if 'most all the stories I get hold of have a 'lesson' in them. Now, Auntie Bell, you know as well as I do that such stories are not true. The morals don't happen; they have to be made up out of whole cloth."

"Perhaps you have not been accustomed to read the lessons of your own every-day life, or have had no one to point out the moral for you," said Aunt Bell.

"I guess if I ever did anything with a moral to it, I should know it quick enough," said the boy laughing, and turning again to his book.

Two or three hours later he came in, saying, "I shall have to be up bright and early to-morrow morning. I am going to the East mountain after berries with Dave Niles."

Aunt Bell looked up from her work in surprise, and remarked, "I understood your mother to say that he was a bad boy, not at all the kind of a companion she wished her Archie to associate with."

"He's full of fun," replied Archie, looking annoyed. "I told father, just before he and mother drove away, that Dave had asked me to go, and he made no objections, so that settles it, for they won't be home for three days."

Aunt Bell breathed a little silent prayer for wisdom to influence aright the lad left in her charge. The prayer was addressed to our kind heavenly Father and was heard by the Holy Spirit ever abiding in her heart and she felt assured that it would be answered. So she was able to say, presently, with no evidence of annoyance in her voice:

"Will you please kindle the fire to make the tea, Archie?"

"Well now, if Auntie Bell isn't a brick," said Archie, as he hastened to the shed for kindlings. "Some young women that I know of, left in charge of a lot of children and their folks away, would have set up that I should not go, and would have talked and argued and preached until sundown, and I should have got as mad as a hornet. I am glad she gave in so quick. I will be extra helpful to make up for it."

He came back whistling, and proceeded very carefully to arrange the kindlings in the stove, talking to himself meanwhile in this wise:

"First a little crumpled paper, then the shavings, then the smaller wood, and last of all a good-sized stick or two. Now I brush off all dust and litter from the stove with a wing; next I fill the teakettle with water fresh from the pump, and now I go for a match."

"Why, Auntie Bell!" he cried, "there is only one match here. I heard mother say last week that we must have a new supply of matches. Father must have forgotten to get them when he went to town."

"There are more or less scattered about in the safes in the different sleeping rooms," said auntie, "but it stands us in hand to be careful of them. It would not be pleasant to be caught without a fire or a light, and five miles from a store, without a match in the house. Shall I kindle the fire?"

"Oh, no, indeed! I can be very careful when I try," and he drew one of the matches across the sand paper on the bottom of the safe. It flashed up brilliantly. Archie lighted a wisp of paper and threw the match into the stove. The paper gave a little flare and then went entirely out.

"O auntie, I have lost it!" cried Archie. "No, I have not—yes, I have. Oh, the match is still blazing just the least little bit that ever was," and seizing a very thin piece of paper Archie held it close to the expiring flame. In an instant the blaze spread from the thin bit of paper to a larger piece, the shavings had caught and there was a roaring fire.

"Only one match after all," said Archie, glancing from the fire to Aunt Bell triumphantly.

"Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth," said Aunt Bell. "Do you remember, my dear, how often it says in the Bible, 'A certain thing was like unto?' "

"Yes," said Archie looking interested. "It is Jesus who says those things."

"Well," said auntie, "suppose now you and I fall into that way of speaking long enough to say: 'The tiny blaze lingering upon the match was like unto a little fault in the heart of a pretty good boy. It may have been a greater fault, but he has striven hard to overcome it until now only a little spark remains, and that would soon go out altogether if he would keep away from bad companions. But he persists in associating with a boy in whose heart that little fault has grown and grown until it has become a sin; and through his influence the fault in the heart of the other boy blazes up into a sin also."

"Yes," said Archie, "I see. I guess I will go out and gather the eggs before supper." When he came in with his well-filled basket he said, "I see, auntie, lessons in real things are like puzzles; they are a good deal easier when you understand getting them out. You needn't feel worried about me now. I have sent word to Dave that I have changed my mind about going to East Mountain." —The Advance.

GRADY'S LOVE OF HOME AND MOTHER.

One of the talented staff of the Atlanta Constitution, a woman, pays a feeling tribute to the memory of Henry W. Grady, in the course of which she says:

"Well do I remember how he spent his last year's holiday season, and the little story he told me of it as I sat in his office one morning after New Year's.

"He had visited his mother in Athens Christmas week, and he said: 'I don't think I ever felt happier than when I reached the little home of my boyhood. I got there at night. She had saved supper for me, and she had remembered all the things I liked. She toasted me some cheese over the fire. Why, I hadn't tasted anything like it since I put off my round jackets. And then she had some home-made candy, she knew I used to love, and, bless her heart! I just felt sixteen again as we sat and talked, and she told me how she prayed for me and thought of me always, and what a brightness I had been to her life, and how she heard me coming home in every boy that whistled along the street. When I went to bed she came and tucked the covers all around me in the dear old way that none but a mother's hands can know, and I felt so happy and so peaceful and so full of tender love and tender memories that I cried happy, grateful tears until I went to sleep.'

"When he finished his eyes were full of tears and so were mine. He brushed his hand across his brow swiftly and said, laughingly: 'Why, what are you crying about? What do you know about all this sort of feeling?'

"There is no surer foundation upon which to build a grand character than that of love of home and mother."

The Still Hour.

FOR THE WEEK BEGINNING JULY 27, 1890.

BY REV. C. C. HARRAH.

DAILY BIBLE READING NOTES.

(Luke 15:1-10; I Timothy 4-6; II Timothy 1-3.)

Sunday, 27; Luke 15:1-10. Verse 2, That which the Pharisees complained about in Jesus is what will always draw to Him the hearts of needy souls. Jesus is full of compassion and grace toward weary and heavy laden sinners who want to be saved. Verse 4, The good shepherd represents the faithfulness of God in searching for the lost sinner. God knows the meaning of salvation, and He cares more for us than we do for ourselves. Verse 6, When the lost is found God brings it "home." To feel at home with God and with all who love God, on earth and in heaven, makes one truly happy. Verse 7, If the angels are interested in the saving of a sinner Christians should be interested also, and the sinner should be interested in saving himself.

Monday, 28; I Tim. 4. Verse 4, "Between the two cliffs of spiritualism and materialism we see the bark of the Church continually tossed hither and thither in the course of the centuries. It has scarcely escaped the one, when it runs into peril of being stranded on the other." One must beware of his own spirit and then be diligent to shun "seducing spirits and doctrines of devils." Verse 8, "Bodily exercise" refers to the gymnastic training so much in vogue with the Greeks. The profit of this is for a little time; while godliness is profitable forever. The gospel is a power which grasps the whole man, and is the most practical thing in the world.

Tuesday, 29; I Tim. 5. Verse 6, No one is more dead to moral life and real blessedness than the idle pleasure seeker. Verse 8, How can one properly provide for his own when he thinks only of their physical comfort and makes no provision for their eternal well-being? Verse 23, The gross perversion of Paul's precept in respect to drinking water and wine, to make it sanction the habitual use of the intoxicating liquors of this country, is an example of the way that men who yield to a lust of the flesh wrest the Scriptures unto their own destruction. II Pet. 3; 16.

Wednesday, 30; I Tim. 6. Verse 6, "To exhort men to be religious, is only, in other words, to exhort them to pleasure—a pleasure high, rational, and angelic, with no sting, no loathing, no remorses or bitter farewells; neither liable to accident, nor exposed to injury. And when age itself shall begin to remind us of mortality, still even then the pleasure of the mind shall be in its full youth, vigor and freshness." Verse 10, The love of money is a great snare in our age. Verse 19, The right use of money may lead to great reward.

Thursday, 31; II Tim. 1. Verse 3, It is a great satisfaction, if family history shows faithfulness to God from generation to generation. Verse 5, The faith and love of parents who have lived obedient to God in body and spirit may be transmitted to children. Christian fathers and mothers should live so that they can expect to save not only themselves but their households. Verse 12, Paul was now an old man, and behold the strength of his faith by his long knowledge of God.

Friday, 1; II Tim. 2. Verse 1, Many a weak soul by becoming a Christian has developed into a strong and manly character. Verse 2, All soldiers have to bear "hardness;" but while we are serving under the banner of Jesus we shall not be called upon to endure more than we are able, or than is best for us. Verse 22, Youth has its special dangers, and none are safe in it who do not keep themselves from the corruption of the world and battle against that which is impure within.

Saturday, 2; II Tim. 3. Verse 2, Think of the long list of sins here catalogued, and then consider that self-love is the first of them all and the root of them all. Verse 13, There is no standing still in evil. Verse 15, What better evidence can one want of the truth and inspiration of the Bible than the lives which it has produced. Verse 17, It is remarkable how the Bible has always met every need of the children of God. "A book that has had such a past will also have a future.

THE PRAYER MEETING TOPIC.

(Why is the world not saved? Romans 1:16.)

1. It is not because the gospel has not sufficient power. It is now as much as ever, "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth."

2. The world is not saved because we have not a Pauline ministry and a church filled with the Holy Spirit. Good as the ministry is, it might be better; and by word and life exhibit more of the qualities of Paul. Good as the church is, it is wanting in prayer and faith and work, and should have more of the life and fruits of the Holy Spirit.

3. The world is not saved because there are not enough self-denying laborers to go forth to rescue the fallen and care for those who are dying in sin.

4. The unwillingness of the world is a reason why it is not saved. Our Lord Himself could not disciple those who would not come unto Him that they might have life. The unwillingness of sinners leads them to pervert the gospel, to be satisfied while ignorant of its truth, and to have no concern to repent of their sins and to do the will of God.

THOU hast but little sunshine, but thy long glooms are wisely appointed thee, for perhaps a stretch of summer weather would have made thee as a parched land and a barren wilderness. Thy Lord knows best, and He has the clouds and the sun at his disposal.—C. H. Spurgeon.

A KNOT OF RIBBON.

BY JENNIE E. KINMORE.

A gift—a knot of ribbon white,
So frail, I rend it with my hand,
And yet, with strongest ties, it holds
The firmest, truest, holiest band
That ever loved and lived to save
"For God," their "Homes and Native Land."

A pledge:—"I promise to abstain,"
It is no sacrifice to me;
But joy, to burst the shackles loose,
And help to set the captive free;
To lead from rum's dark thralldom forth
Into God's glorious liberty!

A vow:—That never, while life lasts,
While hope exists, while faith endure,
To fail or falter at our task,
Or doubt the Great Physician's cure;
Watching through darkness for the day
That dawns eternally and sure.

WHY AUNT MAG WON'T "TONE UP" ON ROCK AND RYE.

BY ELLA GUERNSEY.

"Did you want me to go nussin', ma'am? I'm glad I'm not needed in that line, as I've my hands full here at home. A young fellow was hurt by a bank cavin' in on him, while diggin' on a side hill, and they brought him to me, knowin' I'm allus glad to be able to airn an honest penny an' stay at home. The comp'ny pays all his bills.

"'Do I give him tonics, an' somethin' strengthenin'?' Yes'm, I does.

"'You've heerd rock an' rye was a great strengthener'—Um—yes. Not a drop of the rye has that pore boy tasted sence he has be'n in my hands, but he kin have all the rock he wants, an' if he has a sweet tooth, that'll be considerable. The doctors an' me have scrimmaged over the rye, but I beat 'em an' they had to hold their wrath.

"Jes' listen, an' I'll tell you why I'm so down on rock an' rye. I hain't allus been pore an' lived in a little house, havin' to work lively for daily bread, as, once I had a good husband an' four promisin' sons, who kept me real comfortable.

"Consumption took off my husband, an' John, the oldest boy, soon followed him, an' you wouldn't blame me for tryin' any an' every remedy I ever heerd of when Willie an' Eddy took a cough. Good old port, with a raw egg beaten in it, we had for Willie, then another sort o' wine with raw beef chopped in it come next, an', ma'am, I was so foolish as to think the red flush on his cheek meant the honest red belongin' to returnin' health, so I kept givin' it to him, keepin' the poor boy half drunk with wine. I had to give him up. Oh, those were bitter times! I felt that my God had forsaken me in my darkest hours. Past experience hadn't taught me to throw away such deceivin' medicine, so I began to dose Eddy with brandy an' loaf sugar, takin' great pains to get apple or peach brandy of 'great age and purity' (?) which cost more than I was able to pay. One thing comforts me, Eddy never learned to like it. All through his sickness he hated it, never hunted it up of his own accord, as did John an' Willie.

"You can guess what a sore heart I carried when I was forced to see Eddy, just turned seventeen, fadin' away. Every day he grew a little weaker, an' thinner, but was always patient an' lovin'. The priceless (?) brandy didn't save him, an' one winter morning there was a fourth grave dug under the row of cedars that my mother's hands had planted long ago, in old Mount Zion church-yard.

"I made an idol of Gilbert, the last one left. No, it wasn't right, but I did it, feelin' rebellious when the thought would come, 'he'll go the same way the others have.' I watched him carefully, thankful that he seemed strong in body. His limbs were straight, and he had a handsome face. My Gilbert, the baby, was a winnin' lad. Oh, the pity, the pity!" and the large, almost masculine figure for the moment swayed with emotion.

We looked about us and saw that bare and poor as the small room was, it was very, very neat and clean, though Aunt Mag hadn't an over-supply of time to spare from her "washin', ironin' and scrubbin'" engagements, to spend in looking after her own home.

"Gilbert," she resumed, "learned fast, and got to be a telegraph operator, and his office was in the little depot, just across the way; you can see it from the east window. But his work was night work, an' it's wearin' on a young boy to be up all the night. He was lookin' to get the day job. When he began to get peaked an' thin-faced, I fixed up the most temptin' lunches I knew how to get up, but he kept losin' appetite an' flesh, an' one mornin' he fell faintin' at my feet. Somebody said, 'Get him rock and rye; that is the very best medicine prepared for debilitated folks. The rye will brace them up, the glycerine and rock candy is soothin' to the cough.' I got the rock and rye. Gilbert liked it. I had no trouble to get him to swallow his medicine.

"'It's doing me good, mother; I can work all night and not get tired,' said he, and I began to hope that there wouldn't be a fifth grave soon, dug under the cedars. That bottle had to be re-filled right away; we hadn't the money to get it as often as Gilbert wanted it, and then he was angry with me for being so stingy. I was frightened when it was too late, but my pleadin's were in vain, and one day he came in at the door discharged from his position. 'For what, son?' I asked, and a thrill of pain shot through my heart as I read in the superintendent's letter that somebody had complained, 'He was no longer to be trusted, an' telegraph operators should be sober and trustworthy.'

"After that he wasn't long in fallin' to the lowest notch. How fast he went, and I couldn't stay his course one little moment, though my heart was breakin'. Soon he became known as that 'good-for-nothing Gilbert Wade,' ready to do anything for a drink of liquor. One mornin' there was an unusual crowd gathered at the depot waitin' for an excursion train, and I sat at the window watchin' Gilbert, with a great fear in my heart; he was just drunk enough to be insultin' and abusive, and there were others there who were not themselves. Some one said something Gilbert did not like, and he struck out his clenched hand, and there before my eyes, oh—ma'am, I can't tell you."

"Don't try," said we, trying to soothe the poor soul, who soon wiped away the blinding tears, and managed to tell us, her "boy was murdered while she sat there."

"It's not only the misery of havin' the boy die in such—such—Oh—it's—my—own wickedness—in puttin'—the cup—to his—lips—that's troublin' me. Say,—am—I—the—murderer—of my pore boy?" she wailed, and we could not comfort her.

"I'm tryin' to be a good woman, an' look up, not down, but, ma'am, on stormy nights when the winds sweep through the branches of those pines and cedars, they sound like dirges. Their music, even on sunny days, is so sad, sayin' to me over an' over, 'the past is beyond recall,' but I know there is yet time with my Master to agree.

"Now, do you wonder that I mean to die fightin' old port and raw eggs, Madeira an' beef, apple brandy an' loaf sugar, whisky an' rock candy, an' to see to it that I don't help death overtake other bright young men? I've set out to try to be a sort of a mother for several homeless young fellers, that brings their washin' to me. I watch 'em, an' lecture 'em, but they seem to like plain old aunt Mag, for all o' that."

THE EFFICACY OF PRAYER.

BY MARY SPARKS WHEELER.

Only a few months ago Mr. Gladstone said, "All men at the head of great movements are Christian men. During the many years I was in the Cabinet, I was brought into association with sixty master minds, and all but five of them were Christians. My only hope for the world is in bringing the human mind into contact with divine revelation."

Franklin believed in prayer as a practical force. In early life he doubted, and at the age of nineteen was a thorough Deist, and wrote a pamphlet to prove the doctrines of fate. As he advanced in years and wisdom he gave up his unbelief, and wrote another pamphlet on the other side of the question. This he began by saying: "Almost all men in all ages and countries have at times made use of prayer." At the age of fifty-eight he writes to his daughter Sarah: "Go constantly to church; I wish you would never miss the prayer days." In his speech in the Federal Convention, at the age of eighty-one, in behalf of his motion for opening its sessions with prayer, after four or five weeks spent in confusion of counsels and without progress, he said: "Groping, as it were, in the dark, to find political truth, let us apply humbly to the Father of Light to illumine our understandings. In the beginning of the contest with Britain, when we were sensible of danger we had daily prayers in this room for divine protection. Our prayers, sir, were heard, and they were graciously answered."

What Gladstone said of men is equally true of women. As we look at the leaders of great movements for the alleviation of suffering and the uplifting of humanity—Joan of Arc, who did more for her country than Leonidas for Greece; Elizabeth Fry, the prisoner's friend; Florence Nightingale, the wounded soldier's benefactor; Harriet Beecher Stowe, who helped so greatly in loosening the shackles from three millions of bondmen, we find they were women of prayer. They went forth trusting in the immutable promise of Him who said: "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth, therefore go ye, and I am with you always."

Prayer does not necessarily consist in magnificence of words, in eloquent sentences, but it is the "soul's sincere desire" breathed out before God, and faith gives it the practical force. Over and over again, so patiently and persistently the dear Redeemer tried to teach His disciples the lesson of faith. "Whatsoever things ye desire when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them." Again, "This is the confidence we have in Him that if we ask anything according to His will, He heareth us, and if He hear us, we know we have the petitions we desire of Him." Our Heavenly Father always answers us when we talk to Him. Sometimes in His love and wisdom He withholds the thing asked for, but in answer to our prayer sends us something better in its stead.

While on the cars on the way to a meeting, Mr. Moody took a letter from his pocket and handed it to some friends to read. It told in glowing terms of the conversion of a young man to Christ, of his desire to enter school in order to prepare himself for the Master's service. Then Mr. Moody told of his wayward life, his mother's anguish and intense desire for his salvation; of her tearful importunity with Mr. Moody for his aid and prayers in his behalf.

He said, "When the letter came to me one evening I was very weary with the services of the day, and I thought 'in the morning I will write his mother the joyful news.' But I could not sleep. I felt impressed to write at once. Reason said, 'You are tired, need rest, must have it. Sleep now and write to-morrow.' I settled the controversy by saying, 'I'll make one more heart happy before I sleep.' I wrote and sent the letter. She was upon her death-bed, but I knew it not. It reached her just in time for her to hear it read ere she breathed her last, and she passed away rejoicing in God for his salvation."

At Ocean Grove, having had charge of the mothers' meetings from the first, many remarkable incidents illustrating the practical force of prayer have come to my observation. On one occasion, in the year 1887, as we were about to close an unusually interesting and deeply spiritual meeting, a mother arose trembling under the tide of emotion and said: "When I was a young mother we had no mothers' meetings. I never heard any of these blessed teachings. I did as well as I knew, but if I had heard these things then, what a help it would have been to me! Now my only child is grown to manhood and gone from me—away in the far west. He is not near any church, has no religious instruction, is wandering in the paths of sin. He must be saved or I cannot live! Oh, what shall I do?"

"Pray for him," was the reply. "Ask God to save him. He is omniscient and omnipotent. He sees him, and can rescue him if he will only yield to be saved."

"Will you help me, my sisters?"

I asked all who would join this mother in prayer for her son to rise, clasp hands, and bow their heads in silent prayer. In a moment all were standing. A precious, Divine influence seemed to pervade all hearts, and several said, as tears of holy joy glistened in their eyes, "That prayer was answered."

A short time after the mother came to us, her face shining with ecstatic joy. In her hands she held a letter. She said: "Read it, and then please tell the mothers, or read it to them." It was from her son, telling her that on a certain day, at a certain hour (as near as we could ascertain just while we were praying for him) a strange feeling came over him. He felt that he was a sinner. He was so wretched he knew not what to do. He could think of no one whom he could ask to pray for him. In thought he wandered back to the days of his childhood when he knelt at his mother's knee, and repeated his little prayer:

"If I should die before I wake,
I pray Thee, Lord, my soul to take."

He fell upon his face before God and repeated it until the burden of sin was removed, and peace like a river flowed into his soul. We took the letter to the next meeting and read it in the presence of the mothers. It had a wonderful effect in strengthening the faith of others, and the incident will never be forgotten by those who were present.

Surely our own experiences are full of illustrations of the faithfulness of God in answering the prayers of his saints, and the truthfulness of the blessed assurance: "If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye may ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you."

THE W. C. T. U. AND THE CHURCHES.

The good works of the Gospel have always been in favor with the W. C. T. U. As fast as openings for doing good have presented themselves we have tried to meet the demand, so that now our many-sided society reaches out in about forty different directions. Some lines of reform are now vigorously pushed, for which nothing was done in an organized way before the W. C. T. U. began its work. The awakening of the public mind on the subject of heredity is an example. What we have done in this one branch of reform alone, justifies our existence as a benevolent and Christian organization. Every one of our departments of work seemed to be called into existence by the plain leadings of Providence, and at its birth received a baptism of the sincerest prayer. The superintendents of these departments have been chosen only because it seemed evident that God had raised them up to do just such work. They work by the watchword, "This one thing I do," and each one believes that her particular line of work is necessary in order to Christianize the world. All our workers are Christian women who endeavor to meet the full measure of personal responsibility in the work of the churches to which they belong.

They are in this W. C. T U. work for exactly the same reasons that some of them, and many other church members, are in the Union Sunday-school, or Christian Endeavor, or Young Men's Christian Association work. It is found necessary that Christians should combine their efforts along many lines of work, in order to save the world. As all our work is intensely practical, we have very few among us with those objectionable peculiarities which hinder usefulness. Such people naturally prefer associations where there is more talk, and less of hard, business effort. We are peculiar only as all Christians should be a peculiar people, by being zealous for good works. Our mistakes are such as are common to all men and women, who have courage to venture and who are determined to do something.

We have joined ourselves to those warning voices that God has always had in the world, and whom, for the time being, the world has for the most part disregarded. If reformers are able to speak with sufficient eloquence, they may get admiration for the form of their message, but men do not so quickly and readily receive the message itself. From the beginning of history, men have usually "stoned the prophets." All this has been carefully weighed, and our many-sided reform work demands a consecration which compels us to do duty and leave consequences with God. We invite all Christians everywhere to carefully scrutinize the work we are doing. Are not the churches made better and helped forward in their work by what we are doing? We have no secrets to keep. Our meetings are as open as those of our churches, and in every particular we regard ourselves as responsible for what we do to the community and to God. We are one with the Sunday-school, and all other Christian associations. In common with all of them, we exist for Christ and His church.

We are doing a work which the churches need to have done in order that the world may be saved. Like all other Christian Associations, we are in the church and of the church and for the church. Where the women of a community unite to do the broad work of a W. C. T. U., every church is helped thereby. If the church exists for any one work more than another, it is in order to bring up in the right way the children committed to its care. The children are the special charge of every local W. C. T. U. It aims to protect the children against every foe. In the interest of the children, the National society, through one of its departments of work, has helped to have laws enacted requiring scientific temperance instruction in thirty-six states and territories. No one can believe that this great work would now be done if it had not been for the W. C. T. U. This is but an example. We exist to help forward the educational work of the church for children. The children of our Loyal Legions are growing up to hate every bad thing and to serve Christ with pureness of life. Our literature for children is going into Sunday-schools and homes everywhere. We are doing what we can to instruct, encourage and help parents and teachers. We have publications that every public school-teacher and every Sabbath-school teacher should read.

We bear the name "Christian," and we are trying by our works to prove ourselves worthy of the name. We rejoice in denominational enterprises that are intended to lead the world to Christ. But what cannot be done by the local church or by a single denomination, we are trying to accomplish by our Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

THE ORDER OF DEACONESSES.

The little seed, planted a few years ago in the Missionary Training School, Chicago, has not only grown into the Deaconess Home of this city, but has stimulated growth in other cities, till now at least five similar institutions are established elsewhere. The Cincinnati Home, 50 York street, in charge of Miss Isabella Thoburn, has been in existence a year and four months, and has become so overcrowded that already another building has been taken to accommodate the new-comers. Still another has been added to supply the demand for hospital room, and it is now nearly ready for occupancy. Here the sick poor, especially the homeless ones, are cared for, with medicines for both body and soul. The deaconesses go out through the city, doing service "in His name" to those who most need their ministrations.

This Home is situated near several factories, a depot and a car barn; noting that there was no place where the employés of these establishments could secure lunch without running into temptation to drink, the deaconesses added keeping a lunch stand to their nursing and visitation, and the result seems to be justifying their wisdom. Supplying clean, cheap, nourishing food, in a place where Christian influences are brought to bear upon every one who enters, may be serving the Master as genuinely as if they were preaching.

The Minneapolis Home is at 2725 Second Avenue, under care of Miss Rotis, and its work grows larger every week.

The Detroit Home at 194 Clifford street, Miss Gaddis, superintendent, was opened only last December, yet is already doing a great work. It was started in the second story of the house used as headquarters of the Woman's Home Missionary Society, in a district almost entirely foreign, having such a large number of Polish inhabitants that it is often called Polecktown. Near by is a Polish Catholic Church with a sister-house adjoining, from which the sisters go out to work among the sick and poor. We are glad that Protestant sisters are now doing their own beneficent work side by side with the Catholic ones. This building soon proved much too small, and in March a pleasant house on Clifford street was rented for the Deaconess Home proper, while the Tillman avenue house was still retained for mission work. Mrs. Kellar, who, with Miss Thornborough, was in charge of the work, begged to remain there, and so successful is she in bringing light into this dark place, that the little home over which she presides has won the name, "Bit of Heaven House." Every night gospel meetings are held there, and so eager are the people to come that often many stand outside waiting for the doors to be opened. The music is a great attraction, the wretched men and women often calling for hymn after hymn, till the ladies are tired.

One night lately when the question was asked, "Who would like to be prayed for?" many hands went up, and some one exclaimed, "Yes, we all would."

A poor, sinful girl said, "I want to do better, but can't; no use for me to try." Miss Gaddis writes: "Such a look of despair came over her face, it made our hearts ache for her. 'You must keep out of bad company,' we said. But where can she 'keep,' with a drunken father and mother, nothing but sin and shame all around her? A better life seemed almost impossible for her, and yet we know the tender, loving Father can make a way of escape for even this poor soul." To such poor, lost sheep does the deaconess bring knowledge of the Good Shepherd.

Philadelphia has just dedicated a Deaconess Home, No. 547 Sixteenth street. Bishop Foss, Miss Bancroft, Dr. Wheeler and Mrs. Rust took part in the exercises.

In Washington a movement is on foot to establish a Home as a memorial to Mrs. Lucy Webb Hayes; Mrs. President Harrison was present at the preliminary meeting.

Now comes a call to send two deaconesses to China, and they will be sent, if the funds are forthcoming. We believe they will be, for an especial pocket-book blessing has followed this work. Last year two sisters supported a nurse deaconess in the Chicago Home, as a loving memorial to their mother; so blessed did they feel the work to be that this year they are supporting two. The work of the nurse deaconesses is in the homes of the poor taking care of the sick; the demand for them far exceeds the supply. Most pathetic are the records of their work.

The deaconesses need training, not only in all housewifely arts and in nursing, besides that for evangelistic work; they also need to understand dress-making, that they may help tired mothers by showing them how to do better work in this direction. The Chicago Home has a deaconess dress-maker at last, and now it asks for a compositor—a lady who can set type.

HOW TO SAVE THE MASSES.

Mrs. Booth, the mother of the Salvation Army, gave an excellent answer to the question of Hon. Samuel Morley, whose death was so great a loss to every reformatory measure. He had said, "The greatest benefactors to England to-day would be those who would point out methods by which earnest Christian men with pecuniary means, and willing, also, to render personal service and help on a large scale, if necessary, could reach the people effectively in the cause of gospel truth." Mrs. Booth answers: "I think we have found the way. You must do something to the man himself, for if you put him in a palace, he will, in his unchanged state, be miserable and make everyone else so. It is his degradation that makes him miserable, and God's way to make men happy is to save them from their sins. The grand purpose of the Salvation Army is to bring all men back to God and goodness. You may do what you like to the man outside, but if you do not alter him inside you cannot better his condition. As a proof of it, I may say that among the hosts of soldiers in the Salvation Army we have very little pinching, grinding poverty. There are very few people in our ranks who cannot earn their bread. You can go and talk to them of these things any night if you will, take a tour round about in London, go and look at them, ask their wives. They don't want anybody's charity. They can earn sufficient money to keep themselves, their wives and children comfortable. For they are saved from what constitutes half the miseries of human life, the family broils and quarrels which come of drink, bad company and bad habits. Then they are saved further from any of the diseases and much of the suffering which is the result of intemperance and debauchery, and they have, as a rule, such health as enables them to enjoy life. So I think we have found out how Christian philanthropists can best expend their money for the exaltation and salvation of the masses. Let them help carry on the work we have in hand.

"In the name of the God of the whole earth, we have a right to the instrumentalities, to the means, to the measures, to the places, to the streets in which to accomplish this work. I ask, 'To whom do the streets belong?' What a lot of utter nonsense we hear about the right of the public streets for business, for pleasure, and I know not what besides! Has not God Almighty any right in the public streets? You have carved on the top of your Royal Exchange, 'The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof.' Is it? How much does He get of it? Who dares lift up His standard in the streets? I say it, if no one else dare say it, and may God and the angels be witnesses to it, that I claim the streets and the market places in Thy name, for Thy work, O Divine Master! Christ bought back and sanctified every spot of this earth to soul-saving purposes when He shed His blood upon it, and we have as much right in the streets as you have to drive your horses and carts through them to make money to leave to your children."

THE National Educational Association drew 10,000 people from all over the Union to St. Paul last week. By invitation, Miss Willard addressed the Association on the White Cross movement, before the largest audience ever assembled in the Auditorium, and then hundreds were turned away, there not being even standing room. The local press devoted more space to reporting her address than to that of any one else. The vast audience seemed completely captivated by the thoughtful, tender, eloquent address.

OUR PROMOTED LEADER.

Clinton B. Fisk is dead! All over the land hearts mourn for the noble man fallen; probably no man in America was so trusted and loved by so many different circles as was General Fisk. The all-roundness of his character was phenomenal. Intense in his convictions and ever standing by them heroically, he had no narrowness, no bigotry; his great heart took in all good causes, and his superb courage stood by all, however great the cost.

Memory runs back over the prominent facts in the life so full of blessing, from the time when, as a "bound boy" in the wilds of Michigan he planned and worked to secure an education, till the day when he passed over the river leaving a continent in mourning, and finds no page whose record it would erase. Devotion to Christ and to humanity was the guiding principle of his life and gives the key to its unique completeness.

Our first recollections of him are connected with the dark war days. He entered the army as a private but quickly won promotion, till he left it a major-general. This well-earned promotion speaks for his military efficiency, but to us he stands preëminent as the Christian soldier, caring for the souls of his men, distributing 25,000 Bibles and Testaments, the "Tactics" as he called them, the "Marching Orders" of his Great Captain, by which hundreds were marshaled into the army of God.

His interest in the freedmen was strong, of which Fisk University, Nashville, Tenn., is an abiding memorial. The Indians also shared his sympathy, and for many years he was President of the Board of Indian Commissioners.

In the church of his choice he was always a tower of strength, being a member of the Methodist Missionary Board for twenty years, chairman of the Eastern section of the Methodist Book Committee, a trustee or director of innumerable institutions, and in every one a thorough worker. He was especially blessed with consecrated common sense, which made him invaluable where business ability was needed; his pocketbook was also consecrated, and his generous response to all calls upon it for good causes brought down upon him the blessings of thousands.

His interest in Sunday-schools was a part of his life. No one who saw him at the International Sunday-school Convention in Chicago three years ago can ever forget the scene,—that great audience room packed to its utmost, suddenly breaking into a billowy sea of waving white handkerchiefs as General Fisk came upon the platform. He had been elected temporary chairman, and never was there such a presiding officer as he; quick, witty, genial, saying just the right thing at the right time, keeping the audience good-natured and interested while holding a firm rein on the business of the convention. Who but he would have cut short long speeches by suggesting to speakers the necessity of putting "shortening in their cake; if they don't we shall not be able to get ours," as dinner time was approaching. His tribute to Governor Colquitt was most beautiful and touching. After referring in his humorous way to army experiences when the two fought on opposite sides, he referred to their meeting at the Atlanta Sunday-school Convention where they struck hands in Christian fellowship, then added: "Through all the years since then Governor Colquitt and myself have been undertaking to do what we could to level down the embankments which were referred to this morning (as dividing the North and South) and if you will travel southward you will find there are now none left; that the snows and rains of twenty winters have washed them all down. Where our strong arms strove and brave hearts bled, you will now hear nothing but the songs of birds and see nothing but the June blossoms, and on the slope's green breast that dear white flower whose name is Peace."

This spirit fitted him preëminently to be the leader of the temperance hosts of a re-united North and South. From early boyhood he had been a temperance worker, and as years passed on he came inevitably to the front as a leader —this in spite of the fact that he was no politician, never sought and never desired office. By birth, training and all sacred associations he was a Republican, loving the party as one loves that for which he has hazarded his life. Yet when that party refused to take up prohibition he left it, because his conscience would not allow him to remain in any party which excluded his principles. The Prohibitionists of New Jersey, his home, in 1886 nominated him for Governor, and he accepted the nomination, well knowing what that acceptance would cost. It did cost five months of time and most exhausting labor, which but for the loving guardianship of his wife might have proved fatal; five thousand miles of travel, money without measure, the loss of friends, the scorn of enemies, the insult of corrupt proffers of aid or coalition—all of which were so emphatically refused that no one dared repeat them—all this price he paid cheerfully, heroically, that by thus standing for moral principle he might strengthen it; and he did strengthen it, as an increase of five hundred per cent on any previous Prohibition vote in that state showed.

When the time came to choose our standard-bearer in the last Presidential campaign, no other one seemed possible than Clinton B. Fisk. Naturally he shrank from the burden, and his wife, remembering thatthe New Jersey campaign had so nearly cost his life, felt that he must not permit it to be laid upon him; but at last so distinctly did he hear the voice of God through the voice of the people, that he yielded and accepted the nomination of the Indianapolis convention. How he bore our standard through that trying campaign is written in the heroic records of those leaders of forlorn hopes whose names the world will not willingly let die.

All this, which we have imperfectly sketched, and much more he was to the world at large; to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union he was infinitely more. There never beat a more brotherly heart than his, and he was par excellence the brother beloved of the W. C. T. U. His chivalric reverence for woman, evinced in his boyhood, growing with his growth, and strengthening with his strength, was shown wherever the interests of women were affected. One of the supreme efforts of his life was his speech at the General Conference at New York, May, 1888, in favor of admitting women lay delegates. Said he: "The women of our Methodism have a place in the heart of the church from which they cannot be dislodged. They are our chief working members. They are at the front of every great movement of the church, at home or abroad. In the spirit of rejoicing consecration our matrons and maids uphold the banner of our Lord in every conflict with the enemy of virtue and righteousness. Looking down upon us from those galleries, tier on tier, are the magnificent leaders of the Woman's Foreign and the Woman's Home Missionary Societies. Our women are at the front of the battle now waging against the liquor traffic, and they will not cease their warfare until this nation shall be redeemed from the curse of the saloon. . . . . From that day when Martin Luther, the protesting monk, and Catherine Von Bora, the ex-nun, stood together at the altar and the twain became one, woman has, by her own heroism, by her faith in her sex and in God who made her, fought a good fight against the organized selfishness of those who would withhold from her any right or privilege to which she is entitled, and has lifted herself from slavery and barbarism to a place beside man, where God placed her in Paradise, his equal in tact and talent, moving upon the world with her unseen influence, and making our Christian civilization what it is to-day. Let not our Methodism in this, her chief council, say or do aught that shall lead the world to conclude that we are retreating from our advanced position of justice to the laity of the church."

It was easy to predicate what such a man would do when temperance work became woman's work, thus calling into united action the strongest, most chivalric elements of his nature. But how much he could become to us in this work for God and Home and Every Land, even imagination could not picture. We never reached any hard place without finding his strong arm there ready to help us over; never was an attack so bitter but we felt his great heart was our shield. Among our choicest treasures is a little note of encouragement penned by him as he sat in his box at the Metropolitan Opera House, during the memorable debate on the last evening of the New York National convention, when the bitter onslaught was made upon THE UNION SIGNAL and its editor. His keen appreciation, his brotherly sympathy, we were always sure of, no matter how black were the clouds around us. In all our successes he rejoiced more than in his own, and so firm was his faith in us that we could not fail and thus prove false to his high ideal.

Such is the man whom we mourn to-day: "The General who went through the civil war without uttering an oath; the Christian who was brother to Protestant and Catholic alike; the Sunday-school man who was welcome at 'Grand Army' Posts; the beloved friend of the colored race; the steadfast defender of the Indians; the favorite layman of the Methodist Church," the most brotherly brother of the W. C. T. U. And if so great is our grief, what must be the shadow which today rests on the beautiful home at Sea Bright? Into its sacredness we may not penetrate, but that home is encircled with prayers from a million hearts; it is permeated with memories of an ideal family life; the incense from the family altar at which he ministered fills it; the loving presence of the Comforter brightens its gloom; and from it the strong eye of faith looks forward to the Heavenly Home and its eternal reunion.

FISK MEMORIAL SERVICES.

Sunday witnessed many gatherings in loving memory of him who the day before was laid to rest at Coldwater, Michigan. Lake Bluff was in the midst of its temperance convocation and devoted Sunday afternoon to memorial services to General Fisk, who has so often attended its gatherings. The platform was appropriately and effectively draped, black and white mingling with the flag he loved so well. On the platform stood a fine portrait of our promoted leader, brought out in strong relief by a black background; leaning against it as though just fallen from his hand was the national flag, while around the noble head white roses and the white ribbon were intertwined. The large rustic chair, which three years ago he had occupied, stood vacant, draped in a battle flag that had formed part of the decorations at Lincoln's funeral. Mr. J. B. Hobbs presided; the speakers of the occasion were Miss Willard and Dr. Boole, of New York.

Miss Willard's tribute was beautiful, touching, triumphant. She pictured him as she has known him—well-poised, well-equipped, masterful; one in whom was so much of the pathetic and so much of the heroic. She sketched his boyhood when he resolved to be somebody with a capital S; he did not spend his time, he coined it into that grandest currency—character. He was the favorite son of Nature and Humanity, not because of extraneous circumstances but because of what he was.

Sometimes she had thought that this gracious, genial, tender-hearted man was scarcely the one to stand as the rod to draw the lightning of political hate; yet thus he stood. She told of the two days' terrible conflict when nominated for the presidency, of its termination as he knelt at midnight before God and promised Him, as the next day he promised the committee, "I will do what one man can to uphold the cause of prohibition."

She closed with a triumphant outlook into the other country, "I think he is wonderfully at home this afternoon, so much of heaven has there been in his earthly life. While we sorrow for our loss, we are glad for the great glory into which he has gone. The motto of his life has been, 'I believe more than I know;' now he has gone where belief opens out into certain knowledge, growing continually fuller and fuller as God leads him on."

Dr. Boole made the closing address and offered appropriate resolutions, which were adopted by a unanimous rising vote.

"Sometimes a light surprises,
The Christian on his way."

Such a sweet surprise comes occasionally to workers in Chinese mission schools. It often seems as though the pupils cared for nothing but to learn English, and that the precious gospel seed was sown upon stony ground; then suddenly it springs up and bears fruit, thirty, sixty, an hundred fold. Such an experience came to a faithful teacher in a Chicago mission; her "boy" was converted and through her influence went to Mr. Moody's school, at Mt. Hermon. From there he writes her and her fellow teachers: "Perhaps some of you are becoming discouraged by coming Sunday after Sunday, year after year, yet could not see any result of it, but let us remember that God will not forget those who have done the least for his name's sake. Friends, are you going to stop coming, or will you try to bring your friends with you to teach these poor souls of the free salvation of our Lord Jesus? If not having this Sunday-school I am sure my soul had no hope, my life shall be lose forever. But thanks unto God, through the influence of my Sunday-school teacher I was convicted and willing to accept Christ as my salvation, and now I am rejoicing for the hope of my soul and the life of eternity. I cannot express my gratitude enough to repay her, but trust God will reward her with a crown of life." He then makes a pathetic appeal, in his quaint English, to have the bread of life sent to the five hundred million of his people in China, and rejoices in the thought that three of his fellows and two white students are going to China soon, as missionaries.

News from the Field.

WISCONSIN.

ANNUAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION.

We had a grand state convention in June, and were cordially received and delightfully entertained by the Racine people. Throughout the convention there was a spirit of earnest thoughtfulness and of loyalty to the work God has entrusted to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Notwithstanding much sickness among our members during the winter, the work of the different departments was, for the most part, vigorously carried on. The department of organization had the least to report, as we have had no state organizer in the field during most of the year. We have more than held our own, however, and Wisconsin is ready for a vigorous campaign this year.

Mrs. Rounds, president of Illinois, and Mrs. Nichols, president of Indiana, gave us fine lectures. The annual address of our own state president, Mrs. Amy Kellogg Morse, was a masterly one. It seems to us, each year, that her address is the best she ever gave, and this one really was the best, I think.

The resolutions adopted by the convention show something of the spirit and progress of our brave, earnest Wisconsin women. They are as follows:

1. Resolved, That we do earnestly protest against all license and the establishment of revenue or systematized effort of any sort, to protect and foster the manufacture, sale and use of liquor, tobacco and opium, and the further development, by any governmental protection, of vice in our land.

2. WHEREAS, Some of our good sisters who could not see eye to eye with us have gone out from our National W. C. T. U. and formed a new organization named the Non-Partisan W. C. T. U., and

WHEREAS, The liberal policy of our National Union allowing each state and individual perfect freedom in their political affiliations made this action unnecessary, therefore,

Resolved, That we re-affirm with emphasis our loyalty to the principles and policy of our National W. C. T. U. and its present officers.

3. Resolved, That in loyalty to our cause this convention declares its supreme object to be the early removal of the liquor traffic from our land by law, and for this purpose it pledges its influence anew to advance the principle of state and national prohibition as set forth by the Prohibition Party, and that we thank the Prohibition Party for retaining in its platform since 1872 a resolution in favor of placing the ballot in the hands of women.

4. WHEREAS, We believe that the preservation of the American Civil Sunday is necessary to the perpetuation of our American liberties, the protection of the right of the working people, and of the morals of our communities—therefore

Resolved, That we use our influence everywhere to enforce our present Sunday laws and that we favor the immediate passage by Congress of the Sunday Rest Bill now pending before it. But while indorsing the laws of our land we would have religious toleration for all denominations.

5. WHEREAS, We believe that this national government is wholly based on Christian principles and the Bible, the book from which these principles are obtained. therefore Resolve l, That the Bible should be re-established in the schools of our state, and time be given for the reading without comment on the same.

6. WHEREAS, The free school system of our country is the source of intelligent citizenship, and

WHEREAS, The state recognizes this by its establishment of these free schools, therefore

Resolved, That the W. C. T. U. heartily indorses the action of the state regarding compulsory education, and would emphasize the necessity and reasonableness of the requirement that all children shall be taught the prescribed studies in the English language through the prescribed time.

7. Resolved, That this convention indorse the passage by Congress of the bill now before it entitled "A bill to protect the states in the exercise of their police power," also a bill entitled "A bill prohibiting the transportation of intoxicating liquors from any state or territory in the United States or the District of Columbia, into any other state or territory, contrary to, and in violation of, the laws thereof."

8. Resolved, That our hearty sympathy is with the loyal temperance workers of Nebraska in their struggle for an amendment to the constitution of their state, forever prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors within their borders.

9. Resolved, That, having full reason to believe that the use of tobacco and cigarettes cannot be exceeded as a destroyer in the ranks of the youth in the land, we will therefore petition the legislature of Wisconsin to make the selling or giving away of tobacco in any form to minors a criminal offense.

Resolved, That we importune mothers and teachers of the public schools to use their influence against the plan of many dealers in cigarettes and tobacco offering prizes to our children for the collection of cigarette cards, tobacco tags, and like means, by which they, especially young boys, are tempted to form bad habits; also resolved, that we protest against all uses of the representation of the faces and forms of women as trademarks and advertisements of liquors and tobacco.

10. Resolved, That we note with pleasure the great advance the cause of equal franchise has made, both in public opinion and among legislators of the several states, and that Wyoming has determined to take her place among the stars on our flag under a constitution giving political equality to all her people; that we extend our hearty sympathy to our sisters of South Dakota in their struggle for political equality and our sincere desire for their success, and that whenever we, under our school law, can use the ballot, we will prayerfully do so.

11. WHEREAS, The Louisiana Lottery, that great immoral octopus of our country, is making strenuous efforts to get its charter renewed by buying the legislature and subsidizing the press of Louisiana and

WHEREAS, The state is already impoverished by the steady drain of this evil upon its resources and other states are being demoralized by its influence, therefore

Resolved, That the public sentiment of this entire country should be aroused to assist in suppressing this gigantic fraud, and that the W. C. T. U., as a Christian organization, should do all in its power to aid in the general agitation on this subject.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Governor of Louisiana.

12. Resolved, That for the sake of suffering humanity, we protest against the cruel and inhuman treatment inflicted by the Russian government upon Siberian exiles, and indorse the efforts of our National superintendent of peace to bring the condensed sentiment of women to bear on the Russian government.

13. Resolved, That we should seek more earnestly the co-operation of the Christian ministers and Christian laymen of Wisconsin in our temperance work.

14. Resolved, That we recognize the good work being done by the National Temperance Hospital, of Chicago, and recommend our local unions to contribute to its support.

15. Resolved, That it is the pleasure of this convention to extend its thanks to all who have, by personal effort, made this gathering one of pleasure and comfort to the delegates, to the local union of Racine, for its kindly efforts; to the pastor and trustees of the First M. E. Church for the use of their house of worship; to the ladies who have served daily the bountiful and tempting lunch; to the decoration committee, to those who have furnished music, and particularly the Y's for the graceful and kindly manner in which they have contributed to our entertainment; to the railroad companies for their generous reductions, and to the citizens of Racine for their cordial hospitality to their guests through the sessions of this convention, also,

Resolved, That the thanks of this convention be given to the press of Racine for the ample space which it has allowed the convention notes and their courteous treatment of us, also that we thank our faithful lady reporter whose tireless pencil has so plainly recorded all our doings and our efficient railroad secretary for her work so faithfully done.

Resolved, further, That we extend a vote of thanks to our executive committee, who, during the year, have attended so faithfully to the interests of our organization.

EMMA J. CURTIS, Special Correspondent.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

DISTRICT CONVENTIONS—COUNTY CONVENTIONS—CAMPAIGN NOTES.

The third district had the honor of being held this year in Faulkton, the home of South Dakota's grand champions of prohibition and equal rights—Congressman and Mrs. Pickler. Convention met June 3-5, with thirty-five voting delegates and a large number of honorary and visiting members present. Among the visitors were Rev. Alden, of Athol; Rev. Clark, of Leola; Rev. Hyde and Messrs. Jager and Dewey, of St. Lawrence, and Eli Johnson, of Highmore, all of whom remained through the convention. The proceedings opened Tuesday evening with devotional exercises and short addresses of welcome by Mayor Morse, Rev. Mr. Chunn, and Mrs. Pickler, and responses by Mrs. L. M. Hammer and Mrs. Brown, after which was held a gold medal contest by the Faulk county unions. The contestants were splendidly trained by Professor Downs. All the speaking was of a very high order, and the judges had the sympathy of the entire audience in their difficult task of awarding the prize, which was given to Miss Mabel Downs, of Orient. The house was crowded, and during the contest the rain poured down in torrents, accompanied by a high wind, some hail, and terrific thunder and lightning; but the speakers never faltered nor flinched, but with wonderful nerve, raised their voices above the storm's awful uproar, and by their coolness and presence of mind, the audience was kept from manifesting anxiety over the war of elements outside. A pretty feature of the evening was the singing of an equal rights song by about thirty little boys and girls, marching and carrying flags with which they emphasized the sentiments of the song. They were heartily encored and sang another verse, to the great delight of the audience.

Wednesday morning was mostly devoted to reports from county presidents, eight reporting either in person or by proxy, two counties being yet unorganized. All the reports showed that the resolution adopted at the last state convention, to make the department of franchise a special line of work the present year, had been faithfully carried out by most of the unions. Every prayer, every report and every speech throughout the convention was full of suffrage, in fact the very air was full of it. The delegates brought it in full measure, the visitors were loaded with it, and nobody was surprised to see Faulkton, the home of Major and Mrs. Pickler, running over with it. If a speaker would be popular and arouse enthusiasm, he or she had only to talk for suffrage.

Wednesday afternoon another full house was present. The president's address was first on the program. Among her recommendations was the following: That the district take up the department of prize suffrage oratorical contests, and conduct them in the same manner as the Demorest medal contests, except that the recitations be on suffrage, and a handsome prize (silver cup) be given the winner, which could be paid for out of the proceeds of the evening. This recommendation was promptly acted on by the convention, and Mrs. L. M. Hammer, of Highmore, was elected superintendent of the department, which is already being pushed with great vigor.

The superintendents' reports showed activity in the various lines of work, notwithstanding the arduous labors of two campaigns following each other in close succession. The department of Demorest medal contests has especially been pushed with great success by the superintendent, Mrs. Minnie Barker Horning. These contests have opened the way for suffrage work in many places.

A suffrage discussion Wednesday afternoon was ably opened by Mrs. Stephens, after which the time of each speaker was limited to five minutes, and the discussion thrown open to both visitors and delegates. A Congregational minister (a resident pastor) asked permission to speak on the other side which the chair promptly gave. He is an Eastern man and recent graduate of Yale, and knows a great deal more than he will a few years hence, which accounts for his courage in bravely getting up before such a convention as that to oppose suffrage. He told how carefully he had studied the question, particularly from a Biblical standpoint, and could arrive at but one conclusion, "that woman should be subject to man, and remain contentedly in the sphere in which God had placed her." But his closing argument capped the climax. It was that "The skeleton of a man and the skeleton of a woman are different, which shows conclusively that women should not vote." The Rev. Mr. Clarke, Mr. Johnson, and Mrs. Barker, state president, replied to his arguments amid deafening cheers, and in such a way that Mrs. Gougar did not have much to do the next evening to annihilate the unfortunate man completely, and put the women of his congregation in such a frame of mind that he has taken his grip-sack and gone to find a new location, a sadder, but it is to be hoped, a wiser man.

Wednesday evening Mrs. Barker gave a splendid lecture to a crowded house on "Our Lines of Work." The following thought will be new to those who think home duties the only ones for women. She said, "The first and chief aim of the organization is for the protection of homes. The men, during the civil war, did not stay at home to protect their homes, but went forth to battle for them; so women should go forth to battle for their homes," and then showed that suffrage is the present line of work.

Thursday's program was crowded full of good things, and included a talk on social purity, by Mrs. Barker, and another suffrage discussion. A telegram of greeting was received from Congressman Pickler, also from the Yankton county W. C. T. U. A petition for the passage of the Wilson bill by Congress was presented, also a petition to be sent to the Czar of Russia in behalf of Siberian exiles.

Mrs. Johnson was reëlected president, but on account of other duties declined. Mrs. L. M. Hammer was then elected president; Miss Augusta Chandler, vice-president; Miss Nona Smith, corresponding secretary; Mrs. L. L. Jager, recording secretary; and Mrs. Eugene Steere, treasurer. Mrs. P. E. Johnson was elected delegate to the National convention, and Mrs. L. L. Jager, alternate. Pierre was chosen for the next place of meeting.

Among the resolutions which passed unanimously, were, the one indorsing our National leader, Frances E. Willard, and the policy of the National and state W. C. T. U.; recognizing the ability and leadership of the state president, Mrs. Barker, and the retiring district president; a resolution of thanks to Mrs. Emma Smith De Voe for efficient suffrage work done in the dictrict, and to Mrs. Pickler for her "untiring energy" in providing for our material wants, as well as for her inspiring work in convention; indorsing suffrage; making hygiene a special line of work after the close of the campaign, and that the prohibitory and other reform laws be carefully studied by every union.

The convention closed Thursday evening with a magnificent suffrage lecture by Mrs. Helen M. Gougar. The house was packed even to standing room. At the close a vote was taken for and against suffrage and not a nay vote was given.

The second annual meeting of the fifth district was held in the Opera House at White Lake, May 27–29. Convention opened Tuesday evening with Scripture reading by Mrs. Hall, prayer by Mrs. Barker, state president, Mrs. R. B. Hager, district president in the chair, and Mrs. R. J. Smart, secretary. A cordial address of welcome was given by Mrs. J. A. Longhran, in which she surmised that the delegates had brought a number of "original packages" of thought and ideas that would be of benefit to the convention. Mrs. Barker responded in a few well chosen remarks that were appreciated and warmly applauded by the audience. Mrs. Nelson, vice-president of the Minnesota W. C. T. U., was then introduced, and spoke in her easy, pleasant style for over an hour, on the all-absorbing question of suffrage. Her argument was logical and conclusive, and her points thoroughly sustained. The introduction into her speech of several original poems, just to the point, was an interesting and entertaining feature, eliciting hearty applause. After a few supplementary remarks by Mrs. Barker and Mrs. Hager, Mrs. Nelson organized a suffrage club. The business meetings were held in the Presbyterian Church. Twenty delegates were present and several visiting white-ribboners were made honorary members. Encouraging reports were received from the field and excellent papers read upon the various departments of work.

Under the efficient management of the president, the business of the convention was conducted with dispatch, and much aid was rendered by Mrs. Barker and Mrs. Nelson.

One important item of business was the organization of Aurora county. Mrs. Kline, committee on finance, asked that all unions pledge from one dollar to three dollars for district work. Eighteen dollars were pledged by delegates.

The election of officers resulted as follows: For president, Mrs. R. B. Hagar; vice-president, Mrs. Alice Hanson; corresponding secretary, Mrs. R. J. Smart; recording secretary, Mrs. W. B. Warner; treasurer, Mrs. A. D. Prescott.

Ringing resolutions were indorsed expressing sympathy and loyalty to Miss Frances E. Willard and the National W. C. T. U.; against desecration of the Sabbath, and for state and national observance of the same; indorsing the ballot for women, "not only for legislation concerning the temperance question, but for use in all questions of public interest, and for the election of all officers whose business it is to see that the will of the people is carried out in the enforcement of the laws;" and pledging hearty co-operation with the Equal Suffrage Association in securing the suffrage amendment. By request, Rev. Hager and Rev. Michel spoke on the original package question.

The second evening, Mrs. Barker spoke to a crowded house in Opera Hall on the "Outlook for Temperance." The audience gave respectful hearing and many of the saloon element who would not come inside, listened quietly and attentively from the sidewalk through the open windows.

Thursday morning Mrs. Barker gave an earnest talk on mothers' meetings, and Mrs. Hager gave the watchword for the coming year: "Every union organize one more union and every member get one more woman to become a member." The convention adjourned, feeling that the time had been most profitably spent and the workers inspired to greater zeal and activity in the grand work of the organization.

The second annual meeting of the fourth district convened at Webster, the president, Mrs. Anna Simmons, in the chair. Mrs. Irene G. Adams gave a cordial address of welcome to which response was made by Mrs. Jennie Beach.

Three county presidents reported several counties in this district as being yet unorganized. The local unions were all reported to be in a flourishing condition, and here, as elsewhere, the department of franchise is receiving special attention.

By request of the convention, Rev. Brokaw read an address prepared for the M. E. Association at Watertown, entitled "Why Women Should Vote," for which the thanks of the convention were extended, and the state president requested the pleasure of bestowing upon the gentlemen with her own hands, the white and yellow badges. Able and interesting essays were read, by Mrs. Herpel on "The Ethics of True Motherhood;" by Mrs. Warren, "Keep Sweet," and Mrs. Norris, "Woman's Right to the Ballot."

The question-box was well filled with important queries, which elicited much valuable information from Mrs. Barker, who gave replies in her brief, practical manner.

The president's annual address was one of the best things of the convention and was highly appreciated.

The following subjects were discussed at length: "Duties of Local Unions to promptly send Secretary's Reports to State;" "Local Dues;" "Advantages of Demorest Medal Contests;" "Necessity of Organization;" "Loyal Legion Work;" "Dues of Local to District Organization." Mrs. Barker gave a talk on "Social Purity," and a parliamentary drill; an address on Tuesday evening on "The Original Package Decision," and on Wednesday evening an unanswerable lecture on the "Enfranchisement of Women."

A bureau of intelligence was adopted on the following plan: "Every white ribbon woman in the district who has a valuable thought, or hint, or can write an essay, or poem, or can find a gem in book or paper, which she thinks might aid another woman or union, is to send it to Irene G. Adams, Webster, who was chosen to represent this department, and whenever any union desires assistance of a literary or instructive nature, they may communicate with Mrs. Adams, expressing their needs, who will forward articles fitting their request."

Thirty-one delegates were present and a fine audience at every session. The following officers were elected: Anna Simmons, president; Mrs. Winston, corresponding secretary; Irene G. Adams, recording secretary; Mrs. J. A. Cochran, treasurer; Etta Rowland, district organizer; Irene G. Adams was elected delegate to National convention.

Resolutions were adopted urging mothers' meetings; that women make use of the school franchise; that the department of social purity be pushed in every union; that Demorest medal contests be held as often as possible; deploring the effect of the "original package" decision, and importuning Congress for the speedy passage of the Wilson bill. The next meeting will be held at Ipswich.

The Minnehaha county convention met at Dell Rapids, May 28, and had a profitable and interesting meeting. This county was organized last September, and under Mrs. S. E. Young's able direction much good work has been done. Interesting discussions, especially on hygiene and children's work, were held, and Mrs. Barker was present to aid with her counsel. Papers were read on "Hygiene," "Woman Suffrage," "The Woman of It," and an address on "Local Work of the Smaller Unions." Mrs. S. E. Young was reëlected president.

Mrs. Barker lectured in the evening on "Prohibition and its Enforcement."

The Hand county convention was held in Miller, May 13 and 14. A splendid program was carried out, which included reports, discussions, a parliamentary drill, a talk on social purity, and a lecture by Mrs. Barker. Mrs. E. F. Dewey, of St. Lawrence, was elected president.

Yankton county held its fourth annual convention in Mission Hill Church, June 4. The program included an "Equal Suffrage Bible Reading," reports of superintendents, the president's address, discussion on "Our Prohibitory Law," papers on "Rum on the Congo," "Narcotics," "Young Women's Influence in Moral Reform," and an address on "Equal Suffrage" by Rev. Mr. Washburn. Mrs. Julia M. King was reëlected president. The convention was one of Yankton county's best, and very helpful.

Hyde county held its second annual meeting in Highmore, June 9, 10, the president, Mrs. M. T. Parker, in the chair. The program included reports, president's address, discussions, a parliamentary drill, a Demorest medal contest, and a telling suffrage lecture by Mrs. Gougar.

Many other county conventions have been held during the past month, but reports have not been received. Highmore union has held one suffrage oratorical contest, the prize, a handsome embossed, gold-lined silver cup, being awarded to Mr. A. B. Allen. A fine audience was present, and the entertainment greatly enjoyed, while the admission fee of ten cents paid for the cup and left a balance in the treasury. Two more classes are being arranged for, one of juveniles and one of adults.

INDIANA.

JOTTINGS.

Indiana has just closed a most successful series of joint county conventions conducted by the state officers and the state superintendent of the school of methods. These institutes were held at twenty different points within the state, embracing the entire territory held by the W. C. T. U. The attendance upon each has been fair, and much helpful instruction in different lines of work has been given. Each meeting was held for two days; Mrs. Nichols, Mother Wallace, Misses Reed, Hay and Palmer were chief instructors, assisted by Mrs. Loftin, state superintendent of narcotics, and Mrs. Thompson, state superintendent of evangelistic work. These institutes have occupied the months of May and June, and we feel that a fresh impetus to more systematic and intelligent work has been given.

Our state organ The Organizer is rapidly increasing in circulation, and our publishing company report a splendid financial outlook for this enterprise of three and one-half years' standing. The department of organization reports almost one hundred new unions this year, and not a secession.

The Demorest medal work is very popular throughout the state, and is being untiringly pressed by our indefatigable Mrs. Balch. We held sixty-six silver contests in April, sixty-five in May, and two small gold ones. Mrs. Balch expects to hold a diamond medal contest at Terre Haute in October during our state convention. Mrs. Straw, our faithful Loyal Temperance Legion superintendent, proposes to build a Willard drinking fountain beside the Josephine R. Nichols cottage on our state fair grounds. Our Loyal Temperance Legions are contributing the funds.

Mrs. Wallace gave the address for the Johnson county W. C. T. U. on the Fourth at Franklin, while Mrs. Nichols spoke for the Warren county union on that day.

NEWS AND NOTES.

The convention of the northern district was held in the Central Christian Church of Denver, May 8 and 9. There was an increased number of delegates in attendance and all of the general officers of the state were present beside the president of the southern district, Mrs. Eva Higgins, and Mrs. J. S. Sperry, superintendent of White Cross and social purity. Mrs. C. D. H. Thompson, state president, gave an address on "Liberty," and Rev. Dr. Tupper, of the First Baptist Church, spoke fearlessly and unequivocally concerning the responsibility of the liquor traffic. The district showed its hearty sympathy with the Otis union in its crusade work by voting ten dollars to aid in prosecuting the work. Mrs. T. M. Wallace, superintendent of parliamentary department, gave a drill that was satisfactory to all but herself. Modesty is commendable. We have reason to be proud of her work. The entertainment given by the kitchen garden of the Denver Central union during the convention gave the public an opportunity to see for itself what was being done in educating the children in different lines of housework.

The new officers of the northern district are, Mrs. T. M. Wallace, president; Mrs. H. D. Teetor, secretary; and Mrs. M. R. Sprague, treasurer. It is hoped a district press superintendent will be appointed at their next meeting, who will report in full the proceedings of the convention. The third annual convention of the southern district met in Colorado City, on June 10. Among the interesting things that came before the convention were papers on "Mothers' Meetings," by Mrs. Reynolds; on "City Missions," by Mrs. Gladwin; and on "Sabbath Observance," by Mrs. Balcomb. Miss Ida Clothier, national organizer of the Y's, was present at the convention the greater part of the time, and gave aid and enthusiasm on all lines of work. Mrs. Clara Hoffman lectured both Wednesday and Thursday evenings, with her usual earnestness and vigor that cannot but leave a lasting impression. Mrs. T. M. Wallace gave a parliamentary drill that was most highly commended. When all our workers understand parliamentary law, and abide by it, much time will be made use of that now goes to waste. Mrs. Wallace also advances the plan of house to house visiting, as a means of increasing our membership by making known our work in this way. The plan of work committee did not fail to urge superintendents of departments to report, also that local superintendents should correspond with state superintendents, which means they shall do so immediately, when appointed to certain lines of work. Further, that the executive committee of the local unions shall prepare the business for each coming meeting, that the business in hand may be dispatched more promptly and orderly. A by-law was also passed during the convention to the effect that any officer or superintendent who is absent from three consecutive meetings without reasonable excuse may be displaced from her position.

By resolution the convention affirmed its loyalty to the National organization. It was also resolved to work to obtain the thirteenth Sunday in each quarter as temperance day. Woman's suffrage was also most heartily indorsed. The officers elected for the coming year are, Mrs. Eva Higgins, president; Miss M. D. Wilson, secretary, and Mrs. J. K. Moore, treasurer. The Good Templars' Lodge of Colorado City numbers eighty-five. Rev. Harrington, pastor of the M. E. Church of Colorado City, Rev. Hiller, of Florissant and Manitou Park M. E. congregations, and Rev. Allen, pastor of the Mesa M. E. Church, Pueblo, were regular attendants at the southern district convention. Rev. Allen establishes an unheard of precedent in W. C. T. U. work. On his return to his charge his official board, under his leadership, invited the state W. C. T. U. to hold its next annual convention, which occurs in September, in the Mesa M. E. Church of Pueblo, the members of that church to entertain the delegates. Brother Allen and his official board are not afraid of temperance work evidently, and King Alcohol will find no resting-place in the corners of his parish.

Mrs. J. A. Sabine, our state superintendent of suffrage has left us to make her home in Massachusetts, so long as her health will permit. Just before leaving Colorado Springs, her past home, Mrs. A. F. Newton, the president of the local union, gave a very pleasant reception, that Mrs. Sabine's friends might have an opportunity to meet her socially and bid her good-bye. The Colorado Springs union is holding mothers' meetings twice a month in the different wards of the city.

May 25 was observed by a public meeting held in the evening at the "Church of the Strangers," (U. P.) the subject of addresses and paper being "Sabbath Observance." Flower mission day was observed in El Paso county jail. Mrs. Clara Hoffman addressed the prisoners in Colorado Penitentiary at Canon City on flower mission day. It is very much regretted by all W.C.T.U. workers that the evening school for the prisoners has been given up. Surely it would be a benefit to overseers as well as to prisoners to give the prisoners something to think of besides themselves, and the committing of crimes.

Mrs. Hoffman is doing excellent work in the state, wherever she has lectured. The 21st and 22d she lectured in Colorado Springs, and the union is planning to have two more lectures from her before she leaves the state. July 11 is temperance day at Glen Park, Colorado's Chautauqua, when Mrs. Hoffman Mrs. Bateman and Miss Ida Clothier will be there. The state W. C. T. U. has headquarters at the Park under the superintendency of Mrs. C. W. Beach. The enterprise includes the running of a lunch table and a laundry. The management of the grounds has given favorable terms, and it is hoped to realize considerable profits for state work.

Mrs. Beach has recently organized a new union in Denver on South Broadway, named the R. W. Brainerd union, in honor of our deceased secretary. This makes the fifth W. C. T. U. in Denver and one Y. W. C. T. U. Two other unions have been organized at Elyria and Littleton, suburbs of Denver, making eight organizations in the county of Arapahoe. The Arapahoe county convention will be held in the Denver Tabernacle on July 10 and will be a "Mothers' Institute" when the questions of home-training and non-alcoholics in medicine will be discussed. A children's mass-meeting will be held under the management of Mesdames Lounsbury and Benton.

The Salida Band of Hope is yet the banner juvenile organization of the state. Delegates are present at each district convention giving their own report of their work. Mrs. Lester, their leader, was with them at the convention at Colorado City, and brought them especially before the convention. Many of the organizations have grown beyond the teachings of the Band of Hope manuals, and she called for suggestions for supplementary work.

The day nursery of Denver has been removed to a higher location on Arapahoe street. During May 143 children were cared for. The Associated Charities set apart fifty dollars per month to this work.

The Y's of Longmont gave the "Dairy Maid's Convention" very successfully, netting the society something over sixty dollars. Miss M. D. Wilson has given the "Carnival of Nations" at Colorado City, Manitou, Florence, Canon City and La Veta, with good success. It is the best entertainment that I have yet seen of those given by the W. C. T. U.

At the fourth annual meeting of the "Woman's Exchange" of Denver, held recently, the report gave the total amount paid to consigners as $8,153.13, and the patronage of the lunch-room as 120,491 people, and for the month of May, 13,970. One hundred and sixty-three women have been enabled to earn an honest livelihood, one of whom earns, on an average, $100 per month. Colorado Springs also has a Woman's Exchange carried on successfully, but not under the control of the W. C. T. U. A new department adopted by the state executive board is that of "The Relation of Temperance to Labor and Capital." Mrs. Anna E. Steele has been appointed to the superintendency. The southern districts elected superintendents of the evangelistic, press and mothers' meetings departments. Though the state has no department of mothers' meetings as yet, the work in that line is growing very fast.

SEVENTH DISTRICT CONVENTION.

The last semi-annual convention of the seventh district W. C. T. U. met in the M. E. Church of Great Bend, and was both enjoyable and profitable. The district was well represented by delegates from different counties. Mrs. Culver gave a cordial address of welcome. The response, by Mrs. Stubbs, was earnest and thoughtful. Each session was opened with devotional exercises, and closed with prayer. Reports were read by county presidents and superintendents of departments, which showed active work going on all along the line; an excellent report from Barton county was read by Mrs. McCormick, county president; an essay by Mrs. A. B. Stryker, and a paper by Mrs. M. A. Messenger on "Juvenile Work," were entertaining and instructive. Mrs. W. A. Woodrow, district president, read her address, which showed largely the condition and work being done in the district; two organizers are now in the field, Mrs. M. Fletcher and Mrs. A. P. Holloway. The convention appreciated the services of Great Bend pastors, who manifested sympathy and interest in the work, helping by their presence and earnest, encouraging words. Rev. G. Lowther addressed the convention and large audience on the first evening, his subject being "Temperance from a Biblical Standpoint," which was full of most excellent thought. The business before the convention was disposed of with dispatch, re-submission and other important subjects were thoroughly discussed; the question drawer was a feature of interest and instruction. Several visitors were introduced to the convention, making remarks, among whom was "Mother Bickerdyke," of army nurse fame. Mrs. Fanny Rastall, state president, was present and gave an eloquent and helpful address on the second evening, which was among the attractions of the convention. Mrs. A. P. Holloway, county president of Kingman, also gave an address on the same evening entitled, "Why and Why Not?" The church was adorned with fragrant blooming plants and trailing vines intermingled, among which were banners and our national flag; suspended over the floral decorations was our motto. Fine music was rendered both evenings by cultured voices from Great Bend. The citizens of the town gave us a royal welcome, and entertained us in the most hospitable manner. On the last day at 8 o'clock a. m., the ladies of that city met at the church with carriages, and escorted all delegates and visitors over the city, in response to an invitation from Mr. Stryker, president of the college. We visited that institution, also accepted an invitation from the principal of the high school. Memory will ever turn with pleasure and gratitude to the citizens of Great Bend for their generous hospitality and courtesy extended to our convention.

MRS. W. A. WOODROW, Pres. Seventh Dist.

COFFEY COUNTY CONVENTION.

Our fourth annual convention was held at Burlington, June 3-5. It was the best one ever held in the county; not a failure on the program. There were seven essays and three addresses by members of the convention. An appeal for Nebraska was made by Mrs. S. F. Grubb, National superintendent of foreign work, on the second evening. A gold medal contest was on the first evening's program, followed by the prize orations of the other two gold medal winners of the county (we now have three in the county).

The convention decided to give a prize to the best speaker among our W. C. T. U. sisters at our next session; the recitations to be from the medal contest book, and the prize to be a copy of "Glimpses of Fifty Years," or its equivalent in W. T. P. A. literature, if the winner already had the book. Among the resolutions passed was one indorsing the action of Geo. Humphrey in the "cold comfort" he gave the re-submissionists at their late gathering in Topeka. The people of Kansas do not take kindly to the "package houses" which are being established in many places, consequently they are generally short-lived affairs, and may they continue to grow still shorter is the sentiment of the majority of our citizens.

OHIO.

THIRD DISTRICT CONVENTION.

Our annual meeting, presided over by Mrs. E. J. Gray, of Medina, was held in the Baptist Church, Norwalk, Tuesday and Wednesday, June 10 and 11. The four counties, Erie, Huron, Lorain and Medina, were well represented by the earnest women sent as delegates. The first half hour of the opening session was spent in praise and supplication, led by Mrs. Farr, the faithful workers giving themselves anew to God and to his service.

The recording secretary being absent, Mrs. W. R. Santley was chosen to fill her place. After presentation and adoption of reports of officers, Miss Sara Winthrop Smith, organizer for the "Woman's Suffrage Association," was introduced and made a most favorable impression by the modest, yet dignified way in which she told us of her work; of its justness, and the need of pressing it.

Mrs. H. E. Hammond, of Cleveland, the long time and able district president and state organizer, was presented, and after words of greeting, most happily emphasized the use, as helps to advance our work, of the five levers, prayer, patience, punctuality, perseverance and principle.

Mrs. Hershiser, president of Huron county union, read a most carefully prepared paper on "Supplemental W. C. T. U. Studies," but which was devoted almost entirely to the "Labor Question;" applied Christianity the solution. A helpful discussion followed this paper; the gist of all being to abolish rum and tobacco, and the question would be virtually settled.

Miss Olmstead, state superintendent of the department of social purity, addressed the convention. She urged that mothers' meetings and fathers' meetings be held, where most practical help could be given. Her department comprised three divisions, legal, reformatory and preventive. Mrs. Hershiser followed, urging an inquiry into the causes of so many broken homes. She thought early, unadvised marriages and modern modes of courtship were among them.

The evening session was opened by an anthem by the choir, followed by prayer by the Rev. J. M. Seymour, pastor of the Presbyterian church, Norwalk. Mrs. C. M. More, in behalf of the local union, extended a most cordial welcome to their city. Mrs. S. B. Penniman responded in her own happy and comprehensive way. Then followed the address by Mrs. Hammond; Her theme, "We are Laborers Together with Him." She spoke of the great honor of being associated with Christ in work for humanity; of the constantly increasing demand for laborers, especially of the call for women to labor for the uplift and emancipation of women. Her address was logical and earnest.

Wednesday was a busy day. After devotional exercises the president, Mrs. Gray, took the chair. Reports from the counties showed an encouraging activity; five hundred and forty-two paying members; nearly that many copies of THE UNION SIGNAL taken, and about sixty copies of the Ohio Messenger.

The scientific temperance instruction Bulletins have been faithfully put into the hands of the teachers; leaflets and books liberally distributed and loaned; prisoners visited and given the Bread of Life; reading-rooms opened; a public drinking fountain set up in Lorain at a cost of eighty dollars; evangelistic meetings held, to the profit of many both within and without the church, notably, those led by our sweet and consecrated sister, Mrs. Romick, of Delaware. Able speakers have addressed the people on the most burning questions of the day, Mrs. S. Perkins, Mrs. Hammond, Mrs. Livermore and Colonel Bain among the number.

The Crusade meetings in December, 1889, were a means of blessing. The closed columns of some of the papers have been opened to us, but alas! alas! we must still write, "The enemy stalks abroad." We are glad to record, however, that the members of the W. C. T. U. of the third district are not weary in well-doing, but are stronger and braver, more determined to patiently persevere than ever before. They have put the hand to the plow not to look back.

Topics treated during the day, "Heredity," by Mrs. Osborne, this to be published as a leaflet; "Scatter Lilies," by Mrs. Mary D. Santley; "Observations at Our National Capital," by Mrs. C. C. Bacon; "The Ballot for Woman a Necessity," Mrs. Webster; an unusually interesting question-box conducted by Mrs. Farr.

Mrs. E. J. Gray, who has been a most efficient president of this district for several years, declined reëlection, and Mrs. Mary D. Santley was chosen to fill that office; Mrs. Mary H. Houghton was elected corresponding secretary and treasurer, and Mrs. H. E. Hershiser, recording secretary.

The convention discussed the feasibility of doing away with district organization in Ohio, but by rising vote expressed itself unanimously in favor of retaining it. Mrs. Brush was elected delegate to represent the district at the National meeting to be held in October, in Atlanta, and Mrs. Mary D. Santley was chosen alternate. Choice music was furnished by choir and soloists, and most delightful entertainment by the Norwalk union and friends.

MRS. MARY D. SANTLEY.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

MRS. M. B. FLETCHER, the matron of the Talcott Mission, Chicago, desires to acknowledge the generosity of the W. C. T. U. ladies of Monon, Ind., in receiving twenty-five little children of the Talcott Kindergarten into their homes for two weeks during the month of June. Miss Lyman, the superintendent of the industrial school, accompanied them, the Monon Railway Company giving them free transportation. A blessed work, indeed!

THE second annual convention of the Pettis county W. C. T. U., was held in Sedalia, Mo., Thursday and Friday, June 26 and 27, with a very good attendance. Mrs. J. H. Battles, of Nebraska, delivered an address Thursday evening, giving many interesting and instructive thoughts concerning health and heredity. The question, "What relation has the liquor traffic to missions?" was very ably discussed by Rev. Mr. Doller, pastor of the Congregational Church, Sedalia. The following new officers were elected: Miss Nora E. Littlefield, president; Miss Allie Parsons, secretary; Mrs. Mary Menefee, treasurer. The semi-annual convention will be held in October at La Monte.

MANY hearts will sorrow to know of the death of Mrs. Georgia Hulse McLeod, of Maryland, who has so often contributed to the pages of THE UNION SIGNAL. Her death was caused by heart failure; her health had been impaired for a year. Before she had reached womanhood she had written poems for various periodicals, and while yet very young five volumes were published from her gifted pen. For many years she was principal of the Southern Literary Institute for young ladies in Baltimore. Of late years her energies have been almost wholly devoted to W. C. T. U. labors in her state, and she will be sadly missed as an active worker, and as a contributor to temperance literature.

A VERY pleasant and profitable convention was held in Conroy, O., June 25. A union was organized consisting of twenty members. Mother Stewart's presence and voice cheered the workers through the day, and in the evening she gave a thrilling address. The superintendent of Sabbath observance suggested that a petition be sent from the county unions along the line of the Mackinaw, to the railroad officials, requesting a discontinuance of Sunday excursions. This was heartily approved of by all.

THE following message, so full of vital joy and thankfulness, comes from a worker in Beardstown, Illinois: "My heart is full of delight and praise this morning over our very successful convention at Ashland. The Lord was with us in great power; the discussions were entered into by so many of our women very heartily, and, best of all, peace and harmony reigned throughout. Many visitors were present from the country and little villages; the house was nearly full at every session; the men turned out better than at any previous county convention or at our district convention. Ministers, doctors and business men were present mornings, afternoons and evenings, and they took part in the discussions, especially in those concerning the 'original package decision,' but there was no discord. A motion was made and carried that programs be sent to the saloonists; five ladies were soon ready for this work; they went to each saloon, were introduced to the proprietor, were greeted with a hand shake and thanks for the programs. Our workers invited them to attend the convention. As the ladies entered, some men in the act of taking a drink set it down hastily and ran out at the back door; others stood up against the wall looking ashamed. When our committee returned the whole convention was astir to know the results; I soon called for their report. After the convention closed the men provided fourteen carriages and buggies in front of the church for the purpose of taking delegates riding. We decorated horses and carriages with long white ribbons and carried our banners; on one was inscribed "The Saloon Must Go." We rode past the saloons in one long procession. The men looked aghast, and seemed to be amazed, but not a word was spoken; we kept quiet, only praying that our silent influence might go out and reach them; crowds of men soon gathered to look. Thus ended our county convention, with thirteen new members added to the roll. Our finances come up to the necessary standard. We shall not soon forget the very kind hospitality of the men and women of Ashland."

ANNOUNCEMENT.

The W. C. T. U. will hold their School of Methods at the Puget Sound Chautauqua August 8-17, under charge of the recording secretary, Mrs. M. L. T. Hidden. The departments of our work will be represented by the state superintendents and prominent local workers. A very successful session is anticipated.

Publisher's Notes.

A Personal Word from the Publisher.

DEAR READERS OF THE UNION SIGNAL:—The personal pronouns never have appeared in these columns, nor my own signature. The reason, then, for a personal letter to our subscribers now must be a strong one that this wall of custom and propriety should be thus broken down. I leave the statements of the letter itself to give the reason therefor. From my desk I can look over to the corner of Monroe and La Salle streets and see an army of men and a whole procession of teams, busily engaged in getting ready the foundations of a large building. The lot is the only vacant one on this "Wall street" of Chicago, and till now has been held out of the market by its millionaire owner, Marshall Field, Esq. I can see a fringe of men standing around watching these busy workers, and without doubt they are asking, as do the thousands of passers-by, "What is going on here—who is going to build, and what kind of a building is it to be?" The daily papers have been giving the answers lately and a picture of the stately edifice that is to arise to a majestic height. How are you interested in this building? It is that this is your Temperance Temple which is getting ready to take a permanent shape in mortar and stone! One undaunted woman has done it all—Mrs. Carse, the president of our W. T. P. A. And now that it is a certainty, and the building is under way, it can be said that she has done her work under discouragements that would have turned aside any one with less of a Joan D'Arc's spirit than her own. She has been opposed publicly and privately by those who might have at least been neutral, if not friendly; the papers have been full of all kinds of misstatements, but Mrs. Carse has never swerved a moment from the path she had marked out, and now the sound of the hammer is heard, and the corner-stone day is announced! All honor to this grand, plucky woman! But this is not what I started out to write to you about. Five years ago our circulation was less than 11,000; now it is 85,000. There are yet eight weeks before the laying of the corner-stone of the Temple. Why must we go before the world with a few less than 100,000 subscribers? Think of what it will mean to you and your work to have the proud honor of having a journal then with over one hundred thousand subscribers! That would be the largest circulation of any weekly paper published in Chicago!

We have over 6,000 subscriptions expiring in August.

We have made each of the 6,000 a very special offer.

We prefer not to print this offer.

But, if You

earnestly desire this grand climax of events to culminate in September at the laying of the corner-stone of the Temple and will write us asking for the particulars of this special August offer we will extend the same privilege to you that we do to the subscribers above named.

You Can Save Money

by doing this. Very little is required from you—half an hour's work or less—and if I get a hearty response to this personal letter we will be publishing over a hundred thousand papers the day the corner-stone is laid!

Don't You See that the Temple could never have been the success it is, with all of the tremendous energy of Mrs. Carse, if our paper had stayed down at the old 11,000 rate? And that this growth helps on all the departments and the cause? So I make an earnest personal appeal to you as a lover of the pure, true and good to write me for the particulars of this August offer. And while I can, I want to thank the many, many friends who have responded so often, so cheerfully and often under such great discouragements, to my plans and appeals for work. I do often think of the steps taken—the sacrifices of time and convenience, and the steady persistence you have put into the work. But when the beautiful Temple is really finished—the marble walls of Willard Hall carved with the names of the willing workers and the revenue for the National work of the W. C. T. U. beginning to accumulate—will it not pay for all the toil and trouble and misunderstanding and differing views? So as to the building up of THE UNION SIGNAL. Your name cannot be engraved in marble but your work for the paper can go on bearing fruit while there is need of an evangel to point the erring and the uncertain ones to a life of purity and of trust in a loving Saviour.

Cordially yours.

Geo. C. Hall.

The 3-Cent-a-Week Plan.

I am greatly interested in your plan for using the children to bring THE UNION SIGNAL to the notice of those who have not yet realized how much they are losing each week by being without it. My interest in the plan is two-fold: first, for the sake of the paper itself, and its value to those who may thus subscribe for it; second, for the definite work that it gives the children to do. Nothing is more certain than that a working Loyal Temperance Legion cannot be a languishing one.

I shall be glad to urge this plan through our own state W. C. T. U. paper, and to request all the state superintendents to do the same. If you think best to send me 50 of the circulars giving this plan, I shall be glad to enclose one in each of the circular letters that I next send out to these superintendents.

Sincerely, HELEN G. RICE,
Supt. Natl. Dept. Juvenile Work.

We sent the circulars, and will be glad to do so to any who wish to know more of this plan to put children at work.

Extracts From Letters.

VANCOUVER, WASH.

Inclosed please find money for fifteen subscriptions, fourteen to THE UNION SIGNAL and one to The Young Crusader. I wish I had more time to solicit subscriptions. I find that they can be obtained very readily. I presented the following resolution at the recent state convention, that "as THE UNION SIGNAL is our National organ, every W. C. T.U. woman should read it in order to be efficient in her work and in sympathy with our National officers." I shall do all I can to help secure subscribers everywhere.

MRS. M. L. T. HIDDEN.

PORTLAND, OREGON.

We often say the "U. S."—significant initials— is the best paper in these United States. It is doing a great work in an able and convincing way. Shall be glad to help increase its circulation as soon as settled in our new home just outside the city.

J. RICHARDSON.

Mrs. E. M. Houghton, president of the local W. C. T. U. of Midland, Texas, sends for a dozen copies of Mrs. J. B. Beauchamp's Responsive Bible Readings, price 10 cents. She says the work is new to most of the members and they will not pray in public, and thinks the Responsive Bible Readings will educate them to use their voices in public. A good hint to the new locals.

Faint Hearts vs. a Strong One.

The secretary presented your letter, also one from MISS WILLARD at our union meeting. The ladies did not deem it advisable to send the $5.00, and it did not appear possible to canvass for new names at present. Just at this time I was appointed W. T. P. A. representative, and the matter was placed in my hands. I have made earnest effort and have succeeded in obtaining the $5.00 and five names. As soon as the weather is more favorable, shall try to push the paper and get more names.

"E. B. Iber, the leading distiller of Nebraska, wrote Jan. 7, 1888: We have done a good deal of business in the state of Iowa and we can say positively there is very little satisfaction in doing business in that state now. It is like running a railroad underground."

"What the voters of to-day need is backbone. True principles always succeed in the end. The defeats of to-day are the victories of to-morrow."

"If men will engage in this destructive traffic, if they will stoop to reap the wages of iniquity, let them no longer have the law-book as a pillow, nor quiet their consciences with the opiate of a court license."—Senator Frelinghuysen.

Money-Making Entertainments.

The list is worth your attention, as it comprises all sorts and kinds, and if your union seeks to occasionally make some money by amusing the people you will find here ample material. In many instances the entertainment will result in not only making the coffers heavier but in silencing the scoffers! Why? Because the planning has been not only to amuse but also to arouse thought while being amused, and a new idea that comes to you on the wings of a hearty laugh has a good-natured way of settling down quite at home in its new quarters. Here is the list:

Prohibition Program. Price 10 cents. By Anna A. Gordon. Song recitations and exercises of the brightest and best kind. High license is fired at in a way that tells. A dialogue by Mr. E. J. Wheeler on "Sensevs. License," is full of vigor, fun and education!

Crusader Programs. Price. 25 cts. A book of 188 pages, full of the best of Sunday-school and general temperance exercises, largely from the Sunday-school Young Crusader, given in its columns from time to time. All are good; none need costumes or any such outside helps. An admirable book in every way. Twenty-four numbers or exercises in all are given.

HINTS

FOR

Y. W. C. T. U. ENTERTAINMENTS.

Price 10 cents. Explaining the mysteries of Oriental Tiffin, Kaffee Klatsch, Mother Goose, etc. Candy recipes are added to sweeten things generally.

Ye Hatchet Partie. Price 15 cents. By Miss Mary H. Mather, superintendent department of entertainments National W. C. T. U. INTERSTATE MILKMAID'S CONVENTION.

Price 5 cents. By Laura J. Rittenhouse. An amusing and witty "take off" on a woman's convention. The amount of learning (?) displayed on the cow business is funny.

DO YOU OWN TOKOLOGY?

Augusta Cooper Bristol, of Vineland, N. J., well known as an eloquent advocate of reforms in national politics, writes:

"I am pleased to add my testimony in favor of the methods and claims of Tokology. My daughter, residing in California, and who had never been a mother, read the book and decided to test its claims. From the beginning she followed strictly the methods presented. In a few months the result, mentally and physically, was simply marvelous. The hour of delivery was anticipated with enthusiasm instead of dread. The labor pains were brief and effectual, the physician being the only person in the room at the birth of the child. And he, being astonished, exclaimed: 'Why, Mrs. S., you ought to give birth to all the children in the community.'

"The babe is now nearly a year old, and remarkable for its beauty, intelligence and health. The period of teething so far has not been accompanied by fretfulness or irritability in the least degree. The mother is ten or fifteen pounds heavier than ever before. 'Tokology' should be placed in the hands of every young married woman, and its methods faithfully followed."

Mrs. E. J. McElwain, a prominent temperance worker, also in Michigan, writes: "I took forty-five orders in five days last week, notwithstanding the storm. I sell 'Tokology' because I know I am benefiting the buyer."

Ladies who desire to earn a little pin money at odd times, or agents who make a regular business of canvassing will find "Tokology" a splendid selling book. Price prepaid, $2.75.

An Appeal—Heed It?

LAWRENCE, KAS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Mrs. Belle Bigelow, state superintendent foreign work, Nebraska, writes that they are in despair at the need of foreign tracts and leaflets for their use there. She says they have more orders than they can possibly fill all the time. She begs me to make an appeal for this work. Our funds are exhausted and the campaign is hardly begun. How can we raise the needed funds for the foreign work in Nebraska? I am assured that unless we can gain the foreign voters we will lose the state. The printed page in their own language appeals to them more powerfully than anything else. My offer to send 1,000 pages for $1 is still open.

Pastoral Work Delayed? No, Bettered!

MIDDLEPORT, O., July 3.

DEAR FRIENDS:—I got from the office the little book, "Girls of To-Day," which you were kind enough to send me, and have spent all the afternoon reading it. It is a most delightful book, and if I get into trouble for not making the intended pastoral calls during the afternoon, you are to blame for it. I wish all the girls I know would read and think over this book—what a treasure it would be!

I will write a review in one of the papers I am contributing to.

With many thanks, I am truly,

M. H. TIPTON.

"Aquarelle Print."

The picture of Miss Willard is ordered and if we are not very much mistaken will have its own peculiar mission of helpfulness and inspiration to many thousands. To the friends who have met Miss Willard and heard her speak, as well as to those who have not, this presentment of the National President will be a joy and a real help. One lady, looking at the original of which we wrote last week, said: "She seems to have conquered all the slander and anger and false accusations that have come because of her advanced political views. It is the ideal face speaking of hope and courage, of joy in the victory of truth and Christ's righteousness."

These are, indeed, words of high praise, but they are merited.

When Ready!

Doubtless many will get impatient, and say, "Did we not do as you asked, and get for THE UNION SIGNAL one, two, five, or more new subscribers? Why, then, do you not do as you agreed and send us the picture?" To which we must meekly and respectfully answer promise it for immediate delivery. We said to get out such a picture as this would require months, and that it would be sent out in time to make it a beautiful holiday gift to you." So please remember this and don't expect the reward of your labors till December. The firm which will get out this "aquarelle print" is recognized as the best in this country in color work—Messrs. L. Prang & Co.—and the senior member of the firm, Mr. Prang, has assured the publisher that his personal attention will be given to the details of the work. If you think a cheap, dauby, high-colored, shiny picture is coming, you are exceedingly Mistaken!

"We Did Not

The determination is to make this the most notable picture of the kind ever gotten out, for the subject is the best and noblest of earth's great women. The price of the picture alone will be $1, and it is cheap at that. For you will remember it is the reproduction—to the minutest details—of a picture that could not be produced, alone, for less than $500.00 !

We had but one thought, however, in planning this picture—not to make money from its sale—but to increase the number of those who will regularly read THE UNION SIGNAL, and only so did Miss Willard give a reluctant consent to the plan. We do absolutely give away all margin of profit to the W. T. P. A. in making the offers we have, which are good, you will remember, only to viz., 1st. If any old subscriber shall send us one or more new subscribers with $1.00 for each name, such an one is entitled to have the picture when it is ready, if claimed when remitting.

2d. If any old subscriber or any union sends in a club of five or more new names with the money therefor, he, she or they will be entitled to a framed picture of Miss Willard. After September 1st it will take $1.25 in the first case and $6.00 in the second to secure this lovely premium.

Yes, True,

It is hot weather, but a few calls in the cool of the evening will let you earn this, the very best and most attractive premium we have ever offered, and that is saying a good deal, for we have offered not a few.

One Thing More.

A limited number of the "aquarelles" will be put on white satin of the best quality, and with the utmost care. These will be sold at not less than $5 each—unframed and unmounted. Those who want one will please speak early as the edition must be very limited.

Very True.

We know you have not—the one question we put is, will you? Will you send us the names of 3—6—8—a dozen of your friends with a request that we send sample copies of THE UNION SIGNAL with the understanding that you will call on them and ask for their subscriptions? We will notify you by postal card the day the samples are sent. This would be a comparatively easy way to do the work and we know you haven't tried the plan but

Will You?

DR. WILFORD HALL'S
HEALTH PAMPHLET.
SHOULD BE IN THE HANDS OF EVERY FAMILY.
BECAUSE—it acts radically, but gently;
" It does not emaciate before building up;
" It requires less time than other means;
" It succeeds when other treatments fail;
" It is simple, and easy of application;
" It does not require semi-starvation;
" It relieves the person immediately;
" It is incapable of doing injury;
" Its complete cost for a lifetime is only the price of a consultation.
Why Superior to Drug Medication?
BECAUSE—It saves expense:
" It removes risk of careless prescribing;
" It restores the sick to health speedily;
" It saves life when drugs have failed;
" It lengthens life for valuable work;
" It hinders cases of drug poisoning;
" It does not complicate disease
" It is not nauseous;
" It enables one to do more for those we love;
" It preserves health in those who are well;
" It enables applicants for life insurance to pass medical examinations and become first-class risks, where they otherwise would have failed.
Business people, as well as professional people, who have tested the treatment, are universal in its praise.
For further information regarding this medicineless treatment call upon or send a 2-cent stamp to A. T. BATES, Room 46, 161 La Salle St., Chicago.

Signal Notes.

God loves to come to lonely hearts, which other loves do not fill. This is why bereaved hearts, outraged hearts, hearts misunderstood, hearts that have broken with kith and kin, and native place, and the grave of father and mother, are the hearts of His predilection.

IT is positively stated that the most densely populated square mile in the world is not in China nor Belgium, but in the City of New York, and that it is inhabited by 270,000 people, the larger part of whom are Italians, who speak their native language only, and retain their native customs.

SIR H. W. ACKLAND, Regius Professor of Medicine, University of Oxford, testifies that alcohol, except in the rarest possibilities, is not only unnecessary, but positively injurious.

IN Germany women physicians, however well qualified, have no legal standing, and are forbidden to sign a prescription. No matter what their attainments, they are only regarded as dabblers (Kurpfuscher). Thoughtful German women, however, are beginning to put in a plea for women doctors.

THE W. C. T. U. in Rochester, N. Y., has recently opened up a lodging house for young girls and women, at 126 South St. Paul street, in what was once considered one of the most elegant residences in the city. The basement is used for kitchen and dining-rooms; the entire first floor has been converted into a hall in which will be neld the various meetings of the W. C. T. U., Boys' Club and temperance Sunday-school. The remaining two stories are used for home purposes. This project is well started, and is expected to bring good results

THE political strength of the 8,000 liquor dealers of New York City is estimated by one of their own leaders to be not less than forty thousand votes.

THE Food and Shelter work of the Salvation Army was started in February, 1888, and it has grown until last April, 11,650 meals were supplied morning and night, varying from one cent to two cents per meal. Since the opening, 220,000 men have accepted this accommodation and paid for what they received. There are sleeping accommodations for 820 people per night; 55,500 meals have been supplied at one-half cent; 1,134,600 at one cent, and 1,757,234 at two cents. There have been 378 converts from these shelters.

THE Southern Star says that by actual count, last fall, in one hour's time, six leading saloons in Atlanta, Ga., beat six prayer-meetings in point of attendance of young men by a score of 1,008 to 114.

ON July 8 a meeting of the National German American Prohibition League was held in Chicago. All the old officers except the secretary were reëlected. The former secretary. Mr. Geo. H. Reissman, being unable to give this office the necessary time, was succeeded by Rev. B. Lampert. Parties wishing to communicate with the League should address the new secretary, at 1256 Wolfram street, Chicago, Ill. Mr. Reissman is no longer officially connected with the League. It was resolved to have German temperance literature printed and sent to German voters of the country. The president and secretary of the meeting were also instructed to confer with the State Central Prohibition Committee respecting the organization and incorporation of a State Prohibition League for the purpose of working to better advantage among the people of the different nationalities.

Baby Barendse,

Three months old when cured by the use of Steketee's Worm Destroyer.

Read what its mother says:

"The undersigned has a child only three months old. It became sick with pains in its bowels and stomach when scarcely two months old. It cried and whined nearly all the time, and was completely run down in flesh. We gave it everything that we thought would relieve the child, but it grew worse all the time. We made twenty powders from a teaspoonful of Steketee's Worm Destroyer, gave it one powder three times daily. To our astonishment it was relieved of thousands of worms. We have given the child but twenty powders It is entirely cured. I shall always recommend Steketee's Worm Destroyer. MRS. B. BARENDSE,

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

An audience of several thousands greeted Bishop Walden at Bay View Sunday.

A fire in the New York Western Union Telegraph building caused a loss of $150,000.

The Natural Bridge, Virginia, has been sold to a Massachusetts and Virginia syndicate for $200,000.

Joseph W. Latimer, of Abingdon, Ill., took the great gold medal in the Demorest contest at Lake Bluff, Saturday evening.

Miss C. W. Bruce, of Boston, gives $6,000 to Harvard Astronomical Observatory to be used in aid of astronomical research.

The Illinois Legislature convened yesterday in extra session to take necessary action in regard to the Columbian Exposition.

Miss Pugh and Mrs. Buell left Headquarters Friday for Mountain Lake School of Methods; after its close they go each to other schools.

Of the forty-four members elected to the new Japanese House of Peers twenty-two are farmers, fifteen are merchants, and only one a noble.

A German girl named Anna Holte, who was formerly chamber-maid at the Palmer House, Chicago, has fallen heir to $100,000, but cannot be found.

A quantity of naphtha shipped under a false bill of lading from Buffalo to Chicago in the boat Tioga caused an explosion in which many lives were lost.

By the will of James M. Donahue, the Archbishop of San Francisco receives $100,000 to divide between several charities, two orphan asylums receive each $25,000, and other charities smaller sums.

Judge Kelsey, of Bridgeport, Conn., has decided that a bottle of ale or beer is not an "original package," the package is the barrel or case in which the bottles were shipped.

One hundred and twenty-four members of the House of Representatives were announced as paired on the "original package" bill. This shows an unusual amount of cowardice, even for that body.

A largely attended mass-meeting was held in Chicago Sunday in the interest of Sunday closing of the Columbian Exposition. Resolutions asking the legislature to take action to have the Exposition closed on Sunday were passed.

Chief Justice James McSherry, of Maryland, has rendered a decision by which ball playing by men under contract at stated salaries is "Sunday work," and therefore prohibited by state law. This shuts professional baseball playing on Sunday out of Maryland.

Kansas City liquor-sellers brought suit against the officials of Topeka and the editor of the Daily Capital, on charge of conspiracy to prevent plaintiffs carrying on their business which is sending original packages of liquor into prohibition states.

Eugene Schuyler, American Consul General at Cairo, died Friday. He, more than any other man, aroused Christendom against the atrocities committed against the Bulgarian peasants by the Bashi Bazouks. Gladstone made his report the basis of his memorable appeal for the Bulgarians which resulted in the war that virtually secured the independence of Bulgaria.

Postmaster General Wanamaker has prepared a bill to suppress the traffic in lottery tickets through the mails; it stops a leak in the present law by authorizing postal authorities to deliver mail, postal orders and registered letters to agents of lottery companies, as well as to the companies themselves. It also proposes to strike out the word "fraudulent" before "lotteries," thus making it apply to all lotteries.

U. S. Surgeon General Hamilton has sailed for Europe with authority to arrange a plan which it is hoped will put a check upon indiscriminate immigration by preventing the embarkation of the lame, halt and blind, from all countries to America, where they overflow the state and county pauper institutions. Physicians connected with the United States Marine Hospital service will be established at every port in Europe. It will be their duty to pass upon all emigrants, excluding those suffering from contagious or scrofulous diseases. They will also make examinations with regard to criminal cases.

THE Chicago Evangelization Society takes no summer vacation. Mr. Moody has sent two leading speakers from the Northfield Conference, Rev. H. G. Moole and Mr. F. Marsh, both of England, who gave addresses at the Training School, Chicago Avenue Church, Farwell Hall and other places. Major Whittle gives daily Bible lectures during July, and Professor Moore, of Virginia, will succeed him during August. Three tents are kept in constant use for gospel meetings, while open air meetings, house to house visitation and other forms of evangelistic work are being pushed.

THE Mexican Lottery company that endeavored to outbid the Louisiana company in Louisiana, has offered North Dakota $250,000 for a charter. Governor Miller immediately issued a circular calling attention to the danger threatening the good name of the state and urging that public sentiment be aroused so that no friend of any lottery can be elected to any place of authority. A sensible and timely action, as Louisiana's experience proves that the lottery will spare no pains nor expense in electing men to the legislature whom it can buy.

THE Mills-Griffin debate arranged for Lake Bluff was postponed by the sickness of Mr. Mills, from Tuesday evening till Thursday evening. Mr. Mills being still unable to speak, Mr. S. W. Packard took his place at that date and the debate proceeded. In Mr. Packard, Mr. Griffin met a foeman worthy of his steel, who, although he spoke without preparation, spoke from such deep-seated convictions that he produced a profound impression. Mr. Griffin spent most of the week at Lake Bluff, attended the School of Methods quite regularly and expressed interest in its work.

THE Inter-Ocean speaking of Original Package legislation declares that it would be a great moral wrong as well as a political blunder for Congress to adjourn without passing the bill on this subject now before it. It says: "Any legislation which either falls short of vesting in the States the authority necessary to meet these conditions or that exceed these limitations should be defeated. The Republican party cannot afford to make a mistake in either direction. To err on either side would be inexcusable and dangerous.

MANY pleasant callers have honored our office this week, among them Professor Scomp, of Georgia, author of "King Alcohol, in the Realm of King Cotton," and a valued contributor to the pages of THE UNION SIGNAL. Temperance work, through which he is chiefly known to our readers, is but his avocation, his vocation being the teaching of Greek, in which he is acknowledged authority. He was on his way from the Educational Association at St. Paul to Lake Bluff Convocation.

THE Temperance Record, organ of the National Temperance League, London, devotes two columns to Miss Ames and Mrs. Barnes, giving a sketch of the work in which each is engaged in America, and reports of their addresses in London. Miss Ames seems to have aroused much enthusiasm regarding temperance press work; the Record says: "This is a work which could be very effectively carried out by women, and the enthusiasm with which the idea was taken up when Miss Ames described it at the Memorial Hall encourages us to hope that very shortly it will be tried by the women of this country." As a result of this meeting, Mrs. Ward Poole was elected press superintendent by the B. W. T. A.

THE Supreme Court of Minnesota has made a decision for which it deserves the thanks of womanhood; it is that photographs are the property of the person who sat for them. This decision was reached after a year's litigation growing out of suits against tobacconists and others who have purloined pictures of beautiful women and used them as trade-marks. All remember how Mrs. Cleveland's picture was used as an attractive sign in cigar stands until stopped by positive orders from her husband. Cigarette dealers do even worse than this; they take the pictures of ladies, using the head and attaching it to a body in various forms of undress. It is time the courts put a stop to this diabolical practice. English courts have also taken action in the matter.

THE effort of the Louisiana lottery company to carry its bill over the Governor's veto failed by one vote. Senator Smith, upon whom it depended for that vote, was too ill to be present when action was taken and died the following day. The legislature had been thoroughly "worked" and the opposing members were impregnable. The claim is that the Governor has no right to veto a bill which has been passed by a two-thirds vote. A decision to this effect was rushed through, and now the matter will go to the Supreme Court. The anti-lottery leaders do not relax their efforts. A convention of opponents from all over the state will meet at Baton Rouge Aug. 6. The Farmers' Alliance will be in session there at the same time, and the two bodies will act together against the lottery. The grateful citizens of New Orleans, last night, gave a reception to their staunch Governor, his lieutenant, and such "antis" of the legislature as were able to be present.

THE grand Prohibition rally at Lake Bluff occupied the four days, July 16-19, closing with the Sabbath services of Sunday the 20th. The opening hour of the morning was devoted to the School of Politics, conducted by Dr. Evans, the rest of the day and evening to stirring addresses, except Saturday evening when there was the Demorest contest for the great gold medal. Wednesday, Prof. U. Z. Gilmer and Mrs. Susan Fessenden gave grand addresses. Thursday the speakers were Dr. Boole and Dr. E. McClish, who captivated his audience with the force of his logic; Friday brought Professor Gilmer again, and Professor Scomp, of Georgia, who discussed the "Race Problem as Affecting the Temperance Question," with rare ability and discrimination. Saturday was Labor Day. Sunday was well filled with a Bible reading by Dr. Evans, a song service, and sermon by Dr. S. S. Cryor, pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church, Cincinnati. Tuesday evening Dr. Boole gave his great "American Snake Show" lecture which was thoroughly appreciated.

A RENEWED appeal for aid comes from Nebraska, justified by the vast interests involved in the success of the Amendment there. Chairman Bentley says: "We are fighting not merely the brewers, distillers, and liquor dealers of our own state. In the shock of this mighty struggle we find arrayed against us the combined forces of the national liquor traffic. Whenever the question of constitutional prohibition is before a single state—as we are now compelled to deal with it—the enemy trains every gun on that citadel and masses every detachment of its national equipment against that objective point. If left to wage this battle alone the Prohibitionists of Nebraska must fight against fearful odds. Grant us in the last three months of this campaign the full measure of help given in the past and we will win this battle and trample under foot every black flag of rum piracy that to-day in Nebraska floats from legal spar and mainmast. Our great need is money to carry on and finish victoriously this conflict. Give us powder and shot, backed by national credit to meet the demands of our monthly pay-roll, and Nebraska will make November 4 a Gettysburg for the prohibitory Amendment. Send all contributions to H. E. George, treasurer, 128 Burr Block, Lincoln, Neb.

CONSOLATION.

BY WARNER SNOAD.

I ring the chimes on the old refrain,
"Useless"—for ever the pitiless rain
Falls, chilling me day and night.
Sweeping the beauty and bloom from life,
Drowning the sweetness of mother and wife
Till my eyes scarce see the light.

There comes a cry from a sister soul:
"That flood of waters beyond control
Those drops of your o'er full grief
Have reached my heart which was parched and dry,
And lo! the drought and the heat pass by;
I thank God for—relief."

Father! I, too, send up a cry
Be it as Thou wilt—and not I.
Thy hand hast cast me down;
But if from my cross of pain there flow
A spring of comfort for other's woe
Better a cross than crown.

So let me suffer!—if suffering be
A means to serve Thee a gift from Thee,
To Thee I leave the rest—
Gather the blossoms of wasted life,
Gather the sweetness of mother and wife
I yield Thee my first and best.

BY THE WAYSIDE.

BY S. E. SHANKLAND.

A mountaineer's cabin nestled in a sheltered nook where twilight was falling fast, while bare peaks all about were still crowned with the glory of a cloudless summer sunset. Before the doorway stood a woman clad in a plain blue cotton gown, her features scarcely discernible, shaded as they were by a deep sunbonnet. She held a battered milkpail, and her eyes were fixed in a dull, unexpectant way upon a chubby, white-haired urchin who was noisily driving up several cows.

Suddenly a horseman appeared around the abrupt turn which brought the road to an end in front of the gate, and the stranger's surprise at the unforeseen termination of his toilsome climb was plainly mingled with pleasure. To the weary rider and his weary steed any human habitation seemed to offer a promise of rest.

"My name is Marling. I preached yesterday in the church at Hollow Rock. I should have reached Barren Plains to-night, but have mistaken my way. Can you give me shelter until to-morrow?"

The man's tones were kindly, and his countenance was expressive of a sincere, elevated character, but the woman eyed him suspiciously, and said, "We don't take lodgers."

"You would be doing a merciful deed, for my horse is too tired to go much farther, and I will pay you well."

She came nearer, and, with a cautious glance around, said hesitatingly, "I wouldn't mind, but my man, Jake, don't like to have strangers about. Go 'long a piece further and cross the branch, then turn to the right and you'll come to Bill Weatherstone's. Maybe he'll take you."

Something in her sad, frightened face moved the missionary to pity, and he asked, "Can you read?"

"Oh, yes, I used to love to read when I was a girl, but we don't have books up here."

"Have you a Bible?"

"I haven't seen one since I left my mother's house. But I can't talk any longer. If Jake should come, he'd beat me."

"I will send you a Bible. Meanwhile take this little tract; you may like to read it in a spare moment."

She took it hastily, hid it in her dress, and turned to the cows patiently awaiting her.

Marling urged his reluctant horse in the direction indicated, pondering upon the woman's refusal to entertain him, a circumstance unusual among the hospitable mountain people.

His was a task of no ordinary kind, to carry the Gospel message to souls perishing in his native state, to hearts benighted in a Christian land, and only a transcendent realization of Christianity's power and humanity's need could have induced him to devote his brilliant talents and extensive acquirements to labors so humble and obscure.

He found his night's lodging more easily than he gained the confidence of his surly host, but gruff Bill Weatherstone could not altogether withstand the influence of his guest's frank good humor, and the minister lay down upon his straw bed with no misgivings, and fell peacefully asleep while sweet promises of the Father's watchcare filled his thoughts.

Riding down the dewy slopes in the early morning, and noting the secluded valleys, green with endless fields of waving corn, some indistinct half-memory of threatening whispers, and stealthy figures by his bedside, revealed to him the danger he had escaped. He understood that he had unwittingly intruded upon the haunts of the "moonshiners," and had been so near one of their illicit distilleries that if his conduct had in any way confirmed the suspicion of his being a revenue spy, a bullet would have put the seal to his silence.

Jake Freeland came home for the first time in three nights, the evening after Joel Marling's departure from the neighborhood. He often left his wife with the children for days and nights together, while he tended the still or reveled in its product.

"So Bill Weatherstone's been took in by a travelin' preacher. I told Bill he ought ter hev druv him off onct fer all. When one comes onct he's sho ter come agin, an' we don't want none o' the drivelin,' cantin' set 'round these parts. Ef ever I find ye a lettin' 'em inter this house, Nan Freeland, I'll give it ter ye, ye hyar me now."

His wife met his fierce eyes unflinchingly, and quietly replied, "I knew you didn't want him here, and told him so when he came by."

"So ye've been talkin' ter him, hev ye? I warrant he's put some stuff inter yer head. Ye've got too many notions thar now, though the land knows, I thought I'd hev shuck 'em outen ye by this time."

"He only asked for a lodging, and I refused."

"Wall, don't let me hyar no more 'bout talkin' ter strangers; thar's too many folks pryin' inter what ain't ther business."

Nan read and re-read the precious tract; every one of its well-chosen words fell like drops of dew upon her thirsty soul. She had been reared in a home superior in refinement to her present surroundings, her parents being respectable but not pious people. In her childhood's days the old family Bible, once valued by an aged grandmother, lay neglected upon a shelf, and the only religious instruction she received was at an occasional Sabbath School. In a freak of momentary fancy she married this man, and her life since had been a long penance. Shutting in her regrets and her longings, she slaved on hopelessly, seeing only the repulsive present, and doggedly enduring the abuse and the burdens heaped upon her. But what had she found now! A treasure beyond gold. Yet it was only a few lines, only a taste of the glorious revelations of the gospel, but it was one ray of purest light in a life shrouded by deepest gloom.

A faint brightness stole into her heavy countenance, and the sharp retort died oftener upon her tongue. Even dull Jake perceived that she was somehow different. One morning, having failed to rouse her temper by his taunting words, he left the house declaring that he would seek livelier company. Some impulse moved him to return and peer in at the window. Nan sat on a low stool intently reading a printed leaf, while tears coursed down her cheeks. Jake threw open the door and tore the paper from her.

"Aha! I've found what's makin' ye so dumpish. Cryin', too, like ye done when ye fust come hyar ter live. I thought ye'd stopped that fer good. Don't ye know I won't hev none o' that 'round me? The sooner this yer thing, whatever it is, gits outen my way, the better,"—and he tossed the leaflet on the smouldering embers in the great fire-place.

Nan darted forward with a sharp cry, but he held her back—a moment more, and only a charred flake remained, at which she gazed motionless and silent.

"Wall, hev ye lost yer senses? Don't yer see them dishes ter wash? Ye're mine, woman, mine. I bought ye a good while sence, an' I ain't done with ye yit, so ye mought as well give up an' go 'long like ye done afore this yer nonsense come acrost ye."

As he stalked away, Nan slowly moved and went about her dreary tasks. Little Jemmy ran to her with flashing eyes,—

"Pap ain't good ter ye, mammy, an' when I get big I'll kill him!"

"Hush, hush, Jemmy, mammy don't mind. Run out with the rest and play."

When the little ones, whose innocence and affection contrasted strangely with the guilt and misery about them, were safe at play in the clear, pure sunshine, Nan slipped away to a shady spot by the broadest part of the stream to muse upon the new ideas which had lately taken possession of her. The tract was gone, but its words were treasured in her memory. To this place she had once resorted with the intention of burying in the depths of the pool all her maddening troubles, longing only for an end to the present torture. She had been prevented then by the sound of her children's voices borne to her by a heaven-sent breeze. Now she shuddered as she recalled that fearful moment, for a change had been wrought within her. Now she dreamed not of an endless rest for the body and a removal of care and grief, but the serene depth of the water made her think of a possible calmness of spirit, which could endure wounds and contradiction and still preserve its deep, holy peace undisturbed. The gleams of sunshine through the trees above gave her an idea of a heavenly radiance cheering her dismal path.

"Oh, God!" she cried, "can I not learn more? Help me!"

A rustling among the bushes startled her. It was Weatherstone's daughter Mary. She held a small package.

"Here," she said softly, "the preacher sent you this. Don't be afraid, I won't tell. You was good to us when little Billy had the fever."

Nan tore off the wrapper and saw a neat copy of the Bible. As it opened her eyes fell on the words, "Ye shall find rest unto your souls."

"Come here, sometimes, Mary," said she, "and we will read this together. It will do us good."

The two women met often by the brook, as did those other women of whom it is recorded that they resorted to "a riverside where prayer was wont to be made," and the Gospel of Love came to their unloved lives as a breath of flower-scented air to the prisoner's dungeon.

Jake stormed and wondered, but finally gave up his wife as an enigma he could not solve. His biting words met no response, and it is hard to keep up a fire where there is no draught. He came to respect his wife, however unwillingly, but no moment of confidence ever gave her an opportunity to speak of what lay nearest her heart.

Nan's form grew thinner and weaker as her eyes grew brighter and her mind clearer. Towards the end of the winter, an unusually severe season, Mary had to come and care for the children, while their mother lay helpless and patient, the little Bible underneath her pillow. She talked to the little ones of a bright, happy country to which she was going, and one day, with them all gathered close around her, she prayed fervently for their father as only a faithful wife can plead for a hardened wretch.

Jake heard her. He had been wandering aimlessly about, now muttering angrily at her failing, now softening into something like regret for his unkindness. This scene melted him. He strode hastily away, and when he returned went quietly to the bedside;—

"Nan, ye look right bad; can't I give ye some tea or suthin'?"

She looked up surprised at his unwonted tenderness.

"No, Jake; but sit down by me awhile."

"I shouldn't think ye'd want me ter be nigh ye, Nan, I've treated ye so mean. But, Nan, when ye git well it'll all be different."

"Yes, it'll all be very different soon, but not as you think. You will be kind to the babies, Jake, when I am gone?"

"No, no, Nan, not gone! I'm goin' ter be so good ter ye, so good. Ye shall go ter yer old home, ef ye want ter—I was a brute not to let ye go afore."

"My old home is all broken up, now; but I'm going to a home which will never be broken up, and I'll want you and the babies there, too. This will show you the way; it's a Bible the preacher sent me. Good-bye. God will surely answer my prayers for you."

"Oh, Nan, Nan! I'll give up the still, an' larn Jemmy a honest trade so he needn't be afeered o' no revenuers nor nobody. Don't leave me, Nan!"

"Hush," said Mrs. Weatherstone, who stood with her husband in the doorway. "She's gone where she's better fit to be than in this weary world."

"Oh, God!" cried the now thoroughly humbled man; "I went an' druv' away that preacher every time he come back, but he's comin' ag'in ef I live, an' things'll be different—yes, Nan, all different."

Late that night Marling was awakened by an importunate knocking. He was astonished when Jake Freeland dropped on his knees before him.

"Oh, mister, come back with me. I made ye go away when ye come ter Crooked Branch, but I want ye now. I've walked all the way ter-day, but that's nothin', she'd hev walked it any time ter hyar ye preach ef I'd a let her. She don't need nor want no preachin', now, but ye must come an' pray fer us onct in our own house afore she leaves it fer the last time."

Marling readily agreed, and the first morning light saw them started on their way. It was a much greater distance by the roads than by the cross-cuts which Jake had made on foot, so that is was late in the afternoon when they drove up to the cabin. Nan lay in a rough coffin with a smile of heavenly peace upon her wasted features, and a few early spring blossoms in her toil-hardened hands.

"I never give her no chance ter raise flowers, an' she loved 'em, too," sobbed Jake. "Oh, I've been a monster, Mr. Marlin', I see myself now. I'm only fit for the curses an' punishments o' God ter fall on."

"No, my friend," said Marling, "rather a fit subject for the unbounded grace of God to manifest its power upon."

He took the little Bible reverently, and noticed how its pages were stained with tears, and choosing chapters to which the book opened of its own accord, he read the ever sublime and comforting fourteenth of John and a part of the twenty-first of Revelation. Then he prayed, and several bowed their heads in worship in that cottage for the first time in their lives.

In a wild, sweet spot, near the sparkling rivulet, is a single grave. The violets upon it are tended by a careful hand, for they thrive and bloom as on no other part of that bleak mountain. In Jake Freeland's cabin there gathers frequently a group of earnest learners, to pray and read and listen to his homely but heartfelt exhortations, and no occasions are hailed with such joy by these humble seekers after truth, as the regular visits of the missionary, Joel Marling, their friend and guide.

NEW CENTURY CHURCH CLUB.

BY ANGIE F. NEWMAN.

Organization is the genius of the century. We offer the following Constitution, By-laws, and Methods of Work of a new organization as the justification for its creation, since its specific work is not compassed by existing organizations. To the casual reader it may appear that the purpose involved is alone to advance the possibilities of the admission of women to the General Conference of the M. E. Church.

This is only an initial step. By Nos. 1 and 2, "Methods of Work," it will be discovered the first movement is, through leaflets scattered broadcast, by contributions to the secular and religious press, to disseminate facts whereby correct judgment may be formed on the pending issue. The women of the churches (two-thirds of its membership) are about to express by ballot their conviction on the question of the admission of women to the highest ecclesiastical council of the church which absorbs their energies, but hitherto has denied them official status. The question is vital in its significance, as touching the capacity, opportunity and Divine intent, of woman's ministry in the realm of the spiritual. It is vital to all women of all the churches. Every great movement for the evolution of the segment of a race, in any period of the world's history, has, in itself, manifest relation to every other segment and to all periods. To say that the authorities of the church were startled by the unexpected election of five women to the last Session of the Methodist General Conference, is but to state a demonstrated fact.

Almost immediately following the announcement of their consecutive election in the several states (beginning with Nebraska) expert methods were devised and kept in motion, not only in the interim of months prior to the Session of the General Conference, but to the very last hour and very last ballot of the Session—to create sentiment adverse to woman's "eligibility." Not one of the five women, to their honor be it said, has ever been accredited with the slightest effort to support her own candidacy. In some cases, at least, they had no knowledge they would be so considered by the Conference. In the writer's case, who was first elected, on the evening prior to the Session of the Lay Conference which elected me, I returned home after five months' absence in the East, when a committee appointed for the purpose, called and asked permission to place me in nomination on the following morning. No word of correspondence had ever been exchanged on the subject, nor was I at any time present at the Conference. On the first ballot I received three-fourths of the votes cast, and on motion the election was declared unanimous. With slight modifications, this was the experience of all the ladies whose election followed. The election of these women to the General Conference was but one manifestation of a gradual correlation of forces coming down through the centuries. The centuries step with slow, and ofttimes muffled feet, but at last, the ear catches the echo. To interpret this echo, along a given line, is the work of the New Century Church Club.

The General Conference, by its final verdict on the eligibility of these women to membership, and its submission of the question to the church, fixes grave responsibility somewhere. It must be borne in mind, the vote of the church is but an expression of opinion. Final action is still vested in the General Conference.

That the vote of the church shall be an intelligent vote, based on knowledge of law and gospel, as well as the tides of destiny, the work projected by this Club is most important. The routine pressure of domestic life makes it difficult often for woman as an individual to measure her relation to new movements. When grave issues are pending, such relation should be defined. The needful literature is not always current or available. Organized effort is essential. Again, "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him." The pending question involves that of woman's relation to the Church of Christ. What is the secret which the Master hath conveyed to her soul? If He hath spoken in the still voice or by the mighty whisper, "Do this in remembrance of me," should not woman herself testify as to that whisper? If the soul has been rocked by the message-bearing billows, "Woe is me if I preach not the gospel," should she not act as her own interpreter?

If the authorities of the church see, in dim outline, a mysterious hand tracing on the walls of their council chambers, "Peres," "Thy kingdom is divided" (with the women), may it not be the finger of the ages, which is the finger of God? And shall woman repudiate the trust thus committed by Him who cannot be answered? Let no one be deceived. The mission of the Club is not fulfilled when women are admitted to the General Conference. It compasses the present and ever expanding radius of woman's spiritual activities. New "Methods of Work" will be constantly announced in harmony with the indices of need. Rev. J. M. Bashford, Ph. D., pastor of the Delaware Avenue M. E. Church, Buffalo, N. Y., in a booklet, "The Bible and Woman," which the Club are printing and circulating, with wonderful terseness thus clearly states the whole proposition:

"We contend for the fundamental principle of the reformation, that personal freedom follows as the corollary of personal responsibility to God, and that each human being, without regard to sex or nationality, should be free to choose that form of service to which he thinks God calls him, and be responsible to God for the consequences, subject only to such restrictions as apply to all alike." To secure that personal freedom is the initial and final intent in the organization of the N. C. C. C., imperfectly outlined in the following Constitution, By-laws, and Methods of Work:

SLOJD OR SLOYD.

BY MRS. S. A. SEARS.

II.

Allusion has been made to the work established by Mr. Abrahamson at Naas. A word of this ancient court-land may interest the general reader. Situated a little more than thirty miles from Gothenberg, on a line of railway connecting this place with Stockholm, may be found a picturesque region, with lake, bordered by granite rocks, and stretching away in the distance dark forests interspersed with green pastures, where cattle feed upon fresh herbage. The whole landscape is dotted here and there with humble farmhouses and isolated villas. Upon a headland jutting into the lake stands the castleof an ancient lord.

We are told that a poor boy, born in 1817, came to Gothenberg while quite a youth and engaged as a clerk in a dry-goods establishment. Gradually he acquired sufficient means to become the owner of a horse and cart and drove through the country selling goods. Like the Yankee peddler of New England's early days, "he got on in life" and became owner of the largest dry-goods business in the city, In 1868 he withdrew from business and bought an estate, the now famous Naas, where he has since devoted himself to the noble work of ameliorating the condition of the common people, morally, intellectually, and financially. He has shown in many practical ways how a rich man may benefit his own country and humanity. His first work was to remodel the cottages of the poor, and introduce the most desirable system of cultivation. His next work was with the children. His aim was, not merely to afford primary instruction to girls and boys living in the locality, but to propagate at home and abroad the idea of manual training as preconceived by its greatest teachers.

In 1872 he opened a school for boys. The course of study consisted of the Swedish language, history, geography, writing, drawing, natural science, singing, gymnastics, military drill, and horticulture. Besides these branches the pupil must work two hours a day in the shop. The idea of apprenticeship was not the thought of this course. It was purely pedagogical. The manual training is regarded as an educating force, stimulating to the mind, and giving at an early age qualities of readiness, quickness, and that promptness and certainty of movement which is of great value in child development; but, more than this, it has come to be considered as an educational process for the most complete development of the moral, physical, and intellectual powers of the child. Is this claiming too much? Until thoroughly tested, who can answer?

In 1874 a primary school for girls was founded, with the following object: To provide for girls from ten to sixteen years of age, in addition to the ordinary instruction in schools, a course in feminine occupations, such as spinning, weaving, hand and machine sewing, the ordering of household affairs, cooking, and instruction in such other occupations as would be of use to the mother of a family. Later a course in woodwork or slöyd was introduced, occupying two and a half hours a week.

In 1875 the establishment of the world renowned normal school followed, with manual training as a part of the course, under the management of M. Saloman, whose name is everywhere associated with the success of the school.

In this free training school for teachers Mr. Abrahamson's philanthropy reached to all parts of his fatherland, only to be followed later by an extension of the benefits of the system to other countries. It is claimed that the rapid spread of this work is the most wonderful fact in the history of education, and that there is no place in the world where so many different nationalities are represented by students preparing for teaching as at Naas. Nearly every division of Europe has had teachers there to study the slöyd course, with reference to adapting it to the existing systems of their respective countries.

In July last applications were made for one hundred and three teachers from England, Scotland and Ireland alone. The government of Italy, two years ago, sent eighteen teachers. Japan also is introducing the system into some of her schools. The government of Chili sent two delegates to visit the schools of Sweden last year, and has since contracted with Swedish teachers for the introduction of slöyd into its public educational system.

Boston and New York are both investigators of the subject. Chicago has, through Colonel Parker, had two young men preparing as teachers in the school at Naas with a view to its introduction into the course of the Cook County Normal School.

Miss Toppelius, from the Pedagogical Institute of Helsingfors, Finland, has been placed in the Boys' Training School at Norwood Park as a teacher of slöyd. Manual training is soon to be connected with farming at the new home of the school. This will prove, it is hoped, the opening of doors for these boys to helpful, intelligent manhood and good citizenship.

A free teachers' class for the mission industrial schools of the city will also be in charge of Miss Toppelius. Educators anticipate that the introduction of this simple educational handcraft into charitable institutions will demonstrate its value for all children.

THE NATIONAL EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Royally, indeed, did the twin cities of the Northwest welcome the National Council and the National Educational Association. Nominally, the meetings were held in St. Paul, but Minneapolis homes and hotels were thronged with guests, and her lovely lakes were fit rivals for the attractions around her "brother" city. Nor was this an additional expense to the teachers, for Minneapolis citizens arranged for free railroad tickets for members of the Association.

Deeply interested as are the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL in all matters connected with our public schools, the climax of their interest in this meeting will be found in the wonderful gathering on the evening of July 10, addressed by Miss Willard, on "The White Cross Movement in Education."

"Wonderful," we say, because the People's Church, an auditorium seating some three thousand, was packed to the point of closed doors from which crowds went away disappointed, before the appointed hour for the exercises. In opening the session, President Canfield said, "When men want teaching on the subject of morals, they go to good women for it." Acting upon that principle, the first literary number of the evening was a paper on "The Moral Value of Art Education," by Miss Ada M. Laughlin, of St. Paul, followed by discussion of the same by several other ladies. Then came Miss Willard's address, and at her suggestion her words were prefaced by the singing of two stanzas of "Nearer, my God, to Thee," and closed by "Home, sweet home." Perhaps you can hear the mighty chorus; can you think the silence of the silent moment that followed in accordance with the suggestion of President Canfield that the audience "bide a wee," and think what "sweet home" means?

"Those who 'count time by heart-throbs, not by movements on the dial,' those whose lives are given to helpfulness for others, such we count great. And among them who greater than she whom I need not introduce, only present, to-night?" These were President Canfield's gracious words in introduction of Miss Willard.

Only a few isolated bits of her address can be given here: "Let me ask you, brothers and sisters of the public school, how can you better build up the chivalric principles of the White Cross than by training your boys for a crusade against the savage injustice toward the world's working women." "Never let it be said that our schools are Godless, while they teach health, which is physical holiness." "Now that the Bible is, to my great regret, being so generally ruled out of the schools, I see a blessed compensation in the development of science, that other revelation, by which, while the Bible goes out at the door, God crowds in through all the windows, and shines down into this strange skylight of the human brain more clearly than He ever did before." "Let us then, comrades and friends, since we cannot realize our ideal of the Word of God in the public schools, idealize our reality of the God of the word in these schools, and as His own high priests let us stand up daily before the little people at ten thousand schoolroom altars, saying, 'Let us listen to the reading of the Law of the Lord,' that sacred law written in their members, God's ritual of this body which is the temple of the Holy Ghost."

Is it nothing to us, is it nothing to the childhood of the land, is it nothing to the citizenship to-be, that the great concourse of teachers listened with rapt attention and applauded with hearty approval, such words as these? There is no question in the entire round of the solemn problems to be solved by the educators of to-day more important than that of social purity teaching in the public schools—a question before which they stand with bowed heads and awed hearts, asking, "Who is sufficient for these things?" God help them to find the solution which shall result in the future in an equal standard of purity and of right and justice for manhood and womanhood, in "a white life for two."

Among the resolutions adopted by this notable convention were those emphasizing "the need of an earnest study of the whole subject of moral training in schools," recommending "the investigation of the literature and methods of the White Cross movement," commending the work and literature of the American Humane Society, urging the teaching of "the true ethics of politics" and the encouragement of "patriotism as an essential element of character and good citizenship."

ALICE M. GUERNSEY.

SOUTH DAKOTA WORK.

[Mrs. Gougar has completed her twenty days' work in behalf of the suffrage amendment in this new state; it is work that will tell. She sent us a letter which arrived too late for insertion last week. The first part was mainly devoted to plans for the convention at Huron, July 8; as it is too late now for these plans to be of service, we omit those pages. She also announces that she thinks the opinion expressed in the former letter, concerning Miss Anthony's use of the fund entrusted to her for suffrage work, was a mistaken one, and that Miss Anthony has acted with great wisdom under the circumstances. We give the rest of her interesting letter.—ED.]

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Since my last letter the Democratic convention has been held. Two gifted women presented the claims of the pending amendment, only to be most grossly insulted. A candidate for Congress made a speech on the occasion in which he declared "that no decent women of Dakota were wishing for the amendment." This was cheered to the echo by the convention, and no member had the manhood to offer a resolution of censure for so unjust and indecent an assertion. However, this man who was sure of his nomination for Congress before his speech, was defeated, and he acknowledged that his remarks led to this result. It is true that woman suffrage had many earnest friends in that body, but they were intimidated by a large delegation of Russians and Germans who were labeled, "We are down on prohibition and Susan B. Anthony. We want our beer and the men to do the voting." Strong anti-prohibition and anti-suffrage resolutions were adopted, notwithstanding a minority report in favor of both was presented by the Black Hills delegation. This pronounced action of the Democrats will greatly help the cause. The action of the Russians, foreign-born men, will arouse the American men, who are worthy of the blood in their veins, and make many voters for the amendment. Mrs. Grubb has a most excellent pamphlet in German ready to be sent out. I have instructed Mrs. Alice Pickler to employ a German speaker and put him at work at once, under her supervision. I hope friends will confer with Mrs. Pickler and help her to locate this speaker advantageously.

Mrs. L. M. Hammer, Highmore, superintendent of equal suffrage oratorical contest work, will send instruction and literature to all who will write her enclosing ten cents for postage. Wherever this has been introduced the results have been most gratifying. Let Dakotans make a note of this and introduce this work into every neighborhood. Again let clubs give entertainments and money be put in local treasuries so that collections taken by speakers may help defray their expenses or be put in state treasury.

I have been especially gratified at the course of the pulpit in this struggle. Each of the Sabbaths spent by me in the state, pastors joined in union services on behalf of a talk on woman suffrage. I found but three ministers offering opposition and these are lukewarm. The press is largely in favor and the opposing press is respectful and fair. Prominent men are declaring themselves as favorable. At my last meeting at Sioux Falls, Hon. T. D. Kanome, warden of the penitentiary, a man of great influence, a fine Christian character, Mr. Meridith, president of the Sioux Falls Baptist College, and Judge Brookings made short speeches in favor, much to the delight of the people who recognize the weight of such influence.

Miss Anthony and Mrs. Howells continue to hold conventions in prominent places, not stopping even for the intolerable heat. The amendment in South Dakota can be carried by a large majority if the July 8th convention acts wisely in the selection of competent officers. I am confident this will be done. Then let us all give the financial aid possible, when not only Wyoming but South Dakota will be free states in which all the people will have a voice in the laws they must obey. Such results are worthy the earnest efforts of Christian womanhood wherever found. Reader, what have you done to help carry South Dakota? Please answer by doing something.

MRS. GEORGIA HULSE MCLEOD—IN MEMORIAM.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The telegraph brings this morning, July 8, the sad intelligence of the death of Mrs. Georgia Hulse McLeod, "the sweet poetess" of Baltimore, one of the charter members of the Baltimore W. C. T. U. and corresponding secretary for years.

Mrs. McLeod was the wife of Rev. Dr. A. U. McLeod, a well-known theological writer, and editor of the official organ of the Wesleyan Methodist, being a member of the British Conference of North America. She was the granddaughter of Bishop Roberts, of the Methodist Church, and daughter of Commodore Isaac Hulse, of the United States navy. Mrs. McLeod was both educated and accomplished, having spent quite a number of years in a Parisian convent. She spoke the French language fluently and was both a musician and artist. She very early evinced a taste for literature, and encouraged by Mrs. Lydia Sigourney, the poetess, published some very sweet verses. Mrs. McLeod has written a number of books, and has been for years a correspondent of several papers, secular and religious. She was for many years principal of the Southern Literary Institute for young ladies, the most popular and successful educational institution in the South. Her pupils are scattered from the Potomac to the Gulf, and the lovely floral offerings that came from every direction proved the love and veneration they felt for their devoted teacher.

When Miss Willard planned her crusade on the South, it was very proper that one as well known as Mrs. McLeod should accompany her, and it was by Mrs. McLeod (whom I had long known) that I was introduced to Miss Willard and the W. C. T. U.

A few weeks since I received the first intimation that Mrs. McLeod regarded herself ill. She said in a letter to me, not being able to attend the meeting of the Chapin union (one which she organized four years ago, and has been deeply interested in) they came to her. Continuing, she wrote, "And you will all meet in convention, in my own beloved Southland, and I will not be there, except in spirit. Mrs. Woodbridge, Mrs. Stevens, and you will say when you meet, 'Poor Mrs. McLeod has gone.' I want you when I pass away to say in THE UNION SIGNAL to my white-ribbon sisters, 'She tried to do what she could.'" In compliance with her request (which I did not think then was a dying one) I have written; not to indorse one whose own works praise her, and who has heard from the lips of her God Himself, not "she tried," but "she hath done what she could," but to fulfill a dying request.

The last act of public service done by this devoted woman was to secure for the "Woman's Christian Temperance Union" recognition and indorsement, by the Maryland Conference of the Methodist Church South. Her petition, beautifully expressed, was most graciously and courteously received by the Conference, and the Chapin union (in whose name the request was sent) were made happy in having their request granted by a unanimous vote, which one of the delegates to the General Conference said, "We did not go back on, at St. Louis." Hers was the entering wedge of the more general indorsement, given there, and the service she rendered a fit closing of a life devoted to duty.

May her mantle fall upon her gifted daughter, who will have the prayers of the W. C. T. U. I am sure.

OUR SECOND ROUND-THE-WORLD MISSIONARY IN JAPAN.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—I went to Yokohama by way of the Inland sea. The sail down the river on the steam launch was delightful, and two hours later found us fairly into the open sea. The Yellow Sea at best is never smooth, and even the size of the ship did not prevent the passengers feeling the unpleasant effects of the stormy sail, but once in the Inland sea, every one is on deck to enjoy the beauty of a spot of which we have read so much. Our first sight of "the land of the rising sun" was the base of the high hills, for the summit was wrapped in a cloud of mist, which soon began to disappear, and, as we sailed on, the partly-clouded sun cast a softened and subdued light over the landscape, and we began to realize that Japan, in point of beauty, is all we expected to find it. We next catch a sight of the grand old volcano, Fujiama. Little wonder the Japanese have it painted on screens, wrought in silk and molded in wares! The only great elevation in the country, there it stands, towering far above the surrounding hills in solitary grandeur, as if it held a commission from the Most High to keep watch over the "Mikado Kingdom." A heavy fall of snow has left a mantle of white on its summit, and, outlined by the clear, deep-blue sky, the picture is perfect.

Twenty-four hours bring us into port, and we anchor in one of the most beautiful harbors in the East. We are not a little surprised to see shippings from all parts of the world bedecked with floating flags of all nations; as we pass an American man-of-war, not only do we see the stars and stripes unfurled to the breezes, but this ship, like all others, is dressed in holiday attire, for it is the anniversary of the birth of the "father of our country," and one seemed to try to outdo the other in paying tribute to his memory.

In Yokokama I was a guest of Mrs. Austin, at the Seaman's Mission. We held special meetings for the sailors. There were many hundreds in port, and it seemed to me I never saw so much drunkenness anywhere. A Russian man-of-war was in port, and we saw at one time some twenty or thirty drunken Russians. The work for the city was planned, and we began by calling in all the saloons, and inviting all whom we met to attend our meetings, and the response was generous. Sundays we went off to the war-ships, of which there were a number in port. Part of the time we held five services a day, going from one vessel to another, then to the jail and the hospital. The gratifying results more than repaid us for the heavy work. At the same time we held afternoon meetings in the drawing-rooms of some of the society ladies, the first being held at the American Consulate, in the parlors of Mrs. Greathouse.

There has never been a union formed in Japan among the foreigners; all the work was carried on by the Japanese, but our meetings resulted in the formation of a union with a wide-awake president, long connected with our work at home. I am sure she will do a grand work.

As soon as the ladies of Tokio learned of my arrival they came down to welcome me and invite me to the capitol. Some days later I stepped on to a train. Months and months had passed since I had been comfortably seated in a train. During this time methods of travel had been numerous, on steamers, sanpans, house boats, buffalo carts, drawn by natives, carried by natives, and walking, so you may be sure the sight of a train was a welcome one.

Japan is a highly favored country. The winter months are delightful, the soil is fertile, and streams of clear, life-giving water come rushing down the hillside, flowing through the green fields, finding their way to every city and village and hamlet. Everywhere can be seen streams of clear, flowing water. Looking out of the car window, I was deeply impressed with the beauty of the country. Like China, every foot of ground is cultivated, and then only poorly supports the millions. As gardeners and tillers of the soil, the Japanese certainly excel. Little value is placed upon time; I am sure they have never drawn the line between time and eternity, hence days and days are spent in beautifying their farms.

The distance from Yokohama is but eighteen miles, yet it takes an hour and a half to make the distance, but as the cars are easy and surroundings so new, time passes before we are aware of it, and we find the train has reached the depot; hundreds of passengers make their way up the long platform to the gateway of exit. We are nearly deafened by the clicking sound of the wooden shoes on the pavement that remind one of the approach of mounted riders. Almost confused by the strange scenes, I was borne along by the press of the crowd, till I reached the gateway where I found a large number of Japanese ladies and gentlemen waiting to receive me. I recognized them at once by the white ribbon. One or two of the number spoke English; these escorted me to a carriage where I found the driver bedecked with a large white ribbon. We drove to the home of a missionary who was my hostess during my stay in the city. Here a most delightful surprise awaited me. Several had been invited to dinner, among them two Japanese gentlemen whom I had met in Honolulu, each having acted as interpreter for me while there. It was a real delight to see them again; both are Christians and gave me a very warm welcome to Japan. In the afternoon a reception was held at the hotel. It was attended by the prominent temperance workers; the only foreigners present were the lady and gentleman whose guest I was. At eight o'clock, dinner was served in foreign style, and after a number of courses the "after-dinner speeches" began.

Before separating, a committee on arrangements was appointed, and we began a ten-days' mission, with a Bible reading; meetings followed one upon another, about two each day. These were held in different parts of the city and were largely attended. They are fond of meetings, and sometimes sit patiently two and three hours. There is a strong sentiment through the country; they have the better part of a hundred temperance societies with well-attended meetings. They have changed the name of the W. C. T. U., but have very strong woman's societies, and temperance is one of their departments of work. I believe they have several temperance magazines, and the women have one they publish themselves.

The capital is a most interesting city, and here we see all that we have read so much of, both in art and nature; the situation of the city is beautiful, on the coast. It was just the time that cherry blossoms were at their best, and the greatest sight of Japan is the cherry tree in full blossom. These trees bear a very small fruit which is never used so they are cultivated for their beauty. It would be very difficult to describe them, but there is a park in Tokio where hundreds of these trees have been planted, and when they are in full bloom multitudes of men, women, and children walk out in the cool of the evening to see the flowers. The trees are almost burdened with blossoms. The flower is double, just a tinge of most delicate pink. After the blossoms have been out some days, dainty leaves appear, making the tree perfect. Many kinds of fruit trees yielding no fruit are cultivated for their flowers, and as most of them have double blossoms, more effective trees or shrubs could not be found.

The most interesting things in Japan (next to the people) are the temples. They are marvels of not only beauty, but art. The first temple visited was a large one near the center of the city where the common people worship. A long, narrow path of flagging leads from the gateway to the temple. We notice, first, the peculiar gate; two very large wooden pillars, twenty or thirty feet high, support heavy cross-beams, the ends of which extend some feet beyond the pillars; these were first put up as bird rests, where the birds, weary of travel, could pause in their flight and rest. It was done as a means of "merit-making." Passing through the gateway we see pigeons in great numbers, many have come here to worship and they stop on their way to the temple and "make merit" by feeding the pigeons and pass on to a large water tank where they take a swallow of water to wash out their mouths and dip their hands in water before going into the temple to worship. On entering the temple it is a custom to always remove shoes and foreigners are not excused, so we sit upon the steps and after some effort leave our shoes behind. As we pass through the door, at our left we see a great wooden image, the "God of Medicine." This looks very old and is defaced, I supposed, by time, but our guide told us that persons afflicted with any disease come and rub the image, then rub the corresponding affected part of their own body. The eyes of the image were nearly rubbed

There are so many points of interest a volume could be written, but I must leave the temples and tell you of the great University. Some distance from the center of the city a large tract of ground has been set aside and beautified for the University grounds. The buildings are of plain red brick, foreign style, without other ornamentation than white capstones. Numbers of these buildings are within the inclosure, and compare in many points most favorably with Western schools. It is told of a foreigner who passed the place with a Japanese gentleman, that he mistook the buildings for great factories. He inquired of his Japanese friend, "What do you manufacture there?" The most significant reply was expressed in a single word, "Power."

Before leaving the city a farewell meeting was held, which was well attended. The whole audience was seated on the floor as is the native custom. The meeting was addressed by several speakers. Mr. Terro Ando, whom I met in the Islands and whom I regard as one of the most beautiful Christian characters I have ever known, gave an account of his conversion to Christianity and temperance. The audience was moved beyond description. At the close of the meeting a temperance society was formed and we pinned the blue ribbon on two hundred. Resolutions of thanks were passed and it was proposed that the new society should go in a body to the depot to see me off.

About nine o'clock a. m. the following day members called and numerous gifts were bestowed upon me. As I took my seat in the train a young man hurried to the window and as he shook hands with me, said, "I've been thinking a long time about Christianity and temperance, and last night I decided for Christ and temperance."

My heart greatly rejoiced for he was an educated young man and is sure to do a good work for the Master. Just before the train moved out, one of the young men who had spent some time in America, explained to the crowd, that it was a custom in America to send "distinguished persons" on their way with three cheers. He took off his hat, swung it high in air and gave a regular "hip, hip, hurrah," in true American style, and just as the train moved out a perfect volley of cheers filled the air and I left bearing the prayers and good wishes of that enthusiastic gathering. I felt that it was worth while to come all the way to Japan just to hold those meetings in Tokio and know those dear little people, among whom I stalked like a "giant great and tall." Numerous invitations came to me from distant points, places never yet visited for temperance work and I was sorry, indeed, that I could not spend a year among those interesting people, so ready to adopt methods calculated to elevate the masses.

AN AFTERNOON IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Yesterday we were granted the privilege of admission into the houses of Parliament through the kindness of Dr. Dawson Burns and one of the members.

Inside the ancient building we saw the Lords sitting with solemn dignity in their black robes and white wigs, and we learned that the greater the size of the wig, the greater the man who wore it. We saw the Queen's throne chair in which she sits when Her Majesty comes to open Parliament. But the sight which will be the first to appear in my memory when I think of this day, is none of these.

As we stood in the vestibule waiting for the House of Commons to open, we noticed a sudden movement of interest among the honorable members gathered there, and following their amused glances and pointing fingers we saw two men bending and sweating under an immense bundle of papers carried between them on their shoulders. "That's the hardest work they have had to do for many a year," laughed a man near us as they staggered out of sight.

Presently we saw three great circular structures about six feet in diameter, rolled into the Commons Chamber, in which Mr. Wharton said were "six hundred thousand names from the inhabitants of Great Britain and Ireland praying the House to pass the provision of the Local Taxation Bill." The space between the table and the bar was almost wholly occupied by these wheels—the Chambers of the Lords and of the Commons are both very small—so that as one gentleman was speaking another member on the opposite side asked that the House be informed as to who had the floor.

The huge obstructions were at length removed amid shouts of derision from the Opposition and cheers from the supporters of the Government. Mr. Gladstone was present to aid the Opposition, if necessary, with one of his eloquent addresses. But notwithstanding the ominous monster petition which had been sent into the House by "600,000 inhabitants of Great Britain and Ireland," Mr. Smith, the leader of the party in power arose, and clause after clause of the obnoxious Compensation Bill was stricken out amid loud disapproval, cheers and laughter.

"Mr. Gladstone will not speak," whispered our friend, "because the government has yielded everything that we wanted it should." It was a disappointment to miss the opportunity of hearing the great ex-Premier, though we could not but be thankful that the temperance sentiment in England is a force which the government did not think wise to oppose. The Compensation Bill would have overthrown the careful work of temperance people to a great extent, and would have fastened the liquor traffic on the back of the British nation more firmly than ever, and would have made it almost impossible for her ever to rid herself of the putrid burden which her own sin placed there.

In a drawing-room meeting at the residence of Mr. Caines, member of Parliament, Miss Coles of the Woman's Council United Kingdom Alliance, delivered an address on the Compensation Bill that I shall not soon forget. During the excitement produced by this Bill the public sympathies have suffered much from pictures of the woe that would befall "the poor widow" whose only support is the public-house her husband left her, and who would be beggared if it were taken from her without compensation. But the last remnant of pity that could be excited in my heart toward this class of publicans was killed by Miss Cole's address, in which she related the following personal experience: A sailor husband sent to his young wife several pounds in money, expecting very soon to return to her. The intervening time passed and he came home, but found it deserted. He learned that his wife and child had been missing for several days, and in his terrible anxiety he asked Miss Coles to aid him in his search for them. She assented to his request, and started out on her sad mission by going to the nearest public house. "Yes, the lady described had been there," was the reply. She made inquiry at every gin-shop all along the street, and found that the woman had been in nearly all of them. At length, in the twenty-eighth public house that she visited, which was kept by a "little widow," she discovered the object of her search lolling on the floor in beastly drunkenness. "And the widow?" Oh, she was one to move your heart. She wore the sweetest little widow's cap; on her collar she had fastened a touching memorial portrait pin, and on her little white hand was her marriage ring.

But what did I see! The landlady just in the act of pouring out a glass of gin, but with the bottle suspended as she watched a dirty woman with red paper flowers for sale, reaching down in her dirty under apron pocket for a half crown, while the drunken wife was drawing off her wedding ring to pawn it for drink. I told the landlady that the woman needed no more drink, but that she should help me get her ready to go home. And the little widow was so polite.

"Oh, yes, as it was madam she could take the lady up to her room and wash her and comb her hair there."

But the young wife and mother was too stupid to go, so the landlady brought down a pretty bowl and a towel to Miss Coles. But she told the little widow publican to wash the half insensible woman herself, for it had been the gin she had sold her that had brought her to this miserable condition. After the face was washed, with the aid of the cabman, and the disappointed paper flower woman, they got the mother and her child into the cab, and Miss Coles took her to her husband.

Compensate the little widow! Had she a human heart that she could see a mother make herself utterly incapable of taking care of her nursing babe? Ah, I have seen sights on the streets of London that make me shudder, and wonder whether people on earth do not become veritable demons. To-day I saw in a public house window a placard, and I thought how many petitions had gone up from sincere hearts to the great King of kings, against Rum's confiscation of soul and body. But England is fast escaping the Rum fiend. In looking over the temperance history of the past sixty years one can trace a great change for the better. God is dividing a way through this blood red sea of iniquity, and she shall escape at last from the mighty evil which pursues her. E. CRAFT COBERN.

"The Great Petition Against Confiscation!"

TEMPERANCE TEMPLE ITEMS.

MATILDA B. CARSE.

It is with sorrow inexpressible that we are again called to announce the death of one of our stockholders and a trustee of the Temple. Surely death loved a shining mark when he ruthlessly struck down in the prime of his power and in the autumn ripeness of a noble life, Clinton B. Fisk. It is a comfort to think, however, that the life that was so beautifully rounded here, has expanded into a glory and beauty in the presence of his Saviour that our most exalted imaginings cannot comprehend. We would not dare call him back, if we could. Let us be grateful that earth has been enriched for three score years with such a life. General Fisk was among the first to subscribe for stock in the Temple, of which he held $5,000 worth. From the earliest inception of the project he has stood by it unflinchingly, having full faith that it would be finally accomplished.

Two other noble men who did what they could to help the undertaking, and were stockholders in the Temple, have also lately passed to their reward. Mr. B. F. Sturtevant, of Jamaica Plain, Mass., and Mr. James B. Potter, of Boston, Mass. Within a year five stockholders in the Temple have passed away. We feel assured that from the glory of the unseen Temple these good men will look down and rejoice that they were enabled to give a helping hand to a project that means so much of good to the world.

Miss Frances E. Willard, en route to Nebraska, writes as follows: "Mother, Anna Gordon and I, each wish to give $1 towards that $100 for our beloved Mrs. Judge Thompson, of Hillsboro, Ohio. I am glad the movement for a tablet in recognition of her historic relation to our work began away out West. It was like Rocky Mountain air to inspire so true a thought. Let us hurry up the balance. How many more dollars do you need?" We need $94 more. The fund has just started. We hope unions and individuals who feel it would be a privilege to give to this fund, will "hurry up" as Miss Willard suggests. The loving eyes may close forever, and the wasted hands be folded in their last repose, before the desired amount is raised, unless expedition is used. We know, for we have had it from her own lips, that it is a bitter disappointment to dear Mother Thompson, that failing fortune has prevented her from sending $100 towards the building fund of the Temple—in the erection of which she is most deeply interested. Mrs. A. A. Dunn sends $1 for the W. C. T. U. of Linden, Cal., for the purpose, she says, "of engraving Mrs. Thompson's name in Memorial Hall." The honored name will ever live in loving hearts, still we desire her to look upon the tribute of love when the grand Temple is completed.

The gifts from unions keep pouring in a steady stream. Mrs. Mary B. Monroe sends, on behalf of the W. C. T. U., of Akron, Ohio, $23. She wittily says: "At our meeting yesterday we pulled out the loose boards from the floor of our little temple and $23 rolled out at the lower stories. This, with what we have already sent, will make $53.50; so you see we have passed the halfway house, and as we go forward we find the grade easier." The dear women of the Phenix, R. I., W. C. T. U. have worked faithfully and with much enthusiasm to raise their pledge; they have just sent the last $25, completing their gift of $100. Mrs. S. A. Woolsey writes that they raised their last $25 by a supper at the house of one of their members, Mrs. Bowles. Forty ladies and gentlemen sat down to supper for which they paid twenty-five cents a plate. After supper the mite-boxes were opened. A dear little girl, Mabel Fenner, outdid them all; her box contained $5. At the first mite-box opening held by this union for the Temple, little Mabel was present, with her box, and it contained almost $4. If all little temperance girls would work like Mabel we would soon be able to pay for the Temple. The Fort Fairfield, Me., W. C. T. U. sends a check for $50, and pledges another $50 soon. Their secretary, Mrs. Myrtle G. Robbins, writes: "We feel desirous not only of having our names engraved in Willard Hall, but of helping on such a noble work."

Think of the women of India sending their gifts from that far-away land to help erect our beautiful Temple! The W. C. T. U. of Rangoon, Burmah, India, sends a gift of $15 through Rev. J. C. Case. The Decatur, Ill., W. C. T. U., through Mrs. Gay, sends $34.58 on their pledge of $100, making $55.25 now paid by them. The Angola, Ind., W. C T. U. sends $25 on their pledge of $100. The W. C. T. U. of Carrollton, Ky., sends $19.12 from mite-box collections. The Atlanta, Ill., W. C. T. U. sends $15 on their $100, from mite-box collections. The W. C. T. U. of Butler, Pa., must have a large membership as they send $26 for autographs, alone. Mrs. C. M. Greenlee writes that the union is deeply interested in the success of the Temple, and will raise the entire $100 as soon as possible.

"The other day," writes Mrs. H. E. Smith, president of the Adams, Mass., W. C. T. U., "it was thought best to test the union by a vote to see if they would be in favor of pledging $100 to the Temple fund. I am happy to report a unanimous one in favor, so please place the Adams W. C. T. U. on record for $100; inclosed find a check for $12.21, to add to the $30.65 already sent. If Adams W. C. T. U., numbering only about twenty members, can pledge this amount, surely there can be but few unions who could not do the same." That is very true, but we wish to remind Mrs. Smith that all presidents of unions have not her enthusiasm and ability as leaders. If they had, 1891 would see the entire capital stock of the Temple owned by the National W. C. T. U. Would that God would open the eyes and hearts of the leaders of our local unions, to the vision of what this would mean for the success of our holy cause!

VACATION SONG.

BY KATHERINE LEE BATES.

I have closed my book and hidden my slate,
And thrown my satchel across the gate,
My school is out for a season of rest,
And now for the school room I love the best.

My school lies on the meadow wide,
Where under the clover the sunbeams hide;
Where the long vines cling to the mossy bars,
And the daisies twinkle like fallen stars;

Where clusters of buttercups gild the scene,
Like showers of gold-dust thrown over the green,
And the wind's flying footsteps are traced as they pass,
By the dance of the sorrel and dip of the grass.

My lessons are written in clouds and trees,
And no one whispers, except the breeze,
That sometimes blows, from a secret place,
A stray, sweet blossom against my face.

My school-bell rings in the rippling stream
Which hides itself like a school-boy's dream,
Under a shadow and out of sight,
But laughing still for its own delight.

My schoolmates there are the birds and bees,
And the saucy squirrel, less wise than these,
For he only learns, in all the weeks,
How many chestnuts will fill his cheeks.

My teacher is patient, and never yet
A lesson of hers did I once forget;
For wonderful love do her lips impart,
And all her lessons are learned by heart.

O come! O come! or we shall be late,
And autumn will fasten the golden gate.
Of all the school rooms, in east or west,
The school of nature I love the best.

THE LOST UMBRELLA.

"Oh, mother, I've done a dreadful thing," said Elsie, coming to her mother with tears in her eyes.

"What have you done, Elsie?"

"I've lost Will's silk umbrella."

"Why, Elsie, how came you to do it?"

"I took it down town with me this morning—it sprinkled a little, you know—and I must have left it somewhere, for when I was coming home I missed it."

"And did you go back?"

"Yes, I went to every store I had been in, but I couldn't find it."

"Did Will say you might take it?"

"No, he never would let me, because he always said I would lose it. I wanted to carry it just once, it was so nice. But O, dear! I wish I hadn't."

"I am very sorry," said mother, gravely. "It is the first nice one Will ever had, and I don't know when he will have another."

"No," said Elsie, in great distress; "I'd do anything to give him another if I could. But I can't, and he'll be terribly angry with me."

"I am afraid he will," said mother, really pitying the little girl for her dread of her brother's anger. "But I guess you deserve it, dear, for taking his umbrella without leave, so you must only bear it as well as you can. We will make a few more inquiries before we tell Will."

The inquiries were made, but the umbrella had fallen into dishonest hands, and was nevermore heard of.

"You had better tell Will at once, Elsie," said mother.

"I wish you would tell him, mother."

And mother was quite willing to make the trouble as light as she could for Elsie, and began watching an opportunity for approaching Will on his best side.

"I don't think it was anything to make a great fuss over," said Will, the same evening, flinging down a book he had been reading.

"What do you mean, dear?"

"This story about a boy who lost a great prize because of another boy having burnt up some papers without knowing that they were the notes for his essay. It was a dreadful disappointment to him, of course; but when it was once done, and no help for it, what could he do but get over it the best way he could?"

"But if you try to put yourself in his place you will see that it must have required a great deal of Christian forbearance to forgive at once the boy who had done the mischief."

"Oh! a boy who amounted to anything would never think of making a fuss over what couldn't be helped."

"And a really manly, true-hearted boy would take pleasure in trying to prevent his friend from suffering too keenly over the fact of having unintentionally injured him," said mother, more seriously.

"Of course," agreed Will.

"I am glad you think so, for I am going to give you a chance of showing how a boy of that kind, a real boy, not in a story-book, can bear a little injury unintentionally done him."

"What do you mean now, mother?"

"Poor little Elsie is feeling very badly because of something which she knows will vex you, and I wish, my dear boy, that you would strive to show a spirit of brotherly kindness in the matter."

"What has she done?" asked Will.

"She has lost your silk umbrella."

A quick color flew to Will's cheek.

"I know it is a very annoying thing," went on his mother. "Elsie thinks you will be very hard on her about it, and she has a great dread of your anger. Don't you think, dear, it would be a grand thing for you to surprise her by speaking kindly about it—by forgiving her fully and freely?"

"What business had she to take it?" said Will, evidently trying to overcome a desire to speak excitedly.

"She did wrong to take it without your knowledge, and she knows it."

Just then Elsie's voice was heard in the hall, and Will arose from the piazza steps on which he had been sitting, and walked quickly around the house and out of sight.

He felt as angry as Elsie said he would. He had a great liking for the small luxuries, which were scarce in the family. The umbrella had been given him by an aunt who had visited them, and he had taken great pride in the stylishness of its oxidized silver handle, and in its slender proportions when encased in its silken cover. It had been a small joke with his sisters that he only took it out when sure it was not going to rain.

It was gone, and he knew that it would be a great relief to his vexation to pour out his anger upon Elsie, who had no business to touch his highly-prized property. He could, in fancy, see exactly how she would shrink before him, and how the tears would come to her blue eyes—just as she deserved, he declared to himself.

And then came a thought of the boy in the book who had won the victory over a sense of injury very like to this which was possessing him in his place, sure enough.

Will walked for an hour under the trees in the old orchard. Better thoughts came to him through the gathering shadows of the twilight. What a short-lived satisfaction would be in the bitter words which would rankle like thorns in his little sister's heart. What lasting sweetness in lifting from her the burden of the fear of his severe fault-finding.

"I'll wait till some day I want it then I'll ask where it is, and when she tries to tell me I'll kiss her and laugh," he said as at length he turned toward the house.

"But no, I won't. She'll keep on fretting over it till she knows I know."

"Elsie!" he called at the steps.

"What is it, Will?"

Mother raised her head in anxious attention.

"Bring me my umbrella, please."

"Oh, Will!" came in a faltering little voice, as she walked slowly toward him.

He did not wait for her to go on, but threw his arms around her with a laugh.

"Yes, you'd have a hard time to bring it, wouldn't you? I know all about it, you naughty little thing. If that's what you've been wearing such a doleful face about these few days you'd better set your mind at rest."

"Oh, Will! aren't you angry with me?"

"Not a bit."

"You dear, dear brother! I thought you'd never forgive me."

It was, as he knew it would be, a long time before Will had another silk umbrella. But it will be far longer before he will forget the satisfaction growing out of the result of the hard-fought battle with himself, a satisfaction to be tasted with every remembrance of his victory.—New York Observer.

The Still Hour.

FOR THE WEEK BEGINNING AUGUST 3, 1890.

BY REV. C. C. HARRAH.

DAILY BIBLE READING NOTES.

(Luke 15: 11-32; II Tim. 4; Titus 1-3; Philem. 1; Prov. 1.)

Sunday, 3; Luke 15: 11-32. Verse 11, How beautifully simple is the beginning of this most beautiful of all the parables! Verse 12, Sin presents itself in the younger son in the form of self-seeking. He wanted to get away from the restraint of his father, and have money in order to gratify himself with the world and its sensuous delights. Thousands of young men now are following in the footsteps of the prodigal, and will reap the same sad harvest of disappointment and degradation. Verse 29, Sin appears in the older son as self-righteousness. Many are lost by self-righteousness, who keep themselves from the practice of the usual sins which have their root in self-seeking.

Monday, 4; II Tim. 4. Verse 7, Paul had now come to the end of his life; and very soon, by the decree of the emperor Nero, he was to die the death of a martyr. By the blessed hope in Christ, he greets his approaching end with the cry of victory. Verse 21 The thoughtful interest and spirit of order which appears in the last of this chapter shows us what a well-balanced man Paul was. He was free from the spiritless materialism of those who live for this world, and he was just as free from the sickly spiritualism of weak enthusiasts. His life was intensely spiritual, practical and human.

Tuesday, 5; Titus 1. Verse 1, We should always be on our guard against so-called religious knowledge which does not belong to piety. The world is full of religious opinions which are no help to growth in the divine life. Verse 5, The object of this epistle was to give some instruction in practical godliness and some directions as to the qualifications for the ministry. Verse 15, Those who are bad themselves, judge other people by their own standard; it is impossible for them to see in others only that which is pure and unsoiled.

Wednesday, 6; Titus 2. Verse 1, How few there are who seem to have any fear that the doctrines they hold are unsound and false! The readiness to take up with new and untried opinions which many exhibit is no sign of sincere love for and loyalty to the truth, but the opposite. Verse 14, We are redeemed by Christ from all iniquity, and the aim of the redemption is that we may do and promote good works.

Thursday, 7; Titus 3. Verse 3, The memory of our own mistakes and sins should make us very patient toward others. It is all owing to the grace of God that we are not now the servants of sin, "hateful and hating one another." Verse 5, Paul never loses sight of the free grace of God as the ground of the sinner's justification. Verse 8, True preaching must be a full preaching of the gospel. Not beliefs alone, but all manner of good works must be taught.

Friday, 8; Philem. 1. Verse 5, The relation of love and sympathy into which all Christians come by their common relationship to Christ, appears in a marked way in this short letter. Verse 16, By the law of primogeniture the oldest son had rights and authority over all the rest of the children. By the death of their parents Onesimus was brought into a subjective relation to Philemon, and was an unworthy younger brother until he was reformed and saved by Christianity. It was right for him, after his conversion, to return to his family whom he had left as a prodigal. It was a brother in "the flesh" that Paul sent back to Philemon and not a slave, as is commonly supposed.

Saturday, 9; Prov. 1. Verse 1, The practical rules of life in this book make it of great value as a guide to right conduct. Verse 7, The keynote of the whole book and the foundation of good morals is "the fear of the Lord." Verse 24, Men are ruined by neglecting and despising opportunity.

THE PRAYER MEETING TOPIC.

(Giving to Objects of Benevolence. I Cor. 16: 1-3.)

1. Andrew Carnegie, the donor of the Allegheny City free library, thus states the duty of men of wealth:

"First, to set an example of modest, unostentatious living, shunning display or extravagance; to provide moderately for the legitimate wants of those dependent upon him; and, after doing so, to consider all surplus revenues which come to him simply as trust funds, which he is called upon to administer, and strictly bound as a matter of duty to administer in the manner which, in his judgment, is best calculated to produce the most beneficial results for the community—the man of wealth thus becoming the mere trustee and agent for his poorer brethren, bringing to their service his superior wisdom, experience, and ability to administer, doing for them better than they could do for themselves."

The danger to our country by the centralization of wealth would disappear if all rich men heeded these wise words. I Tim. 6: 17-19.

2. The text makes it the duty of "every one" to give "as God hath prospered him." Those are happiest and have the most certain promise of prosperity, who all through life set apart the one-tenth of their income for beneficence. Malachi 3: 8-12.

3. The plan of "special efforts" to raise money, which contemplates giving only as we are made to feel like it, by church theatricals, fairs, etc., is nowhere countenanced in the Bible. Paul's plan was to give every "first day of the week."

A QUERY

BY FLORENCE A. JONES.

O purpling grape in the vineyard,
Did the loving Giver of all,
E'er mean what He gave in blessing
Should cause men to stumble and fall?
O grain growing tall in the sunshine,
Fulfilling the dear Father's plan
Of "daily bread" for his children,
What a curse are you made by man.

O fiend that dwells in the wine cup,
He never intended that you
Should spring from the work He nourished
With the sunshine, the rain and dew.
Man plants, and God gives the increase
Of fruit and of shimmering grain,
But alas! we reap a harvest
Of poverty, sorrow and pain.

THE PEOPLE'S CHURCH.

BY ELLA B. CARTER.

One of the ecclesiastical problems of the age is how to reach the masses "The working man does not go to church," says Mr. Moody. "If the people will not come to us, we must go to them," said a great New York preacher a short time ago in his Sunday morning discourse. An editorial in a religious paper says, "There is an annual growth of the unchurched masses vastly out of proportion with that of the evangelized. Rumsellers are increasing faster than are preachers, lay missionaries and teachers combined."

In the small city in which I live, it is estimated that there are about ninety thousand people that never enter church doors. Over and over again is the bitter fact stated, and many are the measures proposed to evangelize the people. The Christian sociologist has come to the conclusion that the criminal classes are often more sinned against than sinning; that what the people want is the religion of Jesus Christ, and that our present system of church work does not reach them.

In a recent number of a new magazine for women, the woman editor writes comprehensively of a "People's Church." She gives reasons why such a church is wanted and points to the opportunity for some rich person to build a church for the people. Not that churches are wanting. "Within a certain area," she writes, "New York may be called a city of churches, but they are churches for the rich—solemn, imposing, cathedral-aisled, glass-stained, costly, munificently beneficed, elegantly pastored—God locked in, the poor locked out." All the prayer-meetings, missions, mite societies, mothers' meetings, and afternoon exhortations do not supply this want of a people's church. When the great churches are closed in summer, there is no place for the people who earn a hand-to-mouth living and who live in tenement houses, but the street.

The ideal people's church, according to this editor, should be a place where the man in a poor coat, the market woman in her old shawl, could come and go as they pleased. A place that the business man could find a resource from his struggles and temptations, and all weary and perplexed ones could find quiet and an opportunity for self-communion, a refuge and retreat where they could, "perhaps, receive a word of counsel, at least find an atmosphere of peace and restfulness." It should be always open, and she thinks there should be "a morning service of praise, a mid-day song of rejoicing, a vesper hymn of thankfulness. No word of condemnation, no word of controversy, no word of doubt, no word of assertion or denial, only unceasing love, continual and eternal recognition of human kinship and readiness to minister to any soul's need as far as it may be reached and helped. No one minister could perform its offices; its servants would have to be in a manner consecrated to its work, and they should be men and women who have suffered, ... and whose personal influence would be strong for righteousness." The concluding words of the article are: "Whom are we waiting for to build us the church? Is it a woman? Surely it is an opportunity that carries with it a two-fold blessing."

One evening, after reading the article from which I have so freely quoted, and with my mind full of the suggestion that the people's church may be built by a woman, I donned my bonnet and wrap, and a short walk from my home brought me to a plain, substantial, brick building, situated on a busy street, surrounded by saloons, second-hand furniture stores, and tenement houses, in a word, by the people. A big transparency over the front door gives the hours of meetings, and has the words, "All are welcome." The building is two story, and high up in the gable of the facade, are the words in terra cotta: Woman's Christian Temperance Union. As I pass up a flight of easy stairs, singing voices greet my ear—a chorus choir is giving a half-hour service of song. I enter a large, pleasant audience room, well lighted and well ventilated. There are many rows of painted wooden chairs, a strip of Brussels carpet on the aisles, and some more of the carpet on the platform, but there are no costly furnishings to oppress the "people." There are some mottoes on the wall, one in a conspicuous place reads, "For God and Home and Humanity." Below it hangs a handsomely illuminated copy of a pledge against intoxicants; another motto proclaims that "Jesus is mighty to save." I glance around at the audience, ah, they are here—the people—the woman in the old shawl, the pale-faced working girl, and the laboring man in his plain dress.

On the platform sit a group of women with earnest faces and calm brows. As I look at these women the words of the magazine article, "No one minister could perform its offices," recurs to my mind. To the left of these women sit a number of men, well dressed and intelligent looking—they are men who have "come to themselves" through the ministry of these women. They are called a "Reform Club." One of these men was formerly a drunken bar-tender. Another has "done time" in a penitentiary for crime committed when drunk. Another is the son of a saloon keeper. He is studying theology now, and when he shall have finished his studies he hopes to become a temperance missionary to "the people." When the little old man with the pathetic look in his face first came into these meetings, his home was broken up, and his wife estranged; there are few happier homes than is theirs to-day.

The choir pause in their singing; one of the women on the platform looks at the clock, then arises and requests the singing of a certain hymn, and now all sing a hymn with this refrain:

"Over and over, yes, deeper and deeper
My heart is pierced through with life's sorrowing cry.
But the tears of the sower and songs of the reaper Shall mingle together in joy by and by."

The singing is followed by the reading of the Bible, a woman prays, again a hymn is sung. Then the leader repeats the pledge "because it is part of our plan of work, and because there are always persons coming in here for the purpose of signing the pledge," and she adds that "the meeting is now open to any who may feel inclined to take part." The men are urged to tell their experiences "because nothing will help the men we are trying to save like your story of triumph over appetite, and we women would rather hear these narratives, than to hear Patti sing."

A grey-bearded man, who looks like Gough, gives a few words of exhortation; this man who used to lie in the gutter has now one of the finest private libraries I know. He is followed by a man who recounts that once when he was a hard drinker, and wishing for some way of escape from the thralldom of habit, there came to him a thought that there might be something in religion that might help him, and so one Sunday morning he went to a church, and a man at the door said to him, "What do you want here, you drunken sot? Get out of here or I'll have you arrested!" And those words sent him back into twenty years of debauchery, till finally he came under the influence of the work here and was saved. He pays a tribute to the tender, watchful sympathy that helped him when he was trying to do right, and he says that as he goes about his daily business he looks in the streets for a woman with a white ribbon, and when he sees one it someway helps and strengthens him.

Another man tells that as he was walking the streets cursing God after a debauch, his eye caught, through these lighted windows, the motto on the wall, "Jesus is mighty to save," and he went to his home with the words stamped on his brain as in letters of fire, "Jesus is mighty to save." He spent the night on his knees and the angel wrestled with him till the dawn, and then peace came.

All testimonies are not so exultant. There is a minor note of despair like the cry of a lost soul; it comes from an elderly man, with a very red face and a very white mustache. Once he reformed, too, and he stood for five years, but in an evil hour he was urged by a woman to take a glass of "harmless" cider, and then the demon returned and the last state was worse than the first. He believes there is absolutely no hope for him now, and he is sometimes tempted to "end it all by jumping into the river." But he still cherishes an affection for the work, and he likes to hear the old hymns. He concludes by asking, "Will they sing Number Sixty?" The hymn beginning, "Go, bury thy sorrows," is sung.

More than an hour passes in this familiar way. Then the leader arises and says some eloquent and inspiring words of hope, of love, of comfort, and again repeats the invitation to sign the pledge. Two rough-looking young fellows with bloated, brutal faces go forward and sign their names. Then the meeting is dismissed.

As I walk slowly homeward I have some curious thoughts. The "people's church," the woman's church, is it already in existence? At one of these meetings, I once heard Dr. William Hayes Ward, of the Independent, say words like these, "You are truly a church, since church means gathering; and you are doing a real apostolic work, as fishers of men; and if you wanted to celebrate here the Lord's supper, I can see no reason why you should not do so." Now these modest women workers would greatly deprecate being called a church, they are simply doing one of the lines of work laid down by their association, by holding unsectarian gospel temperance meetings. But I believe their method of work, with its element of womanliness to give to it completeness, is going to solve the problem of reaching the unevangelized people.

When the Bastile fell, the Duke of Liancourt carried the news to the king at Versailles. "Why," said the poor weak king, "that is a revolt." "Sire," answered Liancourt, "it is not a revolt—it is a revolution." When a band of women started a Crusade at Hillsboro, Ohio, some sixteen years ago, it was more than a revolt, it was an act destined to work a revolution in methods of work to reach the mass of the people.

WORDS TO THE WISE—FALLING INTO LINE.

BY ABBY MORTON DIAZ.

It has been shown that conduct is but the appearance of the reality which lies back of it—character; and that what we would have appear in conduct must be implanted in this reality. Many think lightly of human agency as affecting character, trusting all to the influences of the Holy Spirit. Just here is the point now to be presented. While it is true that the movings of the spirit are, must be, in the direction of the good, of truth, of love, of justice, of humility, and away from selfhood, yet we should consider that as human influences do have their effect, they should not act in opposition to these influences, as is often the case, but strictly in line with them. On the material plane we recognize this necessity of acting with the moving power. For sailing our ships, for running our machinery, for steam and other transportation, for sending telegrams, and, indeed, for all our various needs and appliances we put ourselves in line with the acting forces. The opposite course would be folly, we may say folly inconceivable. We do not commit it. To illustrate, we do not try to sail against the wind, or to build our houses at variance with the force of gravitation.

In the matter of character forming is often practiced just this kind of folly. There are those whose family management does not disdain the use of prevarications, insincerity, deceit, underhandedness; whose parental rule exhibits ill-temper or harshness or injustice, or encourages selfhood by a weak indulgence; there are families, plenty of them, who are self-centered, appropriating each to itself comforts and luxuries, and advantages and opportunities; families in which wealth, social position and political preferment are held to be the things best worth striving for. All such set themselves in opposition to the action of the divine forces, and consequently are working at terrible disadvantage.

And further, this same can be said of those who make affluence a reason for bringing up children to idleness, to just "sag along" with the least possible exertion. According to the divine order as seen in nature, every tree, plant and shrub must develop its faculties, must make the best of itself, must do something, must work; and this not only for its own good but for good outside of self. This same order is the divine order for humanity. Families, therefore, which allow their children to grow to maturity with no settled purpose of work and of making the best of themselves for their own sake and for the advantage of others, all such are running counter to the divine plan, a plan surely known by its manifestations in nature, "for the invisible things of Him * * * are clearly seen being perceived by the things which are made." It may be added that all who run counter to, or deviate from the divine plan thus shown forth are living in sin, according to the literal meaning of the word, which is "a coming short," "a failure to reach the mark."

The object of these words is to arouse to a sense of responsibility for character (and thus for conduct) any who may need such arousing, and to suggest to all a possible lack of wisdom in methods adopted. The next "Words" will present some practical methods.

THE CENSUS OF AMERICAN CITIES.

Whether contact of man with man breeds vice, may be an open question, but certainly dense populations afford ambush for criminals and cover for crime. Every great city has its lagoons skirted with rumshops, gambling houses and brothels, where decayed manhood and putrifying womanhood send out their deadly miasm to corrupt the children of the just and the unjust. In the same localities are the jungles of filth and want where all poverty settles, where the lazy come to lounge and thieves to hide. There hunger grinds its teeth in the hydrophobia of anarchy. Hence all governments, and particularly those of representative form, find their chief sources of peril in their great cities.

All governments are representative, for, on occasion "the people" make themselves felt—if not in parliament then in the mob. The incoming census returns are big with meaning and with warning to statesman and sociologist. The tendency of humanity to gravitate to cities is not peculiar to the great centers of population. The largest percentage of increase has been in cities of second and third class, located in agricultural and mining regions. Omaha, in 1880, had 30,709; in the decade it has doubled twice, now having 134,742. Lincoln and Beatrice have made greater proportionate gains, the former having 13,000 in 1890 as against 5,500 in 1880, while the latter has grown from 2,447 to 13,428. Sioux Falls, Dak., has kept pace, rising from 2,000 to 12,000 in the same time. Minneapolis and St. Paul have each been multiplied by three; had they quarreled less, haply they had grown more! Kansas City and St. Joseph have respectively gained two hundred and fifty per cent. A half-dozen cities each in Michigan, Wisconsin and Indiana have doubled their numbers. Ambitious little Duluth, already disputing with Milwaukee and Chicago the regnancy of the great lake region and its commerce, has grown from 4,000 to 40,000.

The cities of prohibition Kansas and Iowa have not fallen behind. Des Moines has more than doubled, Sioux City has grown from 7,000 to 33,000, and Wichita from 4,000 to 24,000. They furnish the resting places of rebellion against law and order.

In the slow-going East dusky Pittsburg has forged ahead a hundred thousand, and when she annexes 110,000 more in suburban Alleghany City, Boston and St. Louis will do well to look after their figures. Everywhere north of the Potomac and Ohio, city growth far surpasses rural growth. Nor is it wholly limited to the north; Chattanooga and Birmingham have not been distanced anywhere. The names associated with these multiplying figures are also associated with accounts of great revenue from vice and reports of startling crimes. So true is this that many moral but expedient loving persons look upon a flourishing trade in sin as not only incident but immanent to growth, and permit if they do not encourage it, forgetting that less bulk and better quality would be truer gain.

"Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where cities grow, while men decay."

What is the lesson of this overgrowth of town as compared with country population?

Faults and difficulties of municipal government have increased with this growth of population. Sewers have not enlarged proportionately. Streets have not widened, and police officers have not risen to the requirements of good order. The common type of charter is calculated to prevent any officer from doing much harm; the result is that no officer does much good. Authority is much divided, and responsibility is subdivided, until no one feels its weight, and the suffering citizen searches long and often vainly for the "proper authority."

Brooklyn led in the idea that cities, like business corporations, need a man at the head with great executive scope and responsibility. Its charter of 1882 vests in the mayor large appointing power independent of the confirmation of the council. He creates the heads of departments, and must answer for their efficiency. It has so far worked improvement, and New York, Philadelphia and Boston have revised their charters in the same direction. It has seemed to keep alive interest in the choice of mayor and to take city elections out of party politics, which is great gain. Nevertheless, it is a step away from "government of the people, by the people, for the people," and is less American in theory than the form of municipal government obtaining in Germany. Every ward elects a member to the city council; that body chooses, outside itself, experts in street cleaning, water sanitation and all other departments, as executive officers. They also choose advisory members of the council among prominent citizens who are obliged, under severe penalty, to serve, whether or not, like American prominent citizens, they are too busy for office.

The "independent city" is a growing menace to the commonwealth. The state, steadying itself upon its broad foundations in the loyal, moral citizenship of the rural districts must keep hand upon the cities. Local option is unsafe and insufficient where great questions of morality or public welfare are involved, as in the disposition of the liquor traffic. Better than a grog shop at every cross-road it unquestionably is, but a broad spirit of patriotism, the real love of country, should move the farmer to aid by his vote the redemption of the city. Hence, local option is too local for him, and too optional for the corrupt mass of city voters, who are crowding and smothering the very heart of our national life. Relief must come from ranch and cornfield. Which shall predominate in American politics, the high-minded American farmer, or the low-born foreign rumseller?

THE COUNTRY WEEK.

No more beneficent philanthropy is known to us than the many-sided effort to secure an outing in the country for tenement-house dwellers—especially babies with their mothers, and puny children. This work was started in New York by the Tribune, we believe, and has extended to nearly every city in the country. It takes various names, as "Country-Week," "Working-Girls' Vacations," "Fresh Air," and the like, all having for their object, taking out from the hot, polluted city to the pure air of the country those who most need the change and could never have it unaided.

In Chicago this work has been carried on under different departments, the one which seems most active now is the Chicago Daily News Country Week. For three years this paper has carried on this work by paying its executive expenses which last year amounted to $1,631 and acting as almoner for those who wish to invest money in giving the youngsters and their mothers a fortnight of rest, good air and good food in the country. Every two dollars contributed takes one tired mother or puny child to the country. During July and August of last year, over a thousand mothers and babes, boys and girls, were thus permitted to have a fortnight of real country life.

Many pathetic instances occurred; for example: Louise, a little German girl, stood for a long time intently watching for the first time, a field of waving corn, then she sat down, sobbing and crying as though her heart would break. Her new friends tried to pacify her, but for some time could not discover the cause of her tears. At last she stammered out: "Oh, it's so pretty and mamma never saw it!" Her mother had died the week before. Often the ludicrous mingles with the pathetic, as when a starved looking child stood with open eyes and mouth staring at the broad expanses of prairie, and exclaimed, "I never seed enough of anythin' at wonct afore." Another little one was greatly astonished the first time she saw cows milked, saying, "I never knowed before where milk comes from."

No one who has not visited the tenement houses from which these children are taken can imagine what a heaven the country seems to them. Fresh air, nutritious food and all the physical good resulting from them, do not measure the benefits resulting from Country Week. Heart and soul are as much refreshed as the body is. When these children grow up the memory of the delights of Country Week will stay by them, and make them more ready than their parents are to leave the crowded city and seek work where better conditions of life are possible.

Nor are the children the only ones benefited; this charity touches the hearts of city folk and country folk alike with kindly sympathy, leading those in town to give freely to take the children into the country, and those in the country to open their hearts and homes to the little waifs. Thus far this year the city folks have outstripped their country brothers in helping on this good work. The intense heat has made them appreciate the suffering there must be in crowded quarters of the city, and feel ready to help.

And the children are eager to go. Before the first party was sent out, two little tots came to the News office, bag and baggage, and insisted on going at once. "It's summer, isn't it?" queried the youngest one, and with the thermometer up among the 90's it could not be denied that summer had come with a vengeance. Fifteen hundred children are already registered to go, as soon as country friends are ready to receive them. And these are carefully selected; no child with a contagious disease is sent out; none whom you may not safely receive into your homes in His name. They are selected from the children of the day nurseries, the free kindergartens, the mission schools, the great throng of needy children—selected because of their great need of just the help the Country Week will bring them.

Are there not within an hundred fifty miles of Chicago a thousand country homes which will gladly open to these, Christ's little ones, or to their tired mothers? To you is the promise: "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, ye did it unto Me." Two years ago we made a similar appeal in behalf of working girls, and the response was most generous. Let it be so now, and let it be immediate.

We pass along our W. C. T. U. ranks the following directions:

First—Make a personal canvass among your neighbors on farms or in village homes, and persuade as many as you can to invite—

Two little children; or a mother and infant; or a couple of working-girls to each home for a two weeks' visit.

Second—Send to the Chicago Daily News the names and post-office addresses of those who invite these Country-Weekers—specifying particularly what class and number of guests are to go to each home. State, also, the date when the guests are to be sent and to what railroad station. The date should not be less than one week after the list is sent, so as to allow time for all necessary arrangements.

Third—Meet the guests at the station on the day fixed and see that they get to the houses of their hosts.

Fourth—Notify the Daily News at least four days before the date of return, so that arrangements may be made for the care of the party in Chicago. Unless otherwise specified two weeks is understood to be the period of the visit.

Fifth—See that the party is put safely on the train at the right time on the day of return, and give the conductor the return tickets. Railroad officials are instructed to pay special attention to the Country Week parties.

Meanwhile, let the city keep up its end of the work by supplying funds, remembering that each two dollars contributed gives two weeks country life to one to whom it means health and strength, perhaps the preservation of life. We notice Fresh Air Fund boxes in the restaurants, and hope no one will eat there without dropping in something to carry on this good work.

MEETING OF THE DIRECTORS OF THE W. T. P. A.

The regular meeting was Wednesday, July 9; there not being a quorum present, it was adjourned for one week. At this time the meeting was held and reports of officers received. These showed that the entire amount of stock is sold and that there has been call for thousands of dollars more. We have been obliged to return $1,500 sent us for stock because there was no more for sale. Meanwhile profitable openings for business have had to be disregarded because of lack of capital. All this proves the wisdom of our president, Mrs. Carse, in recommending an increase of stock to $100,000. It was increased to only $75,000 with the result just stated. We trust that at the approaching annual meeting in October the desired increase will be voted.

Another proof of the wisdom of Mrs. Carse and the resident stockholders, is given in the matter of securing a suburban site for our plant; three years ago we were very desirous of doing this, and secured the refusal of a site admirably adapted to our purpose, at $1,000 an acre. But at Nashville the out of town stockholders voted it down, the plea being that our work must be kept in the city as an impressive object lesson. Consequently it has been so kept here and our rent has continually piled up. Meanwhile the site we chose has been brought by annexation within the city limits, and cannot be bought for less than $5,000 an acre. This matter of securing a permanent site for our plant must come before our stockholders' meeting in October, and we sincerely hope all will come prepared to consider it from the standpoint of consecrated business sense instead of from a sentimental point of view.

The new press for which we are so anxiously waiting is not yet near completion, but from what is done upon it we feel that it will be well worth waiting for.

THE UNION SIGNAL subscriptions are keeping up well for this time of year, thanks to the offer of Miss Willard's picture. As every one knows this is the "dry" season in newspaperdom; The Young Crusader is still run at a loss, though a less loss than this time last year; the Oak and Ivy Leaf holds her own, paying her own bills as she has always done. We are very sorry to chronicle the discontinuance of Der Deutsch Amerikaner. This was decided upon at the last meeting of the board and we prepared an announcement of it and the reasons therefor at that time. But some of its especial friends besought us to give it a little longer trial, so the announcement was not then published. But the one more trial resulted, as so many previous ones had done, and most reluctantly we were obliged to acknowledge ourselves baffled in all our efforts to give the Germans a temperance paper in their own tongue. They will not support it and we do not feel justified any longer in running it at a loss. It pains us exceedingly to thus give up a project which was very near our heart, and for whose success we have worked so hard, but there seems to be no other way.

The publication department has done a large amount of work during the quarter, especially in printing new leaflets and other matter for ourselves.

Among the books published for other parties during the quarter have been the "American Law Directory," a work of over 800 pages; "Mothers' Help and Child's Friend," by Mrs. Le Favre; "Calvinism Contrary to God's Word and Man's Moral Nature," by Rev. D. F. Harris; "Faith, and Other Poems," by Ellen E. Hebron; "L'Ora Quéta," a book of sketches and poems by Ada Metcalfe; two editions of Mrs. Cassel's "White Ribbon Vibrations," and a number of commercial catalogues of considerable dimensions, for which line of work we have unusual facilities.

AT LAKE BLUFF SCHOOL OF METHODS.

This school, in charge of Miss Esther Pugh, developed some new and interesting features. First was the meeting for the little people, conducted by Mrs. Addie Northam Fields. It was held from eight to half past eight every morning, and included a Bible and a scientific temperance lesson. Mrs. Helen G. Rice assisted in these meetings; with two such leaders it goes without saying that the little people were interested and benefited.

The hour daily devoted to Bible study under Mrs. Lucy Rider Meyer and Mrs. Esther Pritchard, editor of the Friends' Missionary Advocate, proved wonderfully helpful—a spiritual uplift to all participating. Mrs. Pritchard is a woman of keen, incisive mind, thorough culture, not alone in the schools but by the Spirit, and has made the Word her life study. She was therefore able to open to us the Scriptures in a remarkably helpful way. Mrs. Pritchard was one of the original Crusaders, and though her labors in other directions have taken her out of direct W. C. T. U. work, she has never lost the Crusade fire. At the earnest solicitation of Miss Mollie Hay and Miss Palmer, she has promised to attend the Indiana state convention; her presence there or anywhere is a benediction.

The four lectures or lessons on "Economic Temperance," in charge of Prof. Ida Evans, showed thorough research and furnished material for many lectures. She went to the bottom of things and packed in small compass the leading facts in her department of study. Dr. Boole, of New York, gave a lecture in this course on "The Liquor Traffic from a Business Man's Point of View," which was so full of good points that he was accorded fifteen minutes over his hour to complete it.

In scientific temperance the most notable lectures were those of Dr. Jessie Brown Dodds and Prof. Charles Ford, both of Chicago. Dr. Dodds' topic was the "Effects of Alcohol on the Stomach, Liver and Kidneys;" she illustrated it not only by charts, but also by eight or ten original drawings, which were very valuable. As one lady well versed in the subject said: "Other lecturers and books have told us what alcohol does to these organs, nobody before ever made so plain to me how it does it." We are thankful that Chicago and the medical profession have a woman so thoroughly prepared by years of study and hospital practice to discuss these questions, as she is, and one who believes firmly in non-alcoholic medication.

Professor Ford's topic was the effect of alcohol on the nervous system. He treated his subject in a new and interesting way, eliciting warm applause from his audience and an invitation from Mrs. East to deliver the same lecture at Nashville, Tenn. Professor Ford, while doing faithfully the hard work of principal of the Calhoun School, Chicago, finds time during vacations for much good temperance work, especially in connection with Teachers' Institutes. He is also the heart of the movement to placard street cars with telling temperance statistics.

The presence of Mrs. Helen G. Rice, National superintendent of juvenile work, added very greatly to the efficiency of the school. She gave instruction in juvenile and Sabbath-school methods besides aiding greatly in other departments.

Mrs. Ada H. Kepley was prevented from attending and taking up her departments, foreign work and purity in literature and art, by the serious illness of her husband. Mrs. Susan Fessenden, National superintendent of franchise, being present, was requested to occupy the time devoted to foreign work in giving methods of work in her own department. This she did very acceptably. Here are some of the methods she presented: 1. Educate the women. As a rule only very old, very young, or very bad men are opposed to woman suffrage. 2. Educate the children. 3. Distribute literature. 4. Petition every session of legislature for the ballot.

Mrs. Kepley's other department, purity in literature and art, was taken up and elicited so much of interest that we were requested to embody the facts presented in an editorial, which we shall soon do.

A model union brought out many capital points, its reports suggesting many methods of work not distinctly discussed in the school. It is impossible to take up all of our forty departments in any one school. Model unions and other means of suggesting methods in those we cannot otherwise notice, are of great value.

Physical and vocal culture received attention, Miss Lydia J. Newcomb, of Michigan, giving a drill in the school on its opening day, and having a class every afternoon. She was called in at the last moment to fill the vacancy occasioned by the inability of Mrs. Curry of Boston, to fulfill her engagement, but came to the rescue with the true W. C. T. U. spirit, and did the work admirably. We are glad to note increased attention paid to physical culture in the Schools of Method all over the country.

On the afternoon or Children's Day, the little people, their big brothers and sisters, and parents as well, gathered in the Tabernacle to hear Mrs. Rice and Anna Gordon talk to the children. The children also did their part, not only by listening in delighted silence—as how could they help it?—but by singing and marching with flying banners. As they marched out so proudly, keeping step to their own voices repeating rhythmically: "The saloon, the saloon, the saloon must go," all felt that the tread of their oncoming feet was one of the surest signs of its going.

In planning work for next year, it was decided to make the W. C. T. U. School of Methods distinct as to its management and its finances. This was done, not, as one of the Chicago dailies asserts, because the W. C. T. U. does not wish to be associated with Prohibitionists, but because all felt that centering the management of the School of Methods in the W. C. T. U. would increase its efficiency, give it a stronger hold on the hearts of our women, and allow of better methods of advertising it than have hitherto been practiced. It still remains a part of the Lake Bluff Convocation, and we shall work as heartily as ever with our brothers, many of whom are always members of our school.

Under the new arrangement Miss Esther Pugh was elected president of the W. C. T. U. School of Methods, Mrs. C. B. Buell, first vice-president; Mrs. Addie Northam Field, Enfield, Ill., corresponding secretary; Miss Lois Russell, Eau Claire, Wis., recording secretary, and Miss Mollie Hay, Indianapolis, treasurer. These ladies have already commenced planning for next year's work.

STATE AND NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF PRAYER FOR CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS.

There has just been organized in Nebraska an association with this title. Its object is to secure the hearty sympathy and coöperation of Christians in obtaining Constitutional Amendments, state and National. It aims to unite faith and works—the giving of dollars, each one backed by prayer. The association is indorsed by the W. C. T. U. of Nebraska, the Amendment Committees and prominent citizens within and without that state. Its plan is very practical as explained in the following appeal for which we ask immediate and favorable attention:

To all the good people throughout the United States: Dear Brethren in Christ Jesus—Believing that we are a sisterhood of states as well as of churches, and that "united we stand, divided we fall," believing that not only in the state of Nebraska, but throughout our entire Union—our Sabbath, the Bible in our schools, our blessed religion, the sanctity of the home, and our every institution, ecclesiastic, civil, American, as founded and nurtured by a patriotic ancestry, is in peril, resulting from the traffic in rum—the 220,000 schools of anarchy, lawlessness, and crime, we do therefore supplicate Heaven night and day, that you will come to the help of the Lord against the mighty.

We desire to secure 100,000 members to this association immediately at $1 each. This will distribute the burden, and give us $100,000 to successfully operate the campaign. Will every church in the land, and every local W. C. T. U. as soon as this call reaches you, appoint active committee workers to canvass for membership to this association. Those so doing shall be regarded workers for the Prohibitory Amendment in Nebraska.

Please send names of members by postoffices, and members in aggregate to our treasurer and secretary, Mr. H. E. George, and Jennie F. Holmes, 128 Burr Block, Lincoln, Neb., who will record names of members in our state register, and credit all moneys.

Our Book Table.

THE LAWS OF HEREDITY, by George Williamson, M. D. Published by Charles H. Kerr & Co., 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.

While the book contains some good things, as a whole it is disappointing. Its treatment of the subject seems to us unscientific and partial, and its aim not so much to show the laws of heredity as to bolster up materialism. Its deductions are based largely upon the assumption, for it is nothing more, that hereditary influence descends through the mother alone, which is contrary to both science and experience. The examples given of great men who inherit the traits of their mothers are undoubtedly true, but we can match them every one by cases of great women who plainly inherit the traits of their fathers.

Again, the author makes much of the influence of the body over the soul, but utterly ignores the formative power of the soul over the body. He repeatedly uses the figure of a mold into which molten gold is poured which must conform to the shape of its mold, be this shape angel or demon, to illustrate the relation of soul and body. While it is undoubtedly true that the human mold has much influence in shaping the gold within, we believe the gold shapes its mold as distinctly as it is shaped by it.

It is refreshing to read that Miss Belasco, of Roumania, the young law student in Paris, who has just taken her degree, after obtaining the highest place in the examination, intends to return to her own country that she may practice law at Bucharest, confining herself entirely to the cases of poor women who cannot pay for legal counsel. This seems to be the first instance on record where a lawyer has taken a decision of this charitable sort. Are there not some brother lawyers who could profitably "go and do likewise?"

The W. C. T. U. of Hampden county, Massachusetts, has established at South Hadley Falls, an Industrial Home for inebriate and fallen women, and have given it the name of Frances E. Willard Industrial Home. About thirteen hundred dollars have been received in gifts from different unions and individuals in the county, which is sufficient to carry on the work for a year. The estate has been hired of a member of the W. C. T. U. and contains a house of twelve rooms, with sufficient grounds to make it a desirable place for such an institution.

The Nashville, Tenn., W. C. T. U. is instant in season and out of season, continually surprising friends and foes by some new form of efficient work. Its latest scheme is hiring a column of the daily paper having the largest circulation in the city, The Nashville Banner, and filling it every day with fresh, spicy, temperance matter. Keeping it thus filled is no slight work, but is admirably done by the committee of ladies, with Mrs. Judge East at its head. So attractive has this feature proved that fifteen hundred subscriptions have been given to the paper since the ladies commenced this work, and because of it. Mrs. East attended the Lake Bluff School of Methods, and sent four long letters from there to the Banner. Her presence in the school and her piquant vivacity were greatly enjoyed there.

NEW MEXICO.

ANNUAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION.

The fifth annual meeting of the New Mexico W. C. T. U. was held in the M. E. Church in Silver City, June 12 and 13. No pains had been spared by the local W. C. T. U. to provide for the comfort and pleasure of visitors and delegates, causing all to feel a genuine home welcome. The free reading room was thrown open on the evening of the 11th, for a reception; refreshments were served, and the visitors were highly entertained. This institution was established in 1889 by the coöperation of the Silver City W. C. T. U. and Temperance League; it is supported by entertainments and is kept open daily till 10 p. m., and contains all the leading periodicals, magazines and dailies, including THE UNION SIGNAL and other temperance journals.

The convention was called to order promptly, four of the general officers responding to the roll-call. The territory was well represented by delegates from local unions. The program was satisfactorily carried out and a deep and growing interest was manifest throughout all the sessions.

An instructive paper on "The Importance of Press Work," by Mrs. Flora Ellice Stevens, superintendent of press work, contained many good and practical suggestions as to the best methods of winning for our cause the united and continued influence of the local press.

On the evening of the 12th, an address of welcome was given by Mrs. O. S. Warren, one of the most successful business women of Silver City, responded to by well chosen words from Mrs. L. A. Collings, former territorial president.

The annual address of the president, Mrs. M. C. Raynolds, showed a deep knowledge of the work and was listened to with marked interest. Reports from the various departments were encouraging, showing a growth and development in all lines of work.

On the evening of the 13th, a paper by Mrs. Ada M. Jarrett, on "Equal Franchise" was greeted with applause and bouquets of flowers from a crowded house, this being the first introduction of the subject by the territorial W.C. T. U. The department of franchise was added to our work with Mrs. Jarrett as superintendent. The theme of "Scientific Instruction" as presented by Mrs. Jackson, was listened to with great interest. One of the most important lines of work added is that of the lecture department; a permanent fund to be established and set aside for the employment of speakers under the management of the president and corresponding secretary. We trust and fully believe that God in His goodness will influence some kind, generous souls to endow this fund and to "cast bread upon the waters" to return perhaps after many days in the uplifting of humanity in this western field.

Many strong resolutions were adopted, and although the youngest child of the National, we feel confident there are none more loyal than the W. C. T. U. of New Mexico, as the following will testify:

Resolved, That we express our admiration of the National society in following its convictions of duty, and that we assure it of our unswerving loyalty and deep affection.

Our territorial W. C. T. U. follows its convictions also in the following:

Resolved, That we favor woman suffrage and ask for the ballot, with an educational qualification, as necessary to a wise use of the same, and as a weapon of home protection and the putting down of giant evils.

Four new unions were added to our number during the year, making fifteen in all, with an aggregate membership of five hundred. Regular work is represented in eighteen departments successfully carried on. The election of officers resulted as follows: President, Mrs. M. C. Raynolds; corresponding secretary, Mrs. M. J. Borden; recording secretary, Mrs. M. M. Watson; treasurer, Mrs. Ella Lucas; vice-president at large, Mrs. L. A. Collings. Adjourned to meet in Las Vegas or Santa Fé as the executive committee may decide.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

ANNUAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION.

Our third annual convention met at Muskogee, May 21 and 22, 1890, was called to order by Mrs. Stapler, territorial president. On motion, Mrs. Acheson, president of the Texas W. C. T. U., was made a delegate. Delegates present were Mrs. Fite, Mrs. Thompson and Miss Lobe, of Tahlequah, Miss Reed, of Atoka, Mrs. Harsha, Bolander, Long and Spaulding, of Muskogee union.

The report of the treasurer, Mrs. Alberty, was read and adopted, also the report of the superintendent of juvenile work, Mrs. Watson. The superintendent of work among the colored people, Mrs. Casey, sent in a report by Mrs. Harsha. She was re-appointed, and plans were discussed for aiding her in her work. A report of the corresponding secretary, Mrs. Fuller, was read by Mrs. Thompson, Mrs. Fuller being detained at home by sickness. The report of the national organizer, Mrs. Murrow, was read by Miss Reed. Her invitation to the convention to meet at Atoka next year was accepted. A report from the Muskogee union by Mrs. Harsha was a good one. The statement that it contemplated erecting a free reading-room in the near future elicited the hearty approbation and sympathy of the whole convention.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: Mrs. J. L. Stapler was reëlected president unanimously; vice-president, Mrs. Ed. Sheppard; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Fite; recording secretary, Mrs. Spaulding; treasurer, Mrs. Alberty; superintendent of evangelistic work, Mrs. J. S. Murrow; superintendent of juvenile work, Mrs. M. T. Watson; superintendent of prison work, Mrs. Mitchell; superintendent of Y's, Miss Reed, of Atoka. Delegates elected to the National Convention to be held at Atlanta, Ga., were Mrs. Murrow and Mrs. Fuller; alternates, Mrs. Butler and Mrs. Sheppard.

Reports of committees on plans of work and resolutions were read and adopted.

The following are the resolutions adopted:

Resolved, That our convention feel deeply the need of more consecration and a deeper earnestness and zeal for the work, and urge upon our members and unions a united petition for help to drive the liquor traffic from our territory and nation.

Resolved, That we indorse the National W. C. T. U. Believing that Miss Willard has the best interests of the work at heart, it is due her as well as the National to be co-workers with them for National Prohibition.

Resolved, Believing that taxation without representation is tyranny, we, your committee, beg leave to reiterate the plank in our constitution, giving equal rights to all regardless of sex. As God created them male and female, equal in every respect, they should have equal rights.

Resolved, That we indorse the Temperance Temple, and recommend that each union take up the Temple work, distributing mite-boxes, getting up Baby Bands, etc. We also recommend the free use of temperance literature by all the unions, for we think it is one of the greatest helps in the W. C. T. U. work.

Resolved, That we tender thanks to our Indian Agent, Dr. Leo. E. Bennett, for his cordial co-operation and help. Also we tender the heartfelt thanks of the whole convention to the Muskogee Phœnix and Brother in Red for their kindness in printing notices, tickets, and use of paper for temperance purposes. To C. W. Garrett, for his generous donation of a lot for a reading room to Muskogee union. To Mrs. Acheson for her kindly assistance and words of encouragement in our new work. To the ministers, Rev. Austin and Crosby, for sympathy and help, to the M. E. pastor for use of his church, to the choir and organist for the beautiful and appropriate music rendered, also to the sexton for ringing bell and lighting church.

Convention adjourned to meet at Atoka, in May, 1891.

The evening exercises were very entertaining, consisting of address and response of welcome, president's address, solo by Mrs. Sheppard and question-box, conducted by Mrs. Acheson. A recitation by Miss Gertrude Marcum was greatly admired. An address by Mrs. Acheson, recitations by Misses Simpson and Wier and an essay by Miss Alice Callahan filled up the time on the second evening very pleasantly and profitably. The music by the choir was appropriate and highly appreciated. At the close of the evening's entertainment pledge cards were circulated and twenty-one signatures were procured.

We hope some good has been done and that we have gained much strength and zeal for the work. May we all redouble our efforts and prayers for the glorious cause.

MICHIGAN.

ETCHINGS.

Was there ever such a paper as THE UNION SIGNAL? News, good, readable news, from Maine to California. How can a live American woman keep abreast with the times without it? This is my first thought. I found after my report of the state convention had gone to the printer, I had omitted some very important things. We have a lecturer on physical culture, Miss L. J. Newcomb, and she gave us one afternoon a plain, practical talk on correct dress and breathing, telling us many things we ought to know, closing with an especially fine exhibition of Delsarte gymnastics, the Indian club swinging being given at the Y meeting.

Then we raised a sum for Nebraska as a state, the unions to give besides, and voted our Mrs. A. S. Benjamin to be the speaker we would send for the month of September to that state. As the letters lie before me I am reminded that we were glad to give to the music-box for Jennie Casseday's National birthday gift. Flower mission day has come and gone, and has been more generally observed than heretofore, if possible, and certainly "our shut-in one" is given to see much of the results of her labors. The day was observed at Adrian and Ionia; the immense amount of work at both these places must result in good. Several hundred bouquets had to be provided for at Ionia. Full accounts of the day have come to me, one from Marquette. The W. C. T. U. of the twelfth district held their first service of this kind at the new state house of correction and branch of the state prison in the upper peninsula, Sunday, June 8. The president, Mrs. R. A. Campbell, sent a letter of greeting, asking, "in the name of the mothers, God's blessing on our boys in prison as He only can help and comfort in time of trouble." There are seventy-six inmates of the prison; to each was given the bouquet and card, and a quantity of White Cross leaflets and other Christian reading. The warden, Mr. Thompson, assisted us in every possible way; we had songs by children and two addresses. One address was by Mrs. Molloy, of Ishpeming, on "The Midnight Friend," a plain, effective talk, after which the warden addressed the men and asked for us a vote of thanks, which they gave most heartily.

At Jackson, June 9 was a day of unusual interest this year. The chapel platform was a bower of flowers. The prison choir rendered fine music; after a few words by Mrs. Newman, Mrs. Brown, district president, offered prayer, then Dr. Anna Shaw was introduced; words fail to tell the deep pathos and earnestness of her words. That some were helped we know, for at evening prayer-meeting to many of the texts given were added expressions of thankfulness for the words spoken and prayers offered for Jennie Casseday, Anna Shaw and the W. C. T. U.

An encouraging report of a medal contest held at Flat Rock has come to me. Class nearly all boys, none under fourteen; a large audience; several more to follow in that place and adjacent towns, so writes Mrs. Rowley.

A very fine county convention has been held at Sherman. The first morning a Bible Reading by Mrs. Sturtevant; subject, "God's School." There were essays on "Social Purity," "Franchise," "Woman and Temperance," Hereditary Influence," "Alcohol's Effect on the Nervous System," and "A Higher Ideal." Dr. Anna Shaw was present, and at all meetings was helpful and instructive. A gold medal contest was given on the last evening; Miss Bessie Corbin was the successful contestant.

At the state convention our corresponding secretary was instructed to write delegates from our state to Sunday-school conventions asking them to favor a resolution for having temperance lesson some other day than review Sunday. Mrs. Wheeler has done so, and also gotten out a circular of instructions for us as a state, and almost immediately our state minutes will be in the hands of the women of the unions. Mrs. Wheeler is a very perfect editor. I assure you they will be worth reading; ten cents for minutes, six for postage.

The Woman's Literary Club of Lansing have just got into their new home, an elegant five thousand dollar building. The club's history began in 1874, when a few ladies met in a parlor; to-day this building, free from indebtedness! As our correspondent says, "Let no man say the genius for business dwells only in masculine breasts." Dr. L. Anna Ballard, and Mrs. J. B. Porter, "of ours" are active members.

IOWA.

MRS. HENRY'S WORK.

At the end of atwo months' campaign in Iowa, it occurs to me that a report will not be amiss. I left home for the eleventh district May 8, arriving at Ireton, Sioux county, on Saturday evening the 9th. I was met at Maurice, the first station east of Ireton, by two earnest women of the Ireton union, and a young "honorary" who had been spending Saturday in Maurice, working up, against great odds, a meeting for Sunday night. They came aboard the train to take me on to Ireton. My home in Ireton was with Mrs. Gilchrist, the earnest and efficient organizer for the eleventh district, who had planned my first two weeks' work.

Sabbath morning I addressed a good audience in Mr. Gilchrist's church, he, however, being absent to attend Presbytery in the East. Mrs. Gilchrist presided, and made the meeting a success from the start. Sunday afternoon several carriage loads drove with me to Maurice, where I met a large audience in the evening, composed mostly of men.

One thing has been noticeable in this Iowa work. In most places the men were either interested or curious enough to come out and make a large proportion of the audience.

I always invited the audience to ask questions or make objections—slips of paper being passed for this purpose at each meeting. These questions are, in themselves, a curious souvenir of this trip. The questioners opened up the whole subject of the relation of the National society to church and state, often, evidently, supposing that I would be obliged to stand speechless before the perplexing problems they propounded, not knowing when they began, as they did afterward, that we had nothing to conceal in the National W. C. T. U. Some who were not in love with the truth would make the streets a battle ground the next day, where tongue met tongue in manly (?) strife, after which, with questions that had been cooked and spiced, they would come and renew the attack in the evening. But, as a rule, the questions were real and honest, and the answers were accepted in a spirit of candor, and kind words would be generously spoken at the close of the long hard evening's work, that were like cups of cold water, and will always be remembered gratefully.

I took the train May 10 for Calliope, where I addressed an appreciative audience, and organized a union of twenty-three members. I here found many true friends of the cause, the wives of the Presbyterian and M. E. pastors heartily aiding in the work. I found a delightful resting place in the home of the Presbyterian pastor.

Tuesday I returned to Ireton, where the union had planned a reception at Mrs. Gilchrist's for the afternoon. This was a very enjoyable affair. The entire union came out, with other ladies, several of whom joined us during the meetings that followed. It was the Ireton union that first moved to call me into the state, as I understand, and they were most cordial during my stay. I addressed large audiences there on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings.

On Thursday I went to Akron. Here I found a young and very earnest union, organized by Mrs. Gilchrist. They had planned a reception for the afternoon, during which we sat in a circle and talked in an informal way about the work and methods. My home here was with Mr. and Mrs. J. V. Farnum, earnest Prohibitionists. I gave two evenings to Akron, receiving several additions to the union, several honoraries, and answering a bundle of questions. The pastors here were hearty in their coöperation. My next point was Rock Valley, where I received from the United Presbyterian pastor and his wife the most cordial reception and aid. I had a fine audience on Sunday evening; met several ladies who called to talk about a union, and promised to return and organize before leaving that part of the state.

On Monday I took the train to Inwood, where I was met by the M. E. pastor of Larchwood, which was my next point, some eight or ten miles distant, and taken across the prairie in a carriage. The audience at Larchwood was a very inspiring one, that had evidently known but little about our work, and was large and kindly hearted enough at once to appreciate the cause, its motives and methods. I remained here for two days, and took steps toward organizing a union.

The next point was Rock Rapids, where I was met at the train by Mr. and Mrs. Lunt, formerly of Evanston, Ill., and the M. E. pastor, and where I found a most delightful audience. The conditions were not favorable just at that time for organizing a union, but there is material for a good one in this beautiful town.

A long ride over the prairie from this point brought me back to Rock Valley for Thursday evening, where I organized a union of over thirty members, as fine a company of women as you will often find. On Friday, May 23, I started at 5 a. m. for the long trip across the state, from the north-western to the south-eastern corner, Washington being the objective point. Was here until June 1, speaking twice on Sunday, May 25, meeting the pastors in a conference on Monday afternoon, and attending the county convention which met there during the week, closing with an open-air meeting in the park on Sunday afternoon, June 1. My home while there was with Mrs. Elder, formerly of Illinois, who, with a faithful few, is bearing the burden and heat of the day in that place.

I found a company of very earnest and interesting women in the convention, who, under the leadership of a president whose faithfulness is undoubted, is trying to hold the fort in Washington county.

At the end of this engagement I found myself in Davenport. I gave two lectures there, and spent the rest of the week in a quiet nook in a "chamber of peace," where the only sounds that broke the almost absolute hush were the voices of birds and the crooning of a mother hen leading her brood about the yard set full of old-fashioned garden beauties, or in the carriage with a woman whom you all ought to know, Dr. Jennie McGowan. I found a mixed state of affairs as to W. C. T. U. work in Davenport, but in the hands of conscientious Christian women, let us trust that all will be adjusted to the advantage of the work and the glory of God. Here was a most earnest, candid spirit of inquiry, and of charity toward each other, that is to be commended to the women at large.

From Davenport to Maquoketa, June 7, where I was met at the train by the M. E. pastor and taken to the parsonage, where the genial hostess, his wife, met me at the gate.

I was booked for six days at this point, beginning with Sunday morning in the M. E. Church. The other meetings were in the hall, and were well attended; the pastors assisting in the work, presiding alternate evenings. Maquoketa has a union of interesting women, to which large additions were made in the meetings.

From Maquoketa entirely across the state to Whiting, on the western boundary. Here I found a colony of my own relatives; children, grand-children, and great grand-children of my father's youngest brother, now of course an old man, but hale, and quick to everything that is for the good of humanity.

There is no union in Whiting, but the ladies are considering the matter of organizing. The people here had been in a struggle with the saloon, and led by the M. E. pastor had obtained a signal victory, but the "original package" had come into power, and was defying order if not law.

To Spirit Lake camp-meeting next, where I had been invited to take the Bible readings, and a part of the preaching service of this feast of tabernacles.

This was holy ground to me, it being the place to which I came in '61 as a bride, and where we had expected to make our home, according to plans which were all changed by the war. Imagine, those of my readers who can, the memories that came in troops to greet me, as I looked again upon the graceful outlines of lakes and hills in this enchanted region. Here I met for the first time, Mrs. Abbie Gardner Sharp, the sole survivor of the Massacre of '57 on the shores of West Okoboji Lake. My pen would linger over the beautiful and interesting things connected with this spot, if space would permit. I know of no more delightful retreat from the dust and care of the work-a-day world than the shores and bays, and wooded slopes of the Okoboji and Spirit Lake region.

The camp-meeting was largely attended, and I had a rare opportunity to become acquainted with the pastors and Christian workers of Sheldon district. Brother Jesse Cole, P. E., has reason to rejoice in the strong young men who look to him as leader, and a royal leader is he.

In charge of the singing at the camp-meeting were Mr. and Mrs. George Elderkin of Oak Park, Ill., and it was a great treat to listen, as they sang living bread out of the "Fruit of the Wheat."

On the evening of June 27, I left the camp for Battle Creek, where I arrived Saturday noon, the 28th, and met a spirited union, anxious to know and do the real work of our order. A fine audience met me in the Congregational Church on Sunday night.

On Monday to Sloan, where a two-days' engagement had been made, and where I had a home and care with a distant cousin of whom I should probably never have known but for W. C. T. U. work—a right loyal gentleman, who, out of his own pocket paid the expenses of the meeting, excepting what the small collection furnished. And this reminds me how often in this campaign has the financial burden been borne by one or two, sometimes by the pastor,—not because the people were not willing, but in the farming districts the long drouths of former years had made great scarcity of money, and the work called for immense sacrifices on somebody's part.

I was in the state for less than half rates, and the men and women who bore the balance of the expenses have my profound admiration. In Sloan the "original package" had come to despoil the fair environment of peaceful homes. When it was discovered, like a copperhead in a garden of roses, and the astonished and indignant citizens, men and women, remonstrated, it was found defiant and backed by Sioux City liquor men, so that as matters stood, all the people were able to do was to look on and see it do its revolting work. No union in Sloan, but one in prospect.

From Sloan to Albion for July Fourth, which was the last point in this long campaign. An all-day temperance picnic, with addresses by Rev. Day, of Marshalltown, Mrs. Dunnam, of Burlington, and myself.

The day was perfect, the grove charming, and take it all in all it was a lovely conclusion to the series of engagements. It was a great pleasure to meet Mrs. Dunnam, and to hear her as she pleaded with tender, womanly eloquence for equal suffrage. It was interesting to watch the faces of the men, who with their wives beside them, heard, some of them evidently for the first time, of man's injustice to woman in the laws of our country. The speaker carried all hearts with her, and scored a victory for the cause of human rights.

That evening I rode in a carriage through the beauty of the landscape and the charming weather down to Marshalltown, where I took the night train for Wisconsin via Chicago, and as I felt myself being swiftly borne eastward, with Iowa's soil spinning out behind me under the car wheels, I found myself saying over the words of Jesus, which I send by you, dear UNION SIGNAL, as His own message, back to all those who will receive them by righteousness and faith: "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid."

OTSEGO COUNTY CONVENTION.

Our fourth annual convention met in the Presbyterian church, in Unadilla, June 4 and 5, Mrs. Meigs Case presiding. Excellent reports of county and local work were given, showing an advancement all along the line, and hopeful outlook for the future. The address of welcome in behalf of the clergy by the Rev. Mr. Fay was most encouraging and gave no uncertain sound. A beautiful memorial service was conducted by Mrs. S. N. Saxton, in loving memory of Mrs. G. T. Price, our late county president.

Mrs. A. E. Wilson read a very excellent and enthusiastic paper on "Our Girls' Work."

Mrs. Mary T. Burt gave the address of the evening. May we never forget, and may we all be endowed with the earnest purpose of her words, and filled with the same determination to do work for the Master in this cause!

The reports of superintendents showed increased interest, and more earnest consecration. Mrs. Clara Goodenough was elected as county president. Mrs. Celia Seaves, corresponding secretary.

Mrs. Burt conducted a parlor meeting on the afternoon of the 5th. She talked to us of many ways to strengthen us in our work. We know such a spirit of loving helpfulness cannot fail to accomplish its mission. And may God speed the work from the hands of the highest officers to the lowliest member of the W. C. T. U.

Appropriate vocal and instrumental music was rendered adding much to the enjoyment of the convention, Mrs. R. K. Teller presiding at the organ. The church was beautifully decorated with plants and flowers. Invitations were received to hold the next convention at Worcester and Schenevus. The latter place was chosen.

After a hearty vote of thanks to our entertainers, the convention adjourned, feeling that God's blessing had rested upon us during the two days spent in doing His work.

BRANCHES FROM THE GREEN MOUNTAIN STATE.

The months have been very busy in the work of the W. C. T. U., even though few echoes are heard outside our state. The common foe, high license, has designs upon our beautiful domain, and we have met him as well as we could a concealed enemy. Early in the spring Miss Minnie Phelps, of St. Catharines, Canada, traveled through and through the state, giving about forty lectures, always with large audiences. Her subject, "The Modern Sphinx," is most skillfully handled. She shows the antiquity of liquor-making, and the modern use of license; and how government, legislating the traffic into a business, can legislate it out again, and out of existence Bright, earnest, enthusiastic, she holds her hearers for over an hour, leaving them convinced that their duty is to maintain a prohibitory law if they have one, or to proceed to get one, if not. Alas! for the resolutions of human kind. How many there be that say "I go," and go not!

Following Miss Phelps came Rev. Mr. Small, with his marvelous portrayal of what it costs a man to drink. He spoke in five of our largest places, and with power toward molding public opinion.

We have annual conventions in our organized counties, and this year have held ten, being three more than in former years.

Windham county met at West Wardsboro, May 21 and 22. This is far up the narrow gauge, and out on a stage line of some eight miles, but we found flowers and mottoes and welcome in abundance. Our state secretary, Mrs. G. E. Davidson, has been county secretary for some years, and is a wise manager of W. C. T. U. affairs. This year she thought out a new style, "Temperance Farming," carrying out the semblance of a farmer's festival in all the papers and department reports, as for instance: temperance literature was called farming implements, where THE UNION SIGNAL was recommended as the best plow known. We had three good original poems here, one, "Sowing Tares, or Who is the Drunkard Maker?" by Miss Myra Metcalf, that awakened much interest. One evening was spent in a Demorest medal contest delightfully. To the honor of the eight contestants be it said, the judges had a difficult task.

At Essex Junction, a few miles from Burlington, our next meeting was held, June 3 and 4. There was a peculiar spiritual atmosphere of the highest type waiting for us, and the center revealed itself as the prayerful heart of the president, who walked in the strength of the Master, and felt called to temperance work because of the dear children growing up in her home. Oh, say not that mothers should be excused from active W. C. T. U. work! It is "organized mother love" that shall put down the organized saloon hate. Mrs. E. B. Lund had served seven years, but the love of the women constrained her yet to tarry longer as their president. Young ladies from Essex Center and Burlington brought us much pleasure in song and recitation.

A ride the pleasant morning of June 5 brought us to North Ferrisburg in Addison county, where the white-ribboners were coming from all directions to hold their yearly festival. A cordial welcome the Methodist church bespoke in its floral garniture; and that of the W. C. T. U. and village was voiced by Mrs. Woodall, who with her husband are returned missionaries from China. Their home is made historic by the work of Chinese artists, and we looked with gratitude on the "gift of love" that lately came across the sea from a Chinese sister Christian. So the human love becomes a mighty factor in carrying on the blessed plan of redemption.

Middlebury ladies made up a large share of the convention, and gave us a promise of the help we should receive in our next state meeting, as we are honored by an invitation there in September next. Mrs. E. S. Dakin was reëlected president, and Mrs. Gage, secretary, with other offices and departments well filled.

The next institute was at Marshfield, in Washington county, June 10 and 11. We took the afternoon train from Brattleboro, so as to spend the night in Northfield, where we met again our dear friends, Mr. and Mrs. Kidder, who entertained eight of us when our state annual meeting was held there in 1886. These are Methodist folks, and the venerable minister has preached longer than a common life, and is yet full of activity, keeping up with the progress of temperance warfare, and always on the right side of affairs. Miss Bertha Chamberlin, the president of this county W. C. T. U., managed the institute work with dispatch and much pleasantness, taking a strong stand for loyalty to the work as opposed to secession, and that we ought to consider the end to be gained instead of having our own personal preferences satisfied. The Montpelier union—that arose from the ashes of the old about a year ago—is a consecrated band of women, going forth in the spirit of power promised to those who trust in the Leader of our armies. We were lifted out of self in the contemplation of the courage that should be ours, in the first devotional meeting led by Mrs. Truax. Mrs. Kenyon, our chalk talker and juvenile superintendent, illustrated the text, "Behold, I set before you a blessing and a curse," in a pair of scales in which she weighed the home and the saloon. Preceding this, the first evening, Rev. Mr. Sherburn gave a brief but strong address on temperance. During the session the subject of woman's ballot came up, and Rev. Mr. Taplin was called upon to say what he thought about the franchise, and he did not disappoint his friends. This excellent minister has been identified with the state W. C. T. U. work from the beginning, his first wife being the first state president. The second Mrs. Taplin wears the white ribbon most worthily, and wherever in their itinerary they are called to labor, prohibition and woman suffrage have faithful exponents. The former county president, Mrs. C. S. Richmond, was in attendance with her last year's Christmas gift, Neal Willard Richmond. He calmly surveyed the convention, as if such an order of things were a part of his expectations. May he live to represent his illustrious antecedents of to-day, and have the hopefulness of Neal Dow fulfilled in the complete overthrow of the saloons, while the middle cognomen shall make him a gentle-man indeed.

The early train brought us to Bradford, where there was no stage until the afternoon, and in company with a dear old homeless woman of eighty years, we got over the four hours of waiting, with many a sober reflection as to the years beyond the half-way house. Feeling so sorry for her, we said: "Life at best is not long, and we have the same dear Father over us, wherever we are, and there will be home and welcome at last." "Yes," she said, "and the same moon and stars." We have been puzzling ever since, whether the sympathy helped any, after all our good intentions. But when she said good-bye at East Corinth, the tears ran down her face: "You have been very kind to me; you are one that loves to do good." "I had a mother," I answered, and thought with a sigh and yet a relief, "She has been a year and a half in the upper kingdom, where none are homeless or heart-weary. God pity the bereaved old mothers"!

We found the convention folks had passed a profitable afternoon, and though the rain was pouring, a good company gathered at night, to the evening meeting. The children were out in full force and helped out the evening beautifully. Mrs. M. H. Corwin is much beloved by her co-workers, and they refused to choose another leader. She had interested many representative delegates from the towns near, Newbury and Topsham; and the Congregationalist minister, Rev. Mr. Sherman, of her home village, had come on purpose to attend the convention. Miss Ada Hall, a good representative Y, so pleasant and capable, brought her varied talents into use, in song and parliamentary drill, and illustrations of the work of young women. The second evening, the two resident ministers, Mr. Sherman and Mr. Hatch, expounded the subjects of "Narcotics" and "Cider," to the satisfaction of all. A Y of ten young ladies was formed here, and we hope some additions made to the East Corinth W. C. T. U.

The sixth and seventh institutes were in our northern counties, and on the way, Monday evening, with the help of Miss Nellie Blakely, our state Y superintendent, we organized a most promising band of young ladies at St. Johnsbury. The meeting at Sheffield began the evening of June 12, continuing through the next day and evening. This first evening was young people's hour, and Miss Blakely quite won the hearts of the younger as well as older people. So much so that a number of young ladies consulted about a Y, and appointed a meeting the next week, with Miss Ingalls as president. Mrs. E. J. Nelson, the valued president of the St. Johnsbury union, had come in as a vice-president to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Mrs. Applebee in the early winter. She was unanimously chosen for the year to come, to the gratification of the state president. Mrs. M. E. Bell, state superintendent of prison, jail and almshouse work, had come over the hills from Craftsbury—eighteen miles—thus bestowing her company and safe conveyance upon your correspondent to the next convention. They were at dinner when we arrived, the large dining-room of the church full of tables. We looked about upon the dear faces of Orleans county women, every union of them true to the state and National W. C. T. U., and something of our thought must have been the inspiration, for a quick applause went about from the hands emptied a moment to cheer. We do not know just why, but this border county always has a most enthusiastic convention. In attendance, music, speeches, round musical ayes when votes are cast, in thorough attention to business, they are above par. We do not wonder that one wrote since, speaking of the impetus she carried back to the home union: "I think our institute this year was wonderful."

Mrs. E. E. Ware, of Coventry, a farmer's wife, with a family of children, has proved a rarely good county president.

The Y unions of the county sent large delegations and these, with the host from the new Craftsbury Y, made such a company of splendid young womanhood as one rarely sees. Miss Blakely had them in charge the first day and evening, and the second they begged for a little talk, so we were excused, and you may imagine the sensation when we found a large parlor full, some young girls, some young mothers with the baby in the little blue-lined carriage—the first baby! What words could be good enough for such as these? After some general talk, we spoke of special departments suitable for the girls, then of the flower mission, and dear Jennie Casseday, and we told them of her life and patience, of her home where the white-winged angels guard; and how, while health of body was so desirable, health of soul was better, and the Lord had vouchsafed His promise to her, "My grace is sufficient for thee," and how that lovely grace had shone out over all the world, and made us better for knowing her.

Mrs. Bell is also a minister's wife, but her kind husband spared her to attend four county conventions this year, those of Chittenden, Addison, Caledonia and Orleans. She has made a careful study of the prison, jail and almshouse work in our state, and a plan is begun for a "Home" for women made homeless through sin, something like the "Mercy Home" of New Hampshire.

The third week of June the institute of Windsor county was held at Rochester, and we were promised "for the entire session," but nature refused to be driven, and we staid at home with nerve-ache for company. Mrs. Kenyon was here one evening and Mrs. McLaughlin the next, so with their own force they had a fine meeting, persuading their good president, Mrs. Clark, to serve again this year.

July 1 found us en route for Rutland, where an excellent institute had been planned by the president of the Rutland W. C. T. U. Mrs. L. N. Franklin, the local secretary, and what help we could render by writing letters on the cars. We were gratified by nearly all being on hand, and all papers being timely and interesting. Mrs. Franklin was elected president, as was entirely fitting. The heart of her women do trust in her. Following her leadership over a hundred women of Rutland clasped hands over the resolution that the law must be enforced, and at least ten of the places where liquor was sold "on the sly" moved out and away. Rutland is foremost in lectures. They had Miss Phelps in the fall of 1889, and since then Mrs. Lathrap, Mr. Small and Miss Greenwood. A number of prominent business men and ministers help with money, influence and have defense in the papers.

Bennington county held the tenth institute, and we found Manchester Center beautiful for situation. Two unions of this county were loyal to the state and National W. C. T. U., and one—the largest—had left us for the non-partisan society. But North Bennington could make a convention of itself, with the musical trio, with Mrs. White as a reader, and Miss Towsley to sing, Miss Colvin to preside, and a dozen of the brightest children you ever saw to recite and sing. It rained, but the drops cooled the air, and to-morrow was the Fourth, so we defied the calendar and the mercury, and settled down for a "good time." Five ladies from Pawlet had driven twenty miles to be there, and a former pastor, Mr. Swartz, from West Pawlet, drove over twenty miles to attend the convention. Representative delegates were there from Dorset, Arlington, Peru and other places. A member of Troy, N. Y., W. C. T. U., familiar with work where there are saloons, and a lady from Kansas—a live woman voter. These, with the good minister of the village, who had been a missionary to Africa for several years, made up a fine line of helpers, and the day and evening were too short for all we wanted to do. The county is well organized, with Mrs. A. F. Smith as president, Miss M. Frances Colvin as secretary, and offices and departments well filled.

In all our meetings Sunday-school work received careful attention, and prayer was made for the success of the memorial to the international Sunday-school convention, and for the victory of the truth in Nebraska. The outlook of the "faith and persistence" of the W. C. T. U. is encouraging. We realize that the enemy has been among us sowing tares of high license, and will meet it the best we can. Oh, for a spirit of courage, here and everywhere, that would throttle the demon, King Rum, and save our beloved land from the curse of the saloon!

PRISON WORK.

Mrs. Acheson, our beloved state president, and I arrived at Huntsville, Saturday, June 7, in order to observe "Prison day" the following Sabbath. We were cordially received by chaplain and officials, and at the appointed hour were allowed to hold personal conversation with "Miss Jennie Casseday's Band of Loyal Christian Brothers," and other prisoners, and also the sick in the hospital until noon. At two o'clock in the afternoon the incarcerated, numbering six hundred men, were assembled in the chapel. Here we were joined by the superintendent's kind wife, and several other ladies, and after Sunday-school, and singing by the well organized convict choir, we were permitted to speak. It was a novel sight to see six hundred men in one assembly, with brains unclouded by whisky. Our president has a clear, strong, sweet voice, and by request she sang at the close of the meeting, "Where Is My Wandering Boy To-night." God was there in great power, and there was not one face unmoved. I only wish those who speak of the prison work of the W. C. T. U. as "a thankless task," and who call our unfortunate men behind the bars, "hardened criminals," could have seen and heard what we did that day. Many, with trembling lips, spoke of the local W. C. T. U. workers in their respective counties, and more than one showed motherly letters, showing how the dear sisters still follow "the boys in prison" with Christian sympathy and counsel. Seven-eighths of these men are there from crimes committed while under the influence of drink, crimes which never would have been done had the fathers of our country shielded their boys from temptation. We found one life convict who, the chaplain believes, is entirely innocent, but when arrested he was a stranger in a strange land, and the circumstantial evidence was against him. Thank God, he has accepted Christ as his hope, and although in the midst of such sad environments has the "peace which passeth all understanding." Liberty to him will be sweet in the great hereafter.

Many men and boys are there under assumed names. "We have brought the trouble and disgrace upon ourselves," they say, "and are determined that our mothers shall never know where we are, or how we have fallen." Heaven pity the dear mothers and their rum-cursed boys! Our Texas penitentiaries are places for "the purposes of redemption, not for retribution," and it is better for some of these men to be lost to their loved ones here, than to be eternally separated in the world beyond.

On Monday the chaplain conducted us through the flower garden, so beautifully kept by these imprisoned hands, and then into the different workshops where the convicts are taught useful trades, and here, as a special favor, we were allowed again to hold personal conversation with the inmates, and from the interest manifested we believe our visit was not in vain. The colored female convicts are on a farm, but there are two white women within the walls, who greeted us kindly, saying, with much feeling, that we were the first of their own sex who had ever paid them a visit. One of these was a young girl, with a heart history. The story of a wrecked life was told between bitter sobs, but she refused to give her name, as she "did not wish her mother to know she was in prison." The following week was spent in organizing W. C. T. U. unions.

The next Sabbath was spent within the walls of Rusk penitentiary, where we were again received with the utmost Christian courtesy by chaplain and officials and the superintendent's wife. The prisoners had some elegant presents made by their own hands awaiting us, and these were presented with well-chosen words of appreciation for the work of the W. C. T. U. These gifts are highly prized, and we take great pleasure in exhibiting them. About ten o'clock, with superintendent and chaplain as our guides, we were conducted first among the rare plants of the convict garden and then through the large and airy kitchen. After a few words of conversation with cooks and waiters, we went up a flight of stairs to the different wards of the hospital, where we spent several hours in trying to comfort the afflicted ones. The sick in our Texas penitentiaries seem to have every attention, but many of them were young boys far from home and mother, and there was a desolate, homesick expression on every face.

About one o'clock we were invited to dine in the official department of the building and it was pleasing to see the good will manifested by the convicts in preparing the dinner for us, and in waiting on the table. I never tasted more savory food, but I had just seen hundreds in striped clothes eating in the dining hall just beyond us, and somehow felt too sad to eat. After we arose from the table we were permitted to speak to the waiters. One was a boy afflicted with consumption. He said he hoped his term of imprisonment would expire before his death, as it would break his poor mother's heart to have him die in prison.

At two o'clock the scene of the Sabbath before was repeated. Six hundred and thirty-five convicts assembled in the chapel, and after our little talk several hundred took the temperance pledge. All seemed deeply in earnest. Many sad incidents were repeated to us, and each one seemed a powerful appeal for prohibition. The same God who delivered King David from blood-guiltiness (Psa. 51) has visited more than one in our penitentiary with saving power. God help the people of our country to see their duty in regard to these unfortunate prisoners!

MRS. LIZZIE D. JOHNSON,
Supt. Prison Work.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

WILL the dear sister who recently wrote to THE UNION SIGNAL office desiring help in getting a good temperance home for her two boys, please send her full address to the editor again? It has been unfortunately mislaid, and is earnestly desired.

A DELIGHTFUL entertainment was recently given by the Loyal Temperance Legion of Xenia, Ohio, consisting of recitations, vocal and instrumental music, a gun drill and other interesting exercises; the drum corps won deserved honors, while the zither and guitar duet was highly commended; indeed, the whole performance was most creditable to the performers. The Legion numbers 350 young recruits for the temperance army.

APPROPRIATE resolutions were adopted by the W. C. T. U. at Wabasha, Minn., concerning the death of Mrs. Mary H. Medlar, a beloved and honored member, wife of the Rev. W. H. Medlar. "Her Christian life, so full of earnest devotion to earthly duties, and calm, unwavering trust in Christ, was one which her sisters desire to emulate."

THE warmest words of commendation come from Minneapolis regarding Mrs. Woodbridge's recent address in the First Congregational Church of that city on the theme of "Peace and Arbitration;" also concerning her forcible and impressive address at the Swedish Tabernacle during the all-day conference of a few days previous.

A NOTE from the president and secretary of the union at Superior, Nebraska, conveys the following: "We hope through your pages to reach the eye of the president of the W. C. T. U. of Indian Territory, or any others concerned, regarding the presence at Ft. Sill, of Mrs. Julia Wilson, a very lovely woman, loyal W. C. T. U. worker, and ready for any good work. Her extreme modesty may cause her to remain unnoticed unless called out by others. Her husband is a missionary engaged in work there."

THE post-office address of Dr. and Mrs. Boole is West New Brighton, Staten Island, instead of Long Island, as incorrectly stated in a former number.

THE Sheldon, Ill., W. C. T. U. adopted suitable resolutions in regard to the death of a beloved and valued member, Mrs. Lydia J. Watkins, who was a most earnest worker in both missionary and temperance circles. Her loss will be deeply felt by family, friends, church and the societies to which she gave so freely of time and labor.

MANY of the unions of Washington county, New York, were strengthened and encouraged recently by the pleasant and profitable lectures of Mrs. Emilie U. Burgess, state lecturer of the department of peace and arbitration. Beginning with Cambridge she made a circuit through the county, giving addresses in twelve towns under the auspices of the local unions. Mrs. Burgess has won for herself an enviable reputation throughout the county. Her subject, "Peace and Arbitration," was well and ably discussed. The unions feel very grateful to Mrs. Sarah W. Collins, state superintendent of this department, for her kindness in sending out such an able speaker.

AT the observance of flower mission day at the state House of Correction at Ionia, Mich., the following unions were represented: Grand Rapids, Portland, Lowell, Lyons, Muir, Saranac, North Plains, Lake Odessa, Clarksville, Easton and Ionia. There were five hundred people present, outside the inmates. A beautiful program was carried out, and it is hoped that much good was done.

MRS. MARY TEATS, of Santa Fé, New Mexico, desires to remind all churches or unions who respond to her appeal for books to be sent for the use of the prisoners in the territorial penitentiary, that the charges for transportation must be prepaid, as she is utterly unable to meet these. She thanks the dear sisters who have responded so generously, but feels it necessary to remind all donors of this essential point.

THE W. C. T. U. convention of Cass county, Ill., met at Ashland, June 4 and 5, and was conducted by Mrs. W. P. Kuhl, district president, and Mrs. Robert Fielden, county president. It was a delightful and profitable convention. The citizens showed the fullest sympathy and the heartiest hospitality toward the W. C. T. U. Able papers were given concerning many questions of practical interest, followed by earnest discussions. The officers of the preceding year were reëlected.

IN few words, but eloquent in simplicity and directness, the mother of a dear W. C. T. U. worker sends the message concerning her death and victory: "Another worker in the temperance cause, and reader and lover of THE UNION SIGNAL, a white-ribboner, Mrs. Clara McDonah, of Centreville, Trempeleau county, Wis., has gone to her reward. Died, April 21, 1890. Her mother,

CHARLOTTE F. SANDERS."

MRS. L. E. BAILEY has given two hundred and twenty lectures in Nebraska in behalf of the pending prohibitory amendment. During the day time she has held ninety-three ladies' and children's meetings, at which she has added many members to the Loyal Temperance Legion, organized new ones, and reorganized those that needed help. Two hundred and fifty-four new members have been added to local unions. She has also spoken at every place in behalf of the Temperance Temple, and started eighty-five bands to aid the building. Besides all this she has not forgotten THE UNION SIGNAL, nor the State W. C. T. U. paper, The Union Worker, but obtained over a hundred subscribers to each. Mrs. Bailey is now working in Fillmore county, after which she will speak through Clay county, which will finish a complete canvass of the fifth district. The last two months of the campaign she has been engaged to work for the state prohibitory amendment committee, of which Rev. C. E. Bentley is chairman, and will begin work in Seward county, Sept. 1st. York, Hamilton, Polk and Merrick counties will be her field of labor.

THE Upper Sandusky, Ohio, union has about sixty paying members, and is doing good work. The Wyandot county convention was held at Marseilles, June 3, and the visitors and delegates were handsomely entertained. The reports on the different lines of work were in advance of those of the year before. Mrs. Irene M. Tripp was elected in place of Mrs. Bowers, the retiring president. There are but two unions in the county at present, but it is hoped that more will be organized before the next state convention.

AN interesting workers' conference was held at Horseheads, N. Y., June 11, Mrs. B. B. Colburn, presiding. Teachers were present from different counties. Miss Celia Hutton gave useful hints for local unions, and a parliamentary drill. The subjects discussed were, "Dress and Labor Reform," "Sabbath Observance," and "Juvenile Work." A bright, practical illustration of the latter was given in Mrs. Alice Baker's instructions to a class of boys and girls with the aid of chart and blackboard. Mrs. Easton and little son sang "Somebody's Boy" in a touching manner. Mrs. S. W. Stoddard made a strong appeal for THE UNION SIGNAL, and distributed forty copies of it among the audience. Miss Hutton gave an excellent lecture in the evening on "The Present Crisis." Elmira has recently opened an Anchorage Mission.

MISS SARAH E. SPEAR, a woman good and true, who recently passed to a better country, from Woburn, Mass., left $500 in trust, to be used according to the best judgment of Miss Willard in promoting the cause of temperance, with the proviso that she should, at the time of receiving this amount, appoint some reliable person to act for her in disposing of it, in case of her decease. The National president at once appointed Miss Esther Pugh as the most capable one of whom she could think. This amount comes at a time when it will be most highly appreciated by the W. C. T. U., and the faithful woman who has passed to her reward could not have invested the amount where it would tell more directly for God and Home and Native Land.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Mrs. Mary Read Goodale, of Baton Rouge, La., will come into Missouri, in September, for a month's work. All unions wishing her services, please write for dates and terms to corresponding secretary,

MISS ELLEN D. MORRIS.
Kansas City, Mo.

A School of Methods will be held on the grounds of the Newton Hamilton Camp-meeting Association, Pennsylvania, August 5-8, under the care of Mrs. C. B. Buell.

Publisher's Notes.

Ever So Many

People hear stirring sermons and addresses urging them on to Christian and Christlike activity with a responsive heart and then discover that, after all, they don't know what to do or how to do it! The sermon was all right as far as it went but it did not go to the definiteness of saying, "Now here is the plan and this is the way." We have no sermon to preach but have a straight

Plan, Here Now,

Thus: A book, a good book; a willing soul. The book is read by the willing soul. "Ah, how true, how good, how inspiring!"

And Stop There?

That's the sermon way. No, no. You take such books as ...a neighborhood and you will be doing the work of a gospel preacher, and a good one at that. "Folks won't read them?" You were never more mistaken in your life. Parents and children will eagerly read these true words and tell you so.

Look, now, we propose to do all our part in helping this preaching. We will send the whole number listing at $2.05 for

Only $1.50.

This we will do up to Sept. 1st. If you are at a summer resort start these books going; it will be a blessed relief from society's "wobbly" novels and weak vapidities. If you are at home, make out a list of eight families. Leave a book at each place after making a friendly call. Start them in with discretion, which means, first read the books yourself and fit them to characters as you can. Don't go at this as though you were a colporteur, but as one having "just read the most interesting book. I know your boys and girls would like it, or you would like it—please let me leave it with you? Indeed, I have a number that have such good ideas I am passing them around among my friends and neighbors."

See? Some such way as that. Let us tell you how this "preaching plan" was suggested. Some time ago two good friends who lived near here came into the office having $1,950 with them to invest in W. T. P. A. stock. They spoke of the excellence of our publications and bought a number of copies of "Boys and Other Boys." On the first of this month they were again here and brought $3,000 for investment, and at the same time again invested in books named in the list above with the remark that they felt their investment to be a good one for themselves and for the world, and that they kept these books moving from one family to another. The plan as outlined came from this. Don't let it melt away into the fervidness of summer's heat? It's a straight answer to the question,

What Can I Do?

Do this work patiently, systematically and steadily and we say you will be doing a grand and glorious work for the Master. You will be giving more than "elbow touch"—it is a close hand grasp of human love and sympathy.

Very True.

We know you have not—the one question we put is, will you? Will you send us the names of 3—6—8—a dozen of your friends with a request that we send sample copies of THE UNION SIGNAL with the understanding that you will call on them and ask for their subscriptions? We will notify you by postal card the day the samples are sent. This would be a comparatively easy way to do the work and we know you haven't tried the plan but

Will You?

TO THE READERS OF THE UNION SIGNAL:

If you will carefully read this page, you will find that I have a matter of very great interest to bring before you, and you will also find from the references given that what I shall say is worthy your entire confidence. I do, however, invite the strictest investigation as to the statements I shall make. I consider that I am offering the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL an unparalleled opportunity to make a favorable investment, and want you to READ EVERY WORD! READ EVERY WORD!

I shall divide my statement into five parts, that you may get a clear idea of the whole matter, and will name as the first,

THE INCEPTION.

Some eight months ago the daily papers told of the purchase of a large tract of land eighteen miles south of the Chicago Court House and two miles south of the city limits, at the junction of the Illinois Central and Grand Trunk Railways. This purchase was made by Mr. T. W. Harvey, a well known wealthy gentleman and much esteemed Christian worker of our city. He is the Vice-President, and practically the leader and supporter of the D. L. Moody Bible Institute here, the Superintendent of the Second Presbyterian Sunday-School, and a strong worker in that church. The land was bought with the sole idea of building upon it a successful manufacturing suburb of Chicago, and one which should be notable above all others in our country in that it should be

AN ABSOLUTELY TEMPERANCE TOWN.

And that right under the shadow of this great city, which is ruled as with a rod of iron by it more than 4,500 high-license saloons. What his plans were to carry out this idea, will be enumerated further on. The first thing Mr Harvey did was to choose the location with rare wisdom and judgment. The new town of Harvey lies just south of the Calumet River, and at the crossing of five railroads, with a fall of from 21 to 28 feet to the river. Fine sewerage is thus afforded. This brings me to naming some of

THE PLANS.

Mr Harvey formed a strong company, the ground was platted, and by a piece of good fortune I have had the sale of 240 choice lots in Harvey placed in my hands. It was considered that the temperance people of the land would be glad to invest in an enterprise that promises so well as does this one. For our readers may have the utmost confidence in the enterprise, in the men who are behind it, and in the opportunity that is now given you to double your money!

First, last, and always, this is to be strictly a temperance town; every deed says so, insists on it, and already a number of applications for manufacturing sites have been refused by the Land Company, because they felt that it would be difficult to maintain their high temperance ideas and admit the firms that applied.

Second. It is to be a manufacturing city. It is true that the World's Fair is coming to Chicago, and that this property lies within fifteen or twenty minutes ride of its location, and that the Fair will undoubtedly bring thousands to Chicago who will contentedly settle down and live in this great City of Cities, the marvel of the 19th Century, and that all this will conspire to increase greatly the value of real estate in Harvey; but even without the boom that the great Exposition will bring, Harvey is BOUND TO BE AN ASSURED SUCCESS AS A MANUFACTURING SUBURB.

Because of its unrivalled location. Because of the millions already invested.
Because of the manufactories already there. Because of many more that are coming.

And because the Company is one with unlimited means at their command, and they have determined that it shall be so.

The manufactories already there are the Automatic Mower and Mfg. Co., employing about 125 men; the Grinnell Wagon Works, from Grinnell, Iowa, manufacturers of steel headers, steel hay rakes, buggies, carriages, etc., employing about 500 men. Their buildings are of the following dimensions: One of 160x200 feet; one 200x240 feet, and one 80x200 feet. The Harvey Steel Car Co., formed under the patents of Mr. Geo. L. Harvey, to manufacture steel passenger and sleeping coaches and freight cars. The buildings when completed, about October 1st, will be as follows: One 80x200 feet, and two each 100x300 feet. Five tons of sheet steel will be used daily at the least by this immense company, which will probably employ a thousand men to begin with. The Car Company has a capital of $1,000,000 fully subscribed. Many other manufactories will soon be on the ground. All buildings of this kind will be put up in either brick or stone, and will be in a section by themselves and entirely away from the residence portion of Harvey. There is no doubt whatever that Harvey will soon be a rival of its successful neighbor, Pullman, and the most conservative estimate says will have a Population of Ten Thousand in Three Years or Less,

Reasonably so, for here are some of the plans of the Company which are now being carried out:

MACADAMIZED STREETS, AN ARTESIAN WELL OF ABSOLUTELY PURE WATER, PURE WATER IN EVERY HOUSE, SEWERAGE FOR EVERY LOT, GAS ALL OVER THE CITY, WIDE STREETS, BEAUTIFUL PARKS.
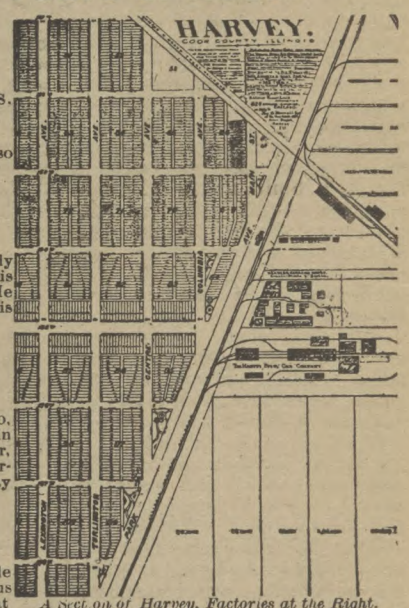
SHADE TREES, HOMELIKE HOUSES.



A Section of Harvey, Factories at the Right.

But there are other reasons why this chance for you to make some money should be of interest to you, so I will tell you something of in the movement, that your full confidence may be given. Of Mr. Harvey, the President, I have already written. Mr. E. T. Jeffery, the Vice-President, was, until quite recently, the general manager of the Illinois Central Railroad, a position of very great responsibilities, and where Mr. Jeffery scored a great success. He has been urged to accept the director-generalship of the World's Fair, but has declined in order to give his attention to the other interests with which he is connected. The Directors are:

T. W. HARVEY. E. T. JEFFERY. S. A. KENT. W. J. WATSON.
N. K. FAIRBANK. W. R. STIRLING. A. C. BADGER. THOS. MCFARLAND.
MORRIS SELLERS.

Men so well known that you need only to see their names, if you live within five hundred miles of Chicago, to assure yourself that they would never lend their names to any "high-flyer" speculative scheme. But in addition I may say that Mrs. D. L. Moody, Mr. Moody and his brother-in-law, the well-known book publisher, Mr. F. H. Revell, have land in Harvey. The Northfield Institute, also the Mt. Hermon School, are also interested in Harvey. Surely enough has been said to prove to the most critical that here is something in the way of an investment that is above suspicion. Now for

THE OUTLOOK.

Here is a temperance town for temperance people; a place where Sunday will be kept and not made hideous by beer worshippers; a place owned and controlled by a company of Christian men; with numerous manufactories on the ground and more coming; with all the advantages of the big city right at hand—thirty-eight trains daily, soon will be more—and with none of its disadvantages; with pure water; pure air, and steady work for the steady home-maker; with the certainty of rapid increase of value for all who purchase now, and

What Does it Mean to You?

The management want people to buy who will come and go to work in the manufactories, does that mean anything to you? They want temperance people who believe in prohibition without any "ifs, ands, or buts." They want skilled labor of all kinds—carpenters, machinists, foremen, and artisans. Does this mean anything to you?

Believing that the people they want read THE UNION SIGNAL, the company authorizes me to offer the 240 lots, each 25x171½ feet, with 20 foot alleys, for the

MARVELOUSLY LOW PRICE of from $180 to $450 each, Providing they are purchased before September 15th. After that date there is to be a general advance of prices. The payments are to be made as follows: One-fourth down, balance in six, twelve, and eighteen months. Now is the time.

The Low-Priced Lots Will go off Quick.—Send for Plats AT ONCE.

Remember, I have only 240 lots to sell, and that the prices named hold good only till September 15th.

As has been said the Company prefers that only actual settlers should be the purchasers of lots, and if desired they will advance money for home building, but if you wish to buy on account of the profitable investment it cannot be denied you. There is good reason to believe that you can

DOUBLE YOUR MONEY IN A SHORT TIME!

I refer by permission to Mrs. T. B. Carse, President W. T. P. A.; Miss Mary Allen West, Editor of THE UNION SIGNAL, and to Mr. Geo. C. Hall, Publisher of THE UNION SIGNAL. Mr. Hall kindly permits me to say that, as the time named is very short, any who desire to invest can send the money to him, and he will see that the deeds, abstracts, etc., are sent promptly. A warranty deed will be issued each purchaser after the first payment is made. Untold millions of money are pressing toward Chicago for investment, and it is scarcely to be wondered at when property sells as did two pieces on State Street recently for $10,000 and $11,000 per front foot respectively. Chicago is the Future Great City, and with all the advantages I have named, you cannot make a mistake if you invest your money here in real estate at a trifle over $7 a front foot. It is in a place where the world must learn that

TEMPERANCE PAYS, BUT SALOONS ARE A CURSE.

And finally the Company has agreed in writing to deed sufficient land free, for building purposes, to the W. T. P. A. in case its stockholder will agree to put buildings and offices thereon, an offer worth at least $4,000 to the W. T. P. A. You can see that your time to get plats and ask questions—if I have left any to ask—is very short.

Publisher's Dep't.

A Letter Well Worth Reading.

Don't Skip It!

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:

Although you have been a welcome and a weekly visitor at our home for several years, yet we have never returned any of your calls. But to-day we set apart a few moments of our busy life to greet you and say also, that without you the National W. C. T. U., as a great, educated, disciplined, united army, could never have existed. Without you the two hundred thousand women who keep step in that mighty march against the most gigantic evil in the world, could never have been marshaled, uniformly and effectively, on any field of battle.

No "Bugle Note" from our leaders could ever have reached the distant forces scattered throughout the land had not your swift wings borne the message. Your quick discernment has seen every need, your wisdom has mastered every situation and met each demand with energetic action. The combined intelligence of our best thinkers, the marvelous experiences of the crusade veterans and the gigantic faith of our "Elijahs," who walked amid the deserts or among the mountain peaks, alone with God, have poured their wealth into your treasury, until in expediency, in methods, in tireless enthusiasm and unyielding faith in God, the "White Ribbon" army is the largest organized cosmopolitan body in the world, ever ready when God calls for volunteers, or humanity needs their help. "At Home" and prepared for action in almost every spot on the globe, where vice needs rebuke, or virtue needs a friend.

But this is not all. Through your pages our "round-the-world missionaries" are giving to us "daylight pictures" of those countries and their inhabitants and their "ensemble," of which we read vague, mythical sketches in our school-days, which made us forget our lessons, while we wondered about those countries, and whether their inhabitants were more like the fairies or the giants, which constituted the bulk of juvenile literature at that period. But thanks to you, dear UNION SIGNAL, they are now a great reality. The hand which pens those "glimpses round the world," we have clasped in social intercourse, the voice which speaks to those strange people, we have heard in our halls and our homes, and the echo of the songs and the prayers comes to us as we read. How small the earth has grown! How near and how real those countries seem! How like ourselves with all our human feelings those people are. A broader sisterhood and a stronger hand-clasp have united us in one great family.

But this is not all. Without your steady, systematic, intelligent, educational efforts, along every line of work, the local unions could never have risen to the proficiency and the unanimity in their many departments and been so thoroughly prepared to carry out effectually and immediately any suggestions which may come from those who have these departments in charge. No member of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union can do her work as well or as easily without your assistance. You give us broader views, better methods and the combined experiences of hundreds of persons during many years of active service in the Temperance cause, making a fund of helpful information, for which life is too short and the demand too urgent for us to obtain in any other way.

And now, dear UNION SIGNAL, knowing that you have a laudable desire of making new acquaintances and also that those new friends are to receive great benefit from you as an able instructor, so we present your merit and claim to all members of our union and others whom we hope to interest in our cause, and urge them, not from the standpoint of your necessity, but of our own needs and your helpfulness.

You have always been generous in your premiums, but to me they have been a small inducement to obtaining subscribers, when compared to the benefit derived from your teachings and influence in our ranks.

But in this last appeal, although we should have gotten this list of subscribers just the same without the mention of "Miss Willard's picture," yet it would be a most grateful souvenir of the conflict in which we are mutually engaged for "God and home and every land."

MRS. C. C. ELLERSON.

What Agents Say of Tokology.
A BOOK FOR EVERY WOMAN.
"Tokology" grows more popular every day!! An agent who has sold several hundred says: "I love 'Tokology' and am delighted to be in its service. I can sell just as well in territory that has been gone over." Mrs. E. J. McElwain, a prominent temperance worker, writes: "I took forty-five orders in five days last week, notwithstanding the storm. I sell 'Tokology' because I know I am benefiting the buyer."
Mrs. R. C. writes: "I consider selling 'Tokology' missionary work. Ordinarily I take five orders out of every six calls I make. To-day I made nine sales in ten calls, selling three in one house." Ladies who desire to earn a little pin money at odd times, or professional canvassers will find "Tokology" a splendid selling book. Prepaid, $2.75. Circulars and terms to agents free.

What "Glimpses" Agents Can Do.

"I have now worked nearly three weeks with 'Glimpses of Fifty Years' and have forty-six orders, eighteen half morocco, the rest cloth. One day I took ten orders. Another firm wants me to handle their book but I have had such good success with 'Glimpses,' and you have dealt so honorably with me, that I shall continue with you. I shall send for fifty books the first of next month and know that I can sell as many more in my territory."

DEAR PUBLISHER:—You ask me to tell you all about the canvass for "Glimpses of Fifty Years" and while there is too much to tell in one letter, I will give you some of my experience. When I ordered my outfit in April, I expected to begin work at once but you know how I was prevented, by sickness and housework.

When I began in June I could work but a short time each day but by planning my work carefully I have been able to work from one to three hours per day five days per week. I now have nineteen orders for my book and have spent perhaps forty hours in canvassing. I shall easily make my order for twenty-five books and in that get a premium copy for myself. I enjoy the work of canvassing very much and wish to thank you for the kindness you have shown me and the promptness with which you have answered my many questions."

The Fair Number.

The issue of July 31 will consist of twenty pages—150,000 copies—and will be specially attractive. Kindly send us lists of your friends to whom sample copies can be sent providing you will follow them up with a request for a year's subscription. But whatever you do don't fail to use this paper at county and state fairs, all gatherings of Farmers' Alliances. Bring this before your union. TO MOTHERS.

If for any reason you cannot nurse your child, we can assure you positively that there is but one Food that is practically a perfect imitation of Mother's Milk in composition and digestibility, and that is LACTO-PREPARATA. It is made wholly from milk.

All manufacturers of Infant Food make the broad claim that theirs is the best, but few, if any, tell how it is made or of what it is composed, for the facts told to any intelligent person would condemn most of them.

CARNRICK'S SOLUBLE FOOD contains 62 1-2 per cent. of Powdered Milk and 37 1-2 per cent. of wheat. Both the milk and wheat are partially digested. It is especially adapted for Infants from six months upwards, and for Invalids, Aged People and Dyspeptics.

Before you take the risk of trying any other Food, do not fail to send to us for a pamphlet of 64 pages entitled Our Baby's First and Second Years, by Marion Harland, which also gives a minute description of Lacto-Preparata and Carnrick's Soluble Food and their mode of manufacture. Sent Free.

Read the above pamphlet and then ask your Physician which Foods are the nearest approach to mother's milk.

MODENE

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—IN COMPOUNDING, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts mildly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on moles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE SUPERCEDES ELECTROLYSIS.

Recommended by all who have tested its merits—Used by people of refinement.

Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail, in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with your full address written plainly. ☞Correspondence sacredly private. Postage stamps received the same as cash. (ALWAYS MENTION YOUR COUNTY AND THIS PAPER.) DR. WILFORD HALL'S

HEALTH PAMPHLET.

A Marvelous Triumph over Disease Without Medicine.

Mrs. Rev. C. Clark, Thiells, N. Y., writes, Oct. 9:

"DEAR DR. HALL:—Some three months ago I purchased your Health Pamphlet with many misgivings as to its value. But having been a great sufferer for twelve months with spinal weakness, rheumatism, nervous prostration, and coincidently with a strong tendency to Bright's disease, accompanied by insomnia so that I had to walk the floor for hours at night before being able to get any rest, being at the same time under the treatment of a good physician, but without avail, it at last induced me to make a thorough application of your treatment. At once my sleep returned as of old, and as sound and as sweet as ever, and my nervousness and other troubles have left me. I attribute my bodily condition to my critical period of life, and I am anxious that other like sufferers should know about my case and secure your pamphlet. I can not be over thankful to you for this discovery, and would not part with the knowledge thus purchased for $4; for many times that amount.

Gratefully yours, MRS. REV. C. CLARK.

Signal Notes.

WORCESTER, Mass., is said to be the largest no-license city in the United States. A prohibition newspaper is published there with good financial support. Even druggists are unable to obtain licenses, and this high sentiment is fully sustained by the leading citizens.

IT is not generally known that a department has been recently opened at the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, which is presided over entirely by women. Four ex-Newnham students, at the head of whom is Miss Clemes, a lady who was for some years resident in Manchester, are engaged in daily work at the Observatory. Their employment includes exact measurement from photographs, as well as actual photography and night observations. The arrangement is said to be only tentative; but if Miss Clemes and her associates succeed in making themselves useful, the women's department will doubtless become a permanent institution.—Pall Mall Gazette.

REV. T. DEWITT TALMAGE recently said: "A few clergymen are hindered from taking part in this temperance cause because Christ turned water into wine. But let me say to those gentlemen that last December I was in Cana of Galilee, where that miracle was performed, and I saw the very firkins which tradition says contained the wine that the Lord made, and I have to report that there is not one drop of that liquor left, and there is not a drop of it in all the world. The Lord made that; the devil makes the rest."

THE London temperance hospital has received from W. S. Caine, the noted temperance member of parliament, a donation of $1,500.

MISS MARY E. BURT, just made a member of the Chicago Board of Education, being the second woman appointed to act in that capacity, is self-made and well made. She graduated from the common school of her native town, Geneva, Wis., and entered the profession of teaching, while her own education went right forward, for no school-room was large enough to confine her, and she brings to her work the rare self discipline and rarer common sense which no seminary or college dares guarantee its graduates. Her name is known in literature by a book entitled "Business Women," which was warmly approved by the oft misunderstood poet.

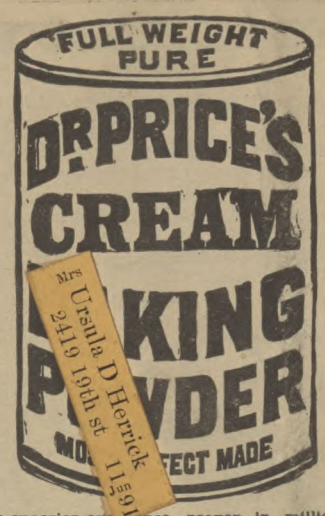
MRS. DELIA CROSS, of Brooklyn, has now the legal right to put "Captain" before her name, having signed the necessary papers in the Custom House as master and owner of "The Oregon."

THE National Drink Bill of New Zealand has been reduced this past year nearly $223,000, making the liquor expenditure per head about $2.25 less than it is in the United Kingdom of Great Britain.

"IN Lucknow there are 102 liquor shops at the present moment under British rule, where there were none under the old Mohammedan rule."—Bombay Guardian.

Is there much to hope for in such Christianizing of India? How much better off is she with her liquor-selling Christianity than with her anti-liquor heathenism? Missionaries are at a discount amid such conditions.

THE Champion, which defends the liquor business, sees trouble ahead, and talks to the liquor dealers as follows: "Have you ever realized that what is called now the Prohibition Party consisted, fifteen years ago but of a handful, so to speak, of women crusaders egged on by some notoriety-seeking preachers and scheming Micawbers? Are you aware of the fact that at the Presidential election of 1884 this little nucleus of cold-water proselytes had swollen up to such large proportions as to hold the balance of power, and actually decided the contest. Will they not hold and wield, in 1892, the balance of power? Will they do it? Yes, unless you do your duty and fight them energetically. If you would read your papers, you would keep posted on and alarmed at the slow but constant, active and dangerous development of this slimy, venomous reptile, this Prohibition anaconda, which ever seeks to wind its gigantic coils around the body of the liquor traffic closer and tighter, and unless stopped in its deadly work will yet squeeze the life-blood, figuratively speaking, out of you, crush your bones into a pulpy mass, and fatten on your carcasses, will raise its head triumphantly, yes, vindictively and threateningly over your distilleries, your breweries, and your warehouses." The alarm of the liquor fraternity is one of the hopeful signs for our cause.



Its superior excellence proven in millions of homes for more than a quarter of a century. It is used by the United States Government. Endorsed by the heads of the Great Universities as the Strongest, Purest, and most Healthful. Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder does not contain Ammonia, Lime, or Alum. Sold only in Cans.

Count Tolstoi paid a great compliment to Dr. Stockham when he wrote a novel founded on the teachings of "Tokology, a Book for Every Woman." But the thousand of women who have purchased the book, and who sound its praises, pay her a greater tribute. When women write that "Tokology is worth its weight in gold;" "Should my house take fire, Tokology would be the first book saved;" "Next to the Bible it is the best book I ever read;" "No book sells like Tokology," we should think every lady would make sure of possessing a copy.

To some it does not seem quite right that this work cannot be procured of dealers, but the doctor desires to protect her good and faithful agents. In towns where there are no canvassers it can be bought direct of the publishers, for $2.75. Sample pages free. Address,

These lives can be saved.

Can cancer be cured?

Yes if properly treated before the disease has gone too far, but it is incurable if neglected till the whole constitution becomes involved.

The knife

should not be used. In about 97 percent of cases treated with the knife the disease returns.

Cancer cured by the method employed by Dr. McMichael will not return.

The same results are accomplished in treating tumors

without employing the knife.

The Great American Problem.

It is fair to suppose that each UNION SIGNAL sent out is read by at least two people. Many home circle periodicals place the number higher than this; but if this low estimate is granted, 170,000 people weekly read our columns. Not all read all of the paper, but we doubtless reach a vast constituency each issue. Nearly all our readers long, as earnestly as we do, to see the power of the liquor traffic overthrown, and did it rest in the power of the friends of THE UNION SIGNAL, prohibition, national, state and individual, would soon reign. But it does not so inhere, and it becomes us to face the problem in the same way that it faces us, and not to put up our own man of straw. At the June Temperance Congress in New York, we were told by the labor leaders that between us and the laboring classes a great gulf was fixed on this temperance question, that the working people considered alcohol in its beer or whisky shape, to be their friend, and that any class of people or politicians that would prohibit its use was only another enemy to be fought at the polls, and wherever else it could be opposed. The farmers of the country, too, vote against prohibition, or have done so, if it could be made to appear that their cider interests would be affected by the passage of a prohibitory law. Without the votes of these two classes our success is impossible. Clearly, the people must be taught that alcohol is poison; that it is a false friend; a wolf in sheep's clothing for the laborer.

How Shall The Teaching Be Done?

With few exceptions, the papers, the great public leaders and educators, are either "hand in glove" with the liquor traffic, or silent as to its ravages. Legislators consider it is none of their business! Most of the ministers preach about everything under the blue heavens except temperance; politicians use the saloons as their right hand allies; and right in the capitol building at Washington, under the Hall of Representatives, is a flourishing saloon! A few are left here and there to raise their voices against the evil as best they may. We want our many thousand readers to know that it lies in their power to use, effectively, in this battle.

The Great Lever, Education,

Senator H. W. Blair, of New Hampshire, has written a book entitled "The Temperance Movement, or The Conflict Between Man and Alcohol," in which the whole subject is handled in such a masterly manner that we urge you to read the book, know what it says and Pass the Word Along!

Many a laboring man will be glad to read this book if he is given the chance. Many a man who drinks only a little to drown care and weariness will prefer to face the care rather than drink poison; but he must first learn that it is poison. Many a farmer will prefer to let his cider go to vinegar when he discovers that for the pitiful $1.60 per capita yearly received from internal revenue (the government's license on the liquor and beer traffic) he pays out annually $13.40 as his share of the prisons, insane asylums and poor-houses resulting from this terrible traffic.

Information, Education, Agitation.

This is what the people want, and must have before success is possible. We are now the publishers of Senator Blair's book and have just gotten out

A Revised and Enlarged Edition.

Let us give you a condensed statement of the book's contents. Among the illustrations are four colored plates showing the effects of drinking on the human system, and fifty-six fine pictures of the leading temperance workers. Among the maps and diagrams, a map of New York City, showing where its more than 10,000 saloons are located, and diagrams showing relative cost of drink and of necessities of life; expenditure for drink compared with amount paid for wages, etc., the comparative length of life of employés of the brewing trade with other crafts. The contents of the book run somewhat as follows (we have not space for full table):

A Brief Study of Alcohol,
Effect of Alcohol on the Human Body and Soul.
Alcohol not a Food or a Stimulant.
Alcohol as the Creator of Disease.
Alcohol and Life Insurance.
Alcohol in Medicine.
Alcoholic Pauperism and Crime.
Alcohol Destroys Wealth.
The Remedies—Total Abstinence and Educational Forces.
Which Law, License or Prohibition?
The Forces Against Alcohol, Religious, W. C. T. U., Etc.
What Shall We Do Next?

Now read this letter from

Miss Frances E. Willard.

Senator Blair's book is a compendium of the temperance reform. If more people read it, I should not get so many letters asking me "How can I procure the facts for the address I wish to write?" "How can I cram for an essay before my literary society?" "How can I, in the least time, prepare for a debate on Prohibition?" "Please send me arguments for total abstinence against high license, showing results of Prohibition, stating why we must have constitutional amendments, etc., etc." All of these points are ably covered in the Senator's book, for he brings the clear-cut mind of a lawyer and the outlook of a statesman to the consideration of these living issues. If I were president of a local union I would see that this book was read chapter by chapter at the monthly meetings. Our women, by this time, should be well furnished for the fray. They need to have the arguments at their tongue's end. Especially is this true of national Prohibition, which now looms above the horizon, the coming tornado in politics. On this theme Senator Blair is the expert among our sixty millions of people. To it he has devoted fifteen years of thought and honest hard work. Let us know what there is to be said on this question. Let us copy out paragraphs from this book of admirable temper for the local press in our own towns and villages. Let us make efforts for national Prohibition. As is well known, Senator Blair is a Republican, and for that reason his method of putting the question will not rouse opposition in the dominant party. If I had the money, I would put one of his books in every white-ribbon home in America within two weeks; but even if I had, this would be a vast expense to one person, while it is not a formidable undertaking at all when subdivided among 200,000. May I suggest to Brother Hall the value of pressing upon our members the considerations herein urged?

Yours for a crusade on behalf of "The Temperance Movement, or The Conflict between Man and Alcohol," written by Senator Blair, Frances E. Willard.

We propose to make A GREAT OFFER!

To all who read THE UNION SIGNAL. It is this. If you, your union, your friend or any one reading this announcement will agree to keep this grand educational force moving among the people, especially the farmers and laborers, we will send two books for the price of one, namely,

One Full Bound Cloth Book, Two Heavy Paper Bound Volumes,

Of about 250 pp. each which can be passed around from one to another, thus practically having three books in the field at once.

All sent Prepaid for only $3.00!

The work is written in a pleasing, unconventional manner; it is not full of tough, dry statements, it will inevitably arrest the attention and command thought. Will you help us wage the war? It does lie in your power. Bring this plan before your minister and ask his advice and help—bring it before your union; bring it before your temperance society. No partisan feeling whatever can possibly be stirred up. Nothing but good will result from this way of teaching the people, and we make the offer without leaving any profit to ourselves beyond enough to pay the cost of express charges in sending to you. Address W. T. P. A., 161 La Salle St., Chicago, Ill.

Hotter the Weather Bigger the Proof.

As the weather grows warm, the sale of James Pyle's Pearline Washing Compound rapidly increases. This proves that many women recognize the fact that PEARLINE makes washing and cleaning very much easier than when done with the ordinary means. Proves also that summer clothing, being of delicate texture and color, will not stand the rough usage necessary when washed with soap, and establishes the fact that PEARLINE, in doing away with the rubbing, lessens the wear and tear and fills a very important place. Delightful for bathing in fresh or salt water. Its ingredients render it harmless to the most delicate skin. Especially during the hot weather it is to your advantage to use PEARLINE, and only humane to supply your servants with it, and thus lighten their labors; besides you insure much better results. Beware of imitations. JAMES PYLE, New York.

SIGNAL NOTES:

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Maryland and Michigan held their state Prohibition Conventions July 30.

New York City Prohibitionists have nominated Wm. Jennings Demorest for mayor.

A movement was started at the Moundsville, W. Va. Assembly, to raise a fund for a Fisk monument.

Mrs. Anzonnetta Allen, of New Bedford, Mass., has received a special license as pilot of steam yachts.

Mr. John G. Woolley spoke in the First M. E. Church, Chicago, Monday evening and at Bethesda Mission, Tuesday evening.

The Mark Lane Express reports a falling off of 1,000,000 quarters in England's exportation of wheat, occasioned by protracted rains.

Various woman's organizations have already taken steps to secure portraits or busts of eminent women for exhibition at the Columbian Exposition.

An English syndicate, including Irish Secretary Balfour, has purchased the great tin deposit of San Jacinto, Cal., embracing 2,200 acres for $2,000,000.

Mrs. Emily Pfeiffer, the English poet, lately deceased, gave all her personal estate, valued at £63,000 to educational and charitable establishments for women.

Queen Christiana of Spain, declares her intention, if the cholera does not abate, to send the King to La Granja for his safety, herself remaining at Madrid to share the common danger.

The French Society for the Advancement of Women, through their president and vice-president, have tendered their congratulations to the women of the United States on the admission of Wyoming.

Vermont has just held her Prohibition Convention—the largest in her history—adopted a ringing platform, and nominated Edward L. Allen, a descendant of the hero of Ticonderoga, for Governor.

Original packages saloons are overrunning Iowa, Kansas and the Dakotas, and Congress juggles with the situation, each house passing its separate bill to relieve the situation, while neither is willing to accept the bill of the other house.

Hyde Park, which voted to be annexed to Chicago on the distinct understanding that its no-saloon ordinance should remain in force is now forced to fight for its right to keep out saloons, in the courts. This is the way municipalities under control of the liquor interest keep faith.

Dr. S. L. Baldwin, for many years missionary to China, and now secretary of the Methodist Board of Missions, is acknowledged as one of the best, if not the best, Oriental scholar in that church; in a late issue of The Christian Advocate he made a powerful argument for woman representation in ecclesiastical assemblies.

The Western Daily Press, Bristol, England, prints an appeal of A. M. Beddoe, vice-president of Bristol Emigration Society, for clothing "for poor families about to leave Bristol for other countries in the hope of bettering their condition." If this Emigration Society is not shipping paupers, what is it doing?

Guatamala and San Salvador are at war, and the conflict threatens to involve all of Central America; Costa Rica and Nicaragua taking sides with Guatamala, and Honduras with San Salvador. The trouble seems to be Guatamala's determination to force the other states into the Central American Union. Here's a chance for arbitration, according to the Pan American idea.

The Argentine Republic is in the midst of a revolution; it was commenced by the Union Civica, of Buenos Ayres, assisted by two battalions of the garrison. The Governor of Buenos Ayres is seriously wounded. President Coleman, after declaring the whole Republic in a state of siege, and calling the National Guards to arms, took refuge on a foreign ship; the revolutionary party seem to have triumphed completely.

HON. E. C. PIERCE, of Providence, R. I., at the New York Temperance Congress took entirely new ground concerning the power of the Federal Government over the liquor traffic. It excited so much interest that we asked him to give his views through THE UNION SIGNAL. He kindly responded by sending the admirable article of which the first installment appears in this issue. We do not often have any continued articles in the Fair number, but the value, the timeliness, and the length of this article led us to make it an exception.

WISCONSIN Prohibitionists adopted a ticket declaring for state and National prohibition of the liquor traffic; for legislation which will insure to the laborer and the farmer a fair share of the profits of their labor; in favor of a liberal public education in the English language enforced and supervised by the state; greater care in the imposition of taxes; a vigilant supervision of corporations, and suffrage unrestricted by sex. Charles Alexander, of Eau Claire, was nominated for Governor, with a full state ticket.

A MYSTERY is solved. Several times lately THE UNION SIGNAL has been taken to task for saying things it never did say, and never would, as they are diametrically opposite to its belief. Last week a gentleman wrote to stop his paper because of a letter published in "Lucifer the Light Bearer," signed by "M. M. Show, editress UNION SIGNAL." That gave us something tangible and the result of our investigation was to unearth a Union Signal in Missouri whose "editress" wrote the article so tinctured with "Spiritualism, socialism and free-loveism" as to make our brother wish to stop THE UNION SIGNAL. Now, whenever any of you see a quotation from the "Union Signal" which sounds naughty, don't stop our paper till you make sure the quotation is not from the other Union Signal; we are ready to bear our own sins but not those of an unknown namesake.

THE United Kingdom Band of Hope Union consists of 16,000 auxiliary societies, enrolling 2,000,000 children. Every year it holds a grand fête in the Crystal Palace. This year was combined with this great gathering a Bazaar, held in Exeter Hall, London, from Monday, July 7, to Saturday, the 12th. The object of the Bazaar was to raise £5,000 for the extension of juvenile temperance work throughout Great Britain. It was opened Monday by her Royal Highness, Princess Louise, Marchioness of Lorne, on which occasion it is stated in the Alliance News, "H. R. H. consented to receive purses in behalf of the Bazaar fund." Tuesday, her Grace, the Duchess of Westminster, presided. The Bazaar was a great success financially, and the fête a most inspiring sight. When our Loyal Temperance Legion can rally ten thousand little soldiers at a similar meeting presided over by the wife or daughter of our Chief Magistrate, the day of our redemption will draw nigh.

WE call especial attention to the official communication of Mrs. George S. Hunt in regard to the prize for the best essay written by an undergraduate in any college, on "The Relation of the Temperance Question to Political Economy." The offer was made last spring, but by a combination of unfortunate circumstances it did not reach the colleges until so near commencement that few students found time to enter the ranks of competitors. It was, therefore, thought best to extend the time until Christmas, holding the essays already received, to be put in competition with those to be written this fall. With characteristic generosity, Mrs. Hunt increases the prize offered from fifty dollars to eighty dollars, for she realizes that to do the work well requires time, labor and thought. We cannot too strongly urge the young ladies and gentlemen of our colleges to compete for this prize. The good gained in studying up the subject will more than pay each for the labor bestowed, even though only one can win the pecuniary reward. The topic is now a live question, and by the time those now in college enter active public life, it will be the foremost question with which the nation is grappling. It therefore stands them in hand to thoroughly post themselves upon it, and competing for this prize offers a fine incentive for so doing. Professor Scomp tells us that in his college such prizes have been offered for years, and as a result there is probably no body of students in the country so well informed concerning the economic bearings of the temperance questions as are those of Emory College, Georgia.

AN original package bill has finally been passed by the House, the vote standing, yeas, 113, nays, 97. Here is the text of the bill which is neither the Senate bill nor the Adams substitute: That whenever any article of commerce is imported into any state from any other state or territory or foreign nation and there held or offered for sale, the same shall then be subject to the laws of such state; provided that no discrimination shall be made by any state in favor of its citizens against those of other states and territories in respect to the sale of any article of commerce, nor in favor of its own products against those of like character produced in other states or territories; nor shall the transportation of commerce through any state be obstructed except in the necessary enforcement of the health laws of such state.

AN experienced W. C. T. U. worker in fairs sends these good methods of work, tried and proved:

A section, favorable as to size and place, secured in the exhibition hall, "for a W. C. T. U. exhibit." (If pressed for the raison d'être, let it come under the head of educational.)

Decorations, vines, bright berries, bunting, flags, with the initials and motto of the society, in suitable letters.

Ice-water dispensed freely and neatly.

Jugs or mite-boxes made conspicuous, for voluntary contributions.

Illustrations of facts and principles concerning alcohol and tobacco so vivid and simple as to impress themselves quickly on the passer-by. For instance, a large chart showing the comparative cost of liquor, tobacco, bread, shoes, schools, etc., by columns in outline and of various heights.

A placard showing the comparative amount of nutriment in a thimbleful of meal and two gallons of beer, using a small child's thimble and an outlined jug labeled 2 gals., in place of the words.

The chromo named "Sweet Home," framed with a margin on which in Roman letters, is the following: A Smoke House, i. e., the price of the smoke of three cigars daily for ten years.

Plenty of temperance literature prudently chosen, to give away. Eyes watchful for occasions to emphasize the facts illustrated. These illustrations afterwards hung in public school rooms.

CHICAGO has five women health inspectors; Mrs. Byford Leonard, daughter of the late Dr. Byford, Mrs. Clara M. Doolittle, Mrs. Marie Owens, Mrs. Mary Glennon and Dr. Rachel Hickey. Their salary is $1,000 a year, the same as paid to gentlemen for the same work. Their especial duties are to inspect places where women and children are at work, and if unsanitary conditions are discovered they are empowered to order necessary changes. In many places the conditions they find are sickening and demonstrated the wisdom of the Woman's Alliance, at whose petition they were appointed. These ladies are clothed with police power, and if necessary, enforce their recommendations by pointing to their star which is usually concealed. Already great good has come from the work of these inspectors. Abuses have been discovered and put in the way of being remedied or abated. Often the terrible conditions surrounding working women in shops and factories seem due to ignorance on the part of employers and employed, and are greatly improved by carrying out the directions of the inspectors.

DONE IN FAITH.

BY WARNER SNOAD.

JUST one good deed! and though others ne'er know it,
Angels will carry it up to the Throne;
At the hereafter, Christ's records will show it,
"Fed thou the hungry? Come hither, mine own."

Just one kind word! and though others ne'er guess it,
Angels will chant it at vespers to-night;
At the hereafter, Christ's promise will bless it,
"Cheered thou the weary? Stand thou on my right."

Just one sharp struggle! though no eyes behold it,
Though to the world we have grievously failed;
At the hereafter, when angels have told it,
Christ's voice will answer, "Thy faith has prevailed."

TWO WAYS.

BY LAURA J. RITTENHOUSE.

"Hurry up, Rachel, and peel the potatoes—it'll take a peck, at least, thrashers are always so hungry. I'm glad we picked the chickens yesterday, or I'd never a got the pot-pie done in time. And the beets and eggs is pickled, that's another thing, and the ham boiled and the pies made. I calculate we'll have about as good a dinner as they have over at Johnson's, at any rate," said plump Mrs. Hodge with housewifely pride.

Then, as she looked at her busy daughter, her eyes lighted up with loving approbation.

"Dear-a-me, how thankful I am that you are home again, Rachel. Seems like I couldn't get along at all without you again. And I believe you fly around faster'n ever; fairly like a chicken with its head off. I don't care what they say, schoolin' didn't spile you."

"Of course not, mother. It never spoils any one with good, common sense, and I inherited that from you and father. I'm glad to be home, too. I never got over being homesick," said the girl tenderly.

"It's a real blessing to father and me to hear your voice a ringin' through the house all day as merry as a mockin' bird. But, land alive! it's nearly nine o'clock, and the beans are to string yet, and the cucumbers and onions to slice. We'll have to hurry or we'll be late."

Twenty minutes later Mrs. Hodge again addressed her daughter. "Run along, Rachel, and put on your hat and go down to the station after the beer father sent for. He wants some sent out to the barn at ten o'clock, to cool the men off a bit." And Mrs. Hodge bustled around cheerfully, quite enjoying the excitement of having "thrashers" to cook for.

Rachel's face grew serious. "Mother, father surely doesn't believe beer cools the men, does he? You wrote me that he never allowed any whisky about the place since that lecturer was here, and I can't understand why he should have beer."

"That's a very different thing, Rachel. Beer is a regular temperance drink. Judge Oakley and Deacon Snyder both say so, and they ought to know, see'ns they're the smartest men about here."

"I can't help it, mother; they are both mistaken. There is nothing cooling or nourishing about beer, and there is alcohol enough in it to produce intoxication. I wish I could see father, I think I could coax him out of it. I've a notion to call him."

"You mustn't do any such thing, Rachel. Father's too busy to be bothered; besides, it wouldn't do a mite of good. You know how set he is; you'd just as well let alone what you can't help."

"But, mother, I CAN'T get the beer. Don't you see this?" pointing to a white ribbon in her buttonhole. "I'm a member of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and have pledged myself not only to drink nothing that can intoxicate, but also to do everything I can to keep others from drinking."

"See here, now, Rachel Hodge, if you've joined a society that teaches you to disobey your parents, the quicker you get out of it the better; you'd better read your Bible, especially where it says to honor your father and your mother," said Mrs. Hodge severely.

"I do read it, mother, and I read that woe shall come to him who puts the cup to his neighbor's lips, and many similar things that I dare not forget. I do not wish to be disobedient or disrespectful, but I cannot get the beer," said the girl firmly.

Her mother looked vexed and ready to cry. "I don't see how you can be so unreasonable, Rachel. There is no one else to go, and your father will be dreadfully angry if the men are kept waiting. They are having a friendly race with the men over at Mr. Johnson's, and the hands will work as fast again if they have their beer."

Rachel got her hat, and without another word ran up to her room and took out her purse in which were two or three dollars she had saved up to buy a new dress. Then she ran down stairs and out to the gate where the old gray mare stood hitched to the buggy awaiting her.

She climbed in and took up the reins mechanically. She scarcely knew what she intended doing, but of one thing she was certain, and that was that she would not take home the beer. She had never before willfully disobeyed her parents, and the thought of doing so now made her heart-sick. She prayed silently as she drove along the shady country road, that some way out of the difficulty might be sent her, so she could be obedient and yet keep her pledge.

"I'll buy a lot of lemons and granulated sugar and make them lemonade instead," she said decisively. "That will really cool them off and do them no harm, either. Father surely will not be angry, for I'll use my own money and do without the new white dress. I'd rather, a hundred times over, than to put temptation in a single person's way."

She sprang lightly upon the platform of the depot, and the station master came up to her wearing an air at once conciliatory and apologetic.

"I'm ever so sorry, Miss Rachel, but Mr. Johnson took the beer ordered for your father. Some one had torn off the address, and he declared he had ordered four boxes instead of two, and said he would take the consequences. He's so anxious to get his wheat threshed out first, that he'd have taken half a dozen boxes of beer if he could have gotten them, I believe. I heard him chuckling over it, and telling his boy they were sure to beat with such a supply of stimulants on hand, while your father had none." And the man laughed, evidently thinking it a good joke.

"That is all right, Mr. Russ. We shall see which wins, after all; lemonade or beer," replied Rachel, greatly relieved at the turn matters had taken, yet hoping with Hodge loyalty, that Mr. Johnson's boast might come to naught.

She bought some lemons and granulated sugar from the one family grocery, and with a glad heart turned her horse's head homeward.

"Mr. Johnson took father's beer, mother, and I'm glad of it. Lemonade and some of your nice fresh buttermilk will be much more refreshing."

Then she explained more fully to her indignant mother, while she was preparing the lemons and sugar, after which she drew some water from the well; water so cold that it seemed almost as if it must have some of the winter's supply of ice in it. A delicious lemonade soon rewarded her labor.

"Now, mother, won't you carry out a big pitcher of buttermilk, and I'll take the lemonade and a lot of cookies. I don't believe the men will grieve over the loss of the beer," she said cheerfully.

Doubtful and perplexed, Mrs. Hodge followed the buoyant steps of her daughter, half in sympathy with her, yet afraid to forego a long established custom. Mr. Hodge smiled as he saw them coming.

"Hold up awhile, men. Here comes something to give you new strength, and to cool you off a little," he called to the busy men around him.

They needed no second bidding, and Rachel's heart gave a little flutter, half of fear and half of triumph, as she thought of the disappointment awaiting them. Her father frowned severely as he saw the lemonade.

"What nonsense is this, daughter? Where is the beer I sent for?"

Rachel explained, while the men muttered among themselves.

"I'll pay Johnson for this—see if I don't!" said Mr. Hodge angrily. "He thinks he's sure to get done threshing first, now, and I reckon he will, but I'll get even with him, if it takes me a year."

"Father, there's no reason in the world why Mr. Johnson should win the race, and there's every reason why he shouldn't. The beer he has taken home to help him will probably be the means of his defeat."

Then, as the men, made good-natured in spite of themselves by the bright-faced, earnest-hearted girl, drank the lemonade and the buttermilk, and ate Mrs. Hodge's famous cookies, Rachel gave them such a scientific, sensible, practical temperance talk, in such simple yet forcible language, that they felt themselves convinced against their will.

Even Deacon Snyder who had happened along admitted there was truth in what she said, and her father, who had listened with surprise and growing pride to his daughter, in his heart agreed with her.

The men went to work with a will afterward, feeling somehow, that lemonade was, after all, quite as refreshing as beer, and threshed out such a large amount of wheat before dinner that when they came to that meal they had such voracious appetites, Mrs. Hodge's hospitable heart was fully gratified.

At five o'clock the threshing was finished, much to the surprise of the workers themselves, who had never before accomplished so much work in so short a time. As they sat on the wide porch waiting for their early supper, a man rode up in great haste, his face pale and his voice so shaken with excitement that he could scarcely articulate.

"There's been a terrible accident over at Johnson's. It seems he took home a big lot of beer, and half the men got drunk, the engineer among them. Two of the drunk men were overcome by the heat and came very nigh dying, and before the others had recovered from the scare, the boiler of the steam threshing machine exploded, killing the engineer, and badly wounding another man. It was all the result of that cursed beer—there's not a doubt of it. The engineer didn't know what he was doing."

Then the messenger rode off, while Mr. Hodge and his men looked at each other in horrified silence.

"Boys, I feel like we orter thank God and Miss Rachel that we're all alive and well here this evening," said one man solemnly.

"We've done the biggest day's work I ever see done, without a drop of nothin' stronger'n lemonade and buttermilk, and we're as fresh as daisies, every man of us. It shows there's two ways of doin' the same things, and Miss Rachel's way has the best of it," said a fatherly old farmer.

"So it has—so it has. I think all this temperance meetin' needs is to pass around the pledge, little daughter. I'm ready to sign, for one," said Mr. Hodge, in a voice that was husky.

"So am I," was echoed by all the others, so Rachel wrote a simple, binding pledge that was signed by all of them; a pledge which inaugurated a new and better way of living in that neighborhood, and eventually uprooted the false and pernicious idea that health or strength can ever come from beer.

LIBERTY AND THE SALOON.

BY JOHN BASCOM, D.D.

Liberty, in its extension and growth among modern nations, has been especially identified with the Anglo-Saxon race. This fact is associated with another fact of equal significance. This race has been preëminently productive in legal science of those conceptions which frame men together, justly and prosperously, in civic institutions. The English have had but few rivals in the world's history in this particular branch of thought. The sense of justice was deeply implanted in the race, and has been assiduously cultivated during a long and prosperous history. It is this fact which has nourished the desire of liberty, and made its accomplishment possible. Liberty is the fruit of law, sound in itself, and the spontaneous expression of the social sentiments of a people. This is the organic force which works its way freely in the state, and leaves so little occasion for forceful constraint. If the sense of law is wanting, its place must be supplied by stringent enactments, and a tyrannical government becomes inevitable.

Prohibitionists are often thought of as pursuing narrowly and fanatically a single idea; but that idea, weighty in itself, is also inseparably associated with the fundamental idea in all free institutions—the sense of law, the cheerful respect which men are prepared to accord to the rights of each other, the deference they are ready to pay to the public prosperity.

The saloon is not simply at war with personal well-being; it has long been, and is increasingly, hostile to the instinct of law among men, and so to civil liberty. All intelligent patriots recognize this fact. There is no form of violence, no licentiousness of speech or action, no disregard of the well-being of others, no corruption in politics, no unscrupulous use of power, which does not find more or less sympathy and support in the saloon. Men like Dr. Crosby,—of whose opinions I would always speak with much respect, not because I think them sound, but because they are held with unusual ardor of conviction, and brought at once and vigorously to the work of renovating society,—while accepting the traffic in intoxicating drinks, dwell most distinctly and cogently on the unendurable nature of the influence of the saloon in a free state. But the saloon is not an unfortunate accident, an unexpected incident, in a trade otherwise wholesome. On the other hand, it is the natural and inevitable outcome of a traffic where phases of mischief are variable, but whose evils are perennial. No traffic can exist in opposition to moral sentiment, and in constant disregard of the best interests of its own customers, and not find itself on a steep incline, with an irresistible tendency to slide to the bottom of the hill. This traffic is in close and increasing alliance with every form of vice by no casual drift, but by an inner affiliation as strong as that of sin itself. High license is an effort to wash this sow and prevent her wallowing in the mire. Its failure in this respect, as in all other respects, is a foregone conclusion.

The saloon never has accepted and never will accept, any essential restraint. It is too deeply pledged to its own interests, interpreted in the most direct and unscrupulous way, to feel the force of moral motives. If it were to admit these considerations it would be instantly paralyzed by them. It has long since sunk below the plane on which moral incentives act except by repulsion. The worst influences are, and must be the dominant ones with it; it can make no head against them, nor is the community at large in any condition to put efficient restraint on the saloon. The community that will tolerate the saloon is prepared to tolerate its evils. It cannot muster the courage, the patience, the moral conviction requisite for this conflict. It has declined, as too difficult, extermination; it cannot accomplish what is still more difficult, renovation. There is nothing in the nature of moral forces, nothing in the world's history to justify an expectation of any serious reduction of the evils of the traffic, the traffic itself being accepted. On the other hand, exactly the opposite tendency is in the forces at work, and in the circumstances of our time. The reckless impulse normal to the business has been fully awakened by the reform temper, and must and will assert itself defiantly, in simple self-protection. There must now be continuous strife between the higher and the lower sentiment, or a clear victory of the one over the other. This traffic is not an evil about to cease of its own accord. It is one that must, from the nature of the case, grow worse and worse, till we can muster courage and strength to deal efficiently with it. This is the only purpose which the experiment of high license—for the moment so popular with us—can subserve; it may convince those who are slow to be convinced, that we are dealing with an evil that thrives on weakness, grows by concessions, and roots itself deeper and deeper under tolerance. Irrational appetite has no rational limits within itself. Though the opposing sentiment is stronger than ever before, so also is the traffic. It commands more money, more political power, and more moral influence of a kind, than at any previous period, and uses them all for an extent and a variety of injury never surpassed.

There is, therefore, no better example of an utter confusion of ideas than the association of this traffic with personal liberty. No prophet in history ever spoke of those sheltering the saloon, or sheltered in it, as having to do with the priesthood of liberty. Liberty means higher social order, induced by deep-seated personal convictions of the nature of law. It means law that needs no promulgation, no strong hands of enforcement—law that anticipates stringent enactments, and renders them unnecessary. If we ever become incapable of liberty as a people, it will be by virtue of the temper expressed and nourished in the saloon. A slow decay of our heart of oak is going on, and if a wreck should overtake us, it would be that hopeless one in which a brave ship falls to pieces by universal weakness. We need as much law as is necessary to maintain the rights of men, the rights of women, children and households, the collective peace of society; and this law, by its cheerful enforcement, must be implanted in the minds and hearts of men. Thus a liberty, fortunate in all its gifts, will grow up, and also a community increasingly capable of freedom, since holding within itself the laws of life. Less law than this will lead us along those deceitful ways of license from which there is no return save under the strong hand of tyranny.

When more men are lynched among us than suffer capital punishment by the process of the law; when the one universal condition of honesty, an honest dollar, seems about to be sacrificed, and we are making ready to cry hurly-burly in the entire field of commercial obligations, it is certainly not an untimely admonition, that we ought to renew our race instinct, to deepen our organic sense of law, that sentiment of justice which opens the way for all liberty. Alien forces, feelings forever foreign to our institutions, find expression in the saloon and are there nourished and propagated in their most malignant forms. Prohibitionists, therefore, in attacking the saloon, are not spending their strength on a single or a detached evil. They are assailing, in its strongest intrenchments, and in its most reckless form, that lawless temper which is the foe of all progress and all liberty.

Let us have as little law as is consistent with the public safety; let us have all the law that safety demands, remembering that liberty is only the second stage of law in which it has been implanted in men's minds by continuous and wholesome custom. Liberty is righteous law, relying on its own reasons with a righteous people. It is as far from the spirit of license which belongs to the saloon, as is a devil from an angel of light.

What a fatal confusion has already overtaken men's minds when they can defend a relentless attack on the highest interests of society as personal liberty! We must arrive at sounder ideas and a better definition of words before we can maintain our bold flight in the high empyrean of national liberty. Our waxen wings are ready to melt under too great heat.

IN MEMORIAM.

BY ROBERT C. PITMAN.

The departure of General Fisk has deprived the cause of Prohibition of a unique leader. There was in him an assemblage of qualities rarely found together. To the prestige which came from the successful management of large public affairs he brought a chivalric devotion to ideal aims. With the executive energy of a man of the world he united a womanly tenderness of heart. "Diligent in business, fervent in spirit," he was also "serving the Lord." Pursuing wealth he gave generously. Appreciating the approbation of others, he was ready to encounter any opposition when duty called him to a forlorn post. Different men have different gifts. Garrison could say, "I will be as harsh as truth." Fisk knew better how "to speak the truth in love." He had, too, that delightful humor which is, too rarely, the solace of those who fight the battles of reform, and which takes the bitterness out of the most earnest speech.

In this hour of our bereavement we must believe with John Wesley, that "God buries His workmen but carries on His work." Nay, can we not rise to a higher thought, that He but transfers His workmen to some better service in one of "the many mansions" in His infinite kingdom? But on the earth side is there no compensation? In life he had "the genius to be loved," and it might be thought that added years would have widened and deepened this affection.

"But Death returns an answer sweet;
My sudden frost was sudden gain
And gave all ripeness to the grain
It might have drawn from after-heat."

With mingled pride and tenderness shall we always remember our departed chief, and especially when we assemble together to renew the battle in which he bore so conspicuous a part.

And as we listen to the abundant eulogy of some who were scant of praise to the living, shall we not recall again the lessons of history, and also take heart in the belief that many who have not the courage to stand by the side of brave men who are in the advance, do yet in their "heart of hearts" admire and honor them?

Sudden death does not affect us in a wise or Christian way if it depresses our interest in life. Rather ought we to strive to work with new diligence while the day lasts. So much is to be done to make this earth the kingdom of heaven, and we have all so little time to do our part! But that "little," that "cup of cold water" given in charity will give more peace at the last, and more solid satisfaction forever than the selfish pursuit of earth's honors.

NUTRITION VERSUS STIMULATION.

BY HESTER M. POOLE.

It is a trite saying that no greater temporal blessing can be attained by man than the possession of a sound mind in a sound body. Yet how few persons have really secured that abundant health which makes even labor a perpetual delight!

A study of the laws of nature and an improved hygiene have greatly lessened the perils of epidemic and contagious diseases beside adding to the longevity of the race. Yet there is much to be learned in regard to habits conducive to health, even among the most intelligent of our people.

In the first place, too many confound stimulation and nutrition. Leaving fermented liquors out of the question, there are foods that seem to impart more strength and vigor to the frame than others which seem to give no such power. The former are stimulants, the latter nutrients. Under the influence of the first class a person is capable of greater exertion than under the influence of the latter. Yet it is in appearance only. With the loss of the food-stimulus comes loss of power. Reaction follows action. He who draws upon his stock of vitality in excess of its normal flow, either becomes bankrupt and is forced to wait till the interest upon the amount of strength invested, so to speak, again accumulates, or he spurs up his jaded powers by stimulus again.

Especially is this the case with that eager, restless, nervous American temperament which is typical of the citizen of the United States. His perpetual activity and haste have become a by-word, and many of his habits tend to increase the very weakness he should try to overcome. He eats too rapidly, consumes too stimulating food, and gives himself no opportunity to rest so that the stomach can perform its office afterward; rushes off to business fifteen minutes after he left it; bends over the desk, the machine or the plow another five hours, and then goes through the motions of bolting his food again. During the process of feeding, not eating, he little regards the amenities of life or enjoys tastes and flavors. With mind still pre-occupied with care he takes large mouthfuls, masticates rapidly and imperfectly, and washes down his supper with tea, coffee, or something stronger, and then out and away again to something else, or sits at home in a state of stupid bovine lethargy till bedtime.

A little attention to dietetic habits will show that such a course of life directly leads to innutrition and a desire for strong drink.

All food is both nutritive and stimulative, and upon the just proportion of the two qualities depends good health. A celebrated physician speaking upon this subject has said: "If the stimulating property be in excess, the functions are abnormally accelerated, life flies too fast, pleasurable feelings are vivid but evanescent, and disease is frequently the result. If the nutritive properties prevail the functions are sluggishly performed, a stupid state of indifference creeps over the frame, life is passed without animation, and actual pleasure seems to be unknown." This is a state of things proved to be true by everyday observation, in the first case, especially. Instances of the latter are far more rare, certainly among native Americans.

In mingling nutrition and stimulation so that they balance one another and produce that golden mean which is true wisdom in everything, nature is never at fault. The trouble lies in the artifices and complexities which man has introduced. They have grown to be habitual so that their tendencies are misunderstood. From a stimulating diet comes naturally the use of tobacco, cigarette smoking, ale, beer, wine, and then the stronger distilled liquors. It is a series of steps; the first taken the others easily follow.

What are these injurious dietetic habits?

In the first place they are an excessive use of meat; in the second, a too free use of condiments and spices. Over and over again has science proved that grain and numerous vegetables contain as much nutriment as the flesh of animals, yet the latter is much more stimulating to the nervous system than the former. After a dinner of rare roast beef the weary man will feel ready to go to work again at once and work with great rapidity. His neighbor, subsisting largely upon fruits, grains and vegetables will go to his labor more slowly but will continue longer and feel less exhaustion when the same amount is finished. The one has wrought through stimulated nerve force, the other through reserved strength. The first craves pepper and spices upon his food, and tobacco between meals, the other rejects them. One readily grows into the desire for liquor, the other never.

These statements are not mere assertions; they are susceptible of proof. In Charles O. Groom Napier's "Cure for Intemperance" is given a series of interesting experiments of the effects of changing a flesh diet for one of grains, vegetables and fruits with the direct result of reformation of the drunkard. These instances, too lengthy to transcribe in this connection, can be found in an appendix to the American translation of Schliekeysen's "Fruit and Bread."

It must be remembered that while stimulation lasts it always produces a false and deceptive feeling of strength and vigor. There may be little or no nourishment in it, in which case the succeeding debility will be in direct ratio to the excess of stimulation. An examination of the power of endurance of people not given to the consumption of animal food will strengthen this position.

"The Polish and Hungarian peasants from the Carpathian Mountains," says a traveler among them, "are among the most active and powerful men of the world. They live almost entirely on oatmeal bread and potatoes. The Polish soldiers under Bonaparte," he writes, "would march forty miles in a day and fight a pitched battle, and the next morning be fresh and vigorous for other duties."

Mr. W. Fairbairn, of England, in the "Report on the Sanitary Condition of the Laboring Population of Great Britain," some years ago, declared that he observed on a late journey to Constantinople, that "the rowers or boatmen of the Caiques, who are the first rowers of the world, drink nothing but water. With the water-carriers they are decidedly the finest men in Europe, as regards physical development, and they are all water-drinkers. Their diet is chiefly bread, now and then a cucumber, with cherries, figs, dates, mulberries or other fruits which are abundant there."

The high caste Hindoos, as is well-known, are ignorant of the taste of flesh which is forbidden by their religion. That they are intelligent, temperate and virtuous is generally admitted. The late Dr. Ananabai Joshee, who was graduated in the Woman's Medical College, of Philadelphia, was an exquisite creature, gentle, dignified, earnest, with the highest order of intellectuality and morality. After great toil, during her three years' residence in this country, in learning a strange language and customs as well as in her medical studies, she embarked for her own land. Sailing in a mail steamer from England to India the churlish officials refused to furnish to one of the proscribed Indian race the vegetable food she craved during sea-sickness and depletion. Even rice could only be had in meat broth. The taste of flesh even in this form was so utterly repugnant to one who had never touched it, that she found it impossible to retain the food in her stomach. In consequence she nearly starved, and during the voyage there was sown the seeds of death which came all too soon to this promising young Hindoo woman, who greatly longed to help her downtrodden countrywomen. She fell a victim to an arbitrary flesh diet, enforced by a brutal tyranny.

The Japanese who are robust, active, healthy and intelligent, subsist upon rice, fruits and herbs. The Greek boatmen who frequent the many harbors of that classic land are lithe, strong, healthy and merry, singing as they work from morning till night, yet their food consists of black bread made out of unbolted rye or wheat with a handful of figs, raisins or grapes. They eat but two meals a day, fasting from dinner until breakfast. "In my opinion," writes a late traveler among the Greeks, "one hearty man in New England consumes as much food in a day as a family of six Greeks."

The captain of a schooner hailing from Portland, Maine, asserts that while the vessel discharged its cargo in that city he saw four stout American laborers attempt, in vain, to lift a large mass of merchandise. Both he and his mate solemnly affirmed that they witnessed a single native laborer of the Canary Islands, at which place it was loaded, carry the same merchandise from the storehouse to the vessel without help. And the subsistence of that laborer was nothing else than coarse bread, fruit and water.

These instances, and a thousand others prove that strength and health follow simple food, unstimulating and uncomplex. They should also suffice to show that nutrition and stimulation are not one and the same.

Correspondence.

JOSIAH ALLEN'S NIECE AT THE W. T. P. A.

CHICAGO, ILL., July, 1890.

DEAR AUNT SAMANTHA: I've seen a lot o' wonderful things here in Chicago—the Board of Trade where the men just holler like wild beasts, and shake their fingers at one another, and then go and apologize and settle up in the clearin'-house (like a "clearin'-up shower," you know)—the Parks, with their wild animals and tame, and posies, and stars and things made out o' what we call "hen and chickens," that'll grow straight up and down as well's any way, and, the best thing in the hull of 'em, the new house where mothers that live in the dark, dirty tenement-houses shut out from God's blessed air and sunlight, can take their poor, tired, sick babies, and let 'em swing all day in the hammocks with the lake breezes kissin' the roses right back into their pale cheeks—and the churches (most all of 'em shut except Sundays)—and the saloons (the outside of 'em, I mean) wide-open Sundays and week-days, and Sunday nights and week-nights, spite o' the law—and the schoolhouses with the dear old flag that my father died for, a floatin' over 'em—and the place where Columbus's Fair's a goin' to be—and the diggin' they've begun for the grand Woman's Temperance Temple, that we're so proud of—and a heap more o' things that I'll tell you about when I get home.

But you remember you told me partickler to find out what women had done—not what they calkerlated to do, but what they could show to a gainsayin' world, and specially to our folks down in Loontown, who think women hain't no "'xecutive 'bility." And I've found just the biggest thing, and I'm so pleased with it that I take my pen in hand to tell you about it while it's all fresh and plain like, into my mind.

Somebody told me if I wanted to see a nice publishin' house, I'd orter go to Room 42, at 161 La Salle Street. So, as I knew you'd want to get out your book about the World's Fair by and by, I tho't I'd go and look at it—seein' as 'twas probable a free show—and maybe 'twould be a good place for you to try your book at.

So I took an elevator and got off at the third floor, and then I went to the number they told me, and there I found a room that I liked the looks of to onct. It was large, and sunny, and clean-lookin', an' there was a high desk and railin', so folks wouldn't bother the clerks at work, and beyond these I saw a lot o' pretty girls that looked just as if they was proud o' workin' in such a nice place—I didn't see one meachin' one among 'em. An' while I was lookin' round, real pleased-like, a girl came up to me and says, "Did you wish to see some one?"

"No, not exactly," says I. "I'm just a lookin' round."

"Would you like to go over our house?" says she. I told her I'd like to real well, if it wouldn't be too much trouble. She said 'twasn't a bit o' trouble, that was a part o' her work, showin' folks round. "This is the business office of the W. T. P. A.," says she.

"W. T. P. A.," says I. "What's that?" Then she laughed a soft little laugh, and said, "We're so used to usin' the letters, 'for short,' that we forget other folks don't know what they mean. W. T. P. A. stands for Woman's Temperance Publishing Association."

"Oh, this is a woman's house, is it?" said I. "Then I understand what makes it so cheery and clean. I'd like to know all about it, to tell Aunt Samantha."

"To tell who?" she said.

"Aunt Samantha—Josiah Allen's wife. She told me to learn just everythin' I could about what women have really gone and done—not what they're braggin' they can do—and this looks as if somethin' was really finished, here."

"I hope we're not anywhere near 'finished,'" said she; "we expect to keep right on growin' for years and years. But we know Mrs. Allen very well, and I shall be glad to show you round, and then introduce you to our Business Manager, who will tell you all you want to know about us."

We walked up one flight of stairs, and on the way she told me it was the publishin' house o' the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and that the best part of the papers and books used by that great society was made there. Then I knew I'd struck a big thing, for if there's a woman's society in this country that's done what it said it was goin' to do, and a good deal more, you and I know it's that society o' "cranks," as Uncle Josiah calls 'em. Don't you remember how he stormed about them that year when Loontown went Democratic by one majority? He said they was just a helpin' the saloon party to get into power, and they'd run the whole country into ruin if they wasn't stopped. But you stopped him by tellin' him you and Thyrza Ann had promised to join 'em, and he'd better keep still.

While I was a thinkin' this, we came to some W. C. T. U. rooms, and between 'em was a door marked "Private." But my guide knew that meant only to keep out folks who hadn't any business there, so she opened the door and we walked right in "This," said she, "is the reception-room, and these are the editors' rooms a openin' out of it." It was just a pretty parlor, with carpet and curtains, and bookcases full of books, and piles o' newspapers hangin' up here and there. I could hear a typewriter a clickin', and some rustlin' of papers in the little rooms, but of course we knew we hadn't no business to disturb the editors when they was a thinkin' out their great thoughts, so we didn't try to see 'em.

After I'd looked round a spell, and seen the pictures of John B. Gough and a lot of other temperance folks that was hangin' on the wall, we went back to the third floor, and went into a room she called the job-room. A lot of men was settin' type an' gettin' it ready for the press, and it looked mejum clean, considerin' it was all men, but I must say I was disappointed not to see any women round; before I could say so, however, we went into a big room that she said was the main composin'-room—and I felt composed into my mind right off. It was the mate to the office, an' just as sunny an' fresh an' neat. An' there was the nicest lot o' women all a settin' type, and lookin' as bright and happy about it as if they'd never heard that women mustn't do anythin' but get married and keep house and tend babies—unless they're "society women," and then they must tend lap-dogs, instead.

Pretty soon my guide said, "I want to introduce you to our forewoman, for we are very proud o' havin' one. I s'pose there ain't another composin'-room in the city where a woman has charge of it," and then she presented me to a busy little woman who didn't want to shake hands because her hands was all black with printer's ink. But I took right hold of 'em, an' says I, "I don't care anythin' about the ink, I want to shake hands with such a woman as you are, once for my sake and twice for Aunt Samantha's," and I gave her three good, hearty shakes. Then we went to the proof-room, where more girls were a correctin' mistakes—an' dear me! I didn't know it took so much readin' to be sure a thing is right afore it's printed. Why, all the papers they publish is read at least four times, and some of 'em more, afore they go to the press. I asked one of the girls, "Don't you get tired a doin' this so steady?" and she said, "Yes, sometimes. But isn't it good to think, even when we are tired, that every word we send out is to help somebody?" I tell you, Aunt Samantha, if every printin' house could say that, we'd live in a different world.

Next, we went down to the basement, and there I saw seven great presses and four little ones, two folders and two cuttin'-machines, all workin' just as fast as they could work. The "flies" on the presses seemed like great, outstretched hands puttin' the printed sheets into place; I was still thinkin' of what that girl in the proof-room said, and I whispered all to myself, "And the leaves o' the tree were for the healin' o' the nations." In the bindery we found girls again—foldin' printed sheets, stitchin' 'em with wire on a sewin'-machine, and pastin' paper covers onto 'em. It seems they haven't got to doin' cloth bindin' yet, but they'll come to it.

But the stock-room was the biggest sight of all. It was just crowded with shelves, and these were crowded with papers and books, and bright-faced boys were flyin' round, pickin' 'em up to fill the orders that was piled on the table. I just stared at 'em—they worked so fast—but I wasn't a mite surprised that they was good workers when I heard they had a temperance society all their own, which meets every week.

Before we went to the Manager's office, I was shown the dinin'-room, with its rows o' tables covered with white oil-cloth, and its cupboards o' dishes, where the clerks bring their lunches and have merry meal-times. By this time, I was full of questions for the Manager, and in a hurry to see her. But when I was introduced—she was a man! I s'pose I showed how s'prised I was, for Mr. Hall (that is his name) laughed and said, "You expected to find a woman here, didn't you?" I owned up that I did, and he said, "If you should ask our Board of Directors about it, they would tell you that they believe a woman could do the work just as well, but they think men and women orter work together in life, and specially in such a business as this, where we are to influoence both men and women."

I tho't this was real sensible, and I told him I knew you'd think so, too. Then I opened up my budget of questions, and they went about like this:

"How long has this association been agoin'?"

"Ten years. It was formed in 1880."

"What makes 'em call it a Woman's Association?"

"Because that's what it is. The stock is all held by women and they must be members of the W. C. T. U."

"I s'pose men can buy some, if they want to," said I.

"Oh, no, they can't," said he.

"Does it pay?" I thought I had him there, 'cause most probable men would have got into it somehow, if there was any money in it. But he smiled a little, and said, "Certainly! Its credit is No. 1, and it has paid dividends right along for years. Last year it paid 7 per cent."

Think of that, Aunt Samantha! Won't it make Uncle Josiah mad to know that women, all by themselves, have got hold of a good thing, and are makin' money out of it, and keepin' the men out of it? He won't say anythin' about women's capacity. Oh, no! he'll just talk o' monopoly and say it ortn't to be endured.

We talked some more about the growth of the Association and Mr. Hall said, "It is hard to keep track of ourselves, sometimes. Our landlord said a while ago, 'If you people ever could tell how much you're going to grow in the next sixty days, I should know how to plan for you.'"

Then Mr. Hall told me a lot more things about it all; how they have about 125 men and women a workin' for 'em, and that the women get the same pay's the men for the same doin's; how they have one o' the biggest and best 'lectrotype foundries in the hull city, and get lots o' jobs, besides doin' all their own work; how last year they published over 125,000,000 pages, every one of 'em good and pure and true; how THE UNION SIGNAL, that white banner o' temperance, "the best temperance paper in the world," he called it, has almost 100,000 subscribers; how the young women have a paper of their own—"The Oak and Ivy Leaf," and the children have two of 'em—"The Young Crusader," that comes twice a month, and the Sunday-school paper of the same name, that is published every month, and carries temperance teachin' into Sunday-schools all over the land. I asked him if everythin' in these papers was about temperance, and he said, "No, if I meant by temperance only not drinking liquor. They talked about ever so many other things that were related to that. You see, we have a lot of 'Timely Talks' and 'Signal Lights' that are just the thing for campaign documents. The National Leaflets have special directions for the work of the W. C. T. U. Then there are the children's and the Y's books and papers. Miss Willard talked about the White Cross work at the big teachers' meeting they've just had in St. Paul, and I s'pose we gave away 5,000 leaflets o' that sort, to the teachers up there."

"And you'd ought to hear," he went on, "you'd ought to hear the children sing our marchin' songs, and the Y's sing from their song-book. It'd make your heart sing for joy."

Well, Aunt Samantha, my letter's gettin' so long I must stop without tellin' you half I'd like to. But if you'll send a postal to the W. T. P. A., 161 La Salle St., Chicago, Ill., asking for a Bulletin of Publications, they'll be glad to send you one free.

Love to Uncle Josiah and yourself, from your affectionate niece, MELINDA ALLEN.

THE PLENARY POWER OF CONGRESS OVER THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

The Constitution of the United States was intended to "live and take effect in all successions of ages." A recent commentator upon the Constitution says: "The delegates who sat in the federal convention wisely, therefore, limited themselves to enumerating the powers conferred on the government and the objects for which they were to be exercised, and left the task of devising the means to those who were to administer the system which they had framed. The Government of the United States has a capacity for adaptation 'to the various crises of human affairs' which is rarely found in written constitutions.

"Although it is the same government which went into operation a century ago, it has undergone the development incident to maturity, and can act with an assured strength which was necessarily wanting at the commencement."

The recent "original package" decision of the Supreme Court has attracted attention to the subject in its entirety, of the powers of Congress in relation to the liquor traffic. Before the recent decision the true constitutional doctrine was understood to be, that, in the absence of congressional legislation inconsistent with the exercise of the police power of a state over the subject, the traffic in intoxicating liquors which had been imported into a state whether from a sister state or from a foreign country, was entirely subject to the control of the state into which the liquors had been brought, and might as a police measure be regulated, restricted or prohibited. Such was the doctrine laid down by the Supreme Court in the license cases coming up from Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Rhode Island many years ago, in which Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court and which are reported in 5 Howard, 504. The recent decision has overturned this doctrine, supposed to be well settled, and established the doctrine that as the power to regulate commerce among the states is in Congress exclusively and not concurrently as respects subjects national in their character, and admitting only of one uniform system of regulation, the sale of liquors brought into a state from a sister state or a foreign country in the original package in which imported, cannot be interfered with by the state in the exercise of the police power, because such interference would be a regulation of commerce among the states, in a matter which should be classified as national rather than local. From the decision of the case of Gibbons v. Ogden [1824] it has been steadily maintained by the Supreme Court that whenever the subjects to which the power applies are national in their character, or admit only of one uniform system of regulation, the power of Congress is exclusive of the concurrent power of the state. The court in their recent "original package" decision (three justices dissenting) have decided, what before was held otherwise as to liquors, that the sale in a state, in the original package, of any commodity imported from a sister state is a subject which must be referred to the exclusive power of Congress.

With due deference to the opinion of this august tribunal, any American citizen may express and still contend for the recognition of his own opinion. I think the "original package" distinction an unnecessary and regretable one, and that the states might wisely have been left to protect their citizens against the evils of the liquor traffic until Congress should come directly to their aid by the exercise of its own plenary powers for the suppression of this National evil. Unless this decision is reversed, the states can only have relief by the interposition of Congress. Whether it is competent for Congress to enable states to legislate may be doubted, but Congress may undoubtedly so regulate the commerce in liquors as to prevent their introduction into any state save in such manner and for such purposes as the state may prescribe.

While it is in order to deplore this decision and invoke the aid of Congress in behalf of state policy in the manner suggested, far more important is it, in my view, that the attention of the people shall be directed to a consideration of the larger question of whether Congress possesses, under the Constitution, plenary powers over the liquor traffic, powers adequate to its complete control wherever the flag floats. After full consideration of the subject, and with full recognition of the important political results which the general adoption of the doctrine I am about to state involves, I am of the opinion that Congress has power, under the Constitution, to deal in the most radical way with the manufacture and traffic in alcoholic liquors, that it can regulate, restrict or prohibit the manufacture, transportation and traffic, throughout the republic. That it can control importation every one understands. The Constitution confers upon Congress power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states," and the same section which enumerates the powers of Congress, concludes in these words: "And to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested, by this Constitution, in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

The power to regulate commerce among the states, although exercised from the beginning of the government, did not receive judicial construction until 1824, when it was discussed in the Supreme Court in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 1. The opinion of the court was delivered by Chief Justice Marshall, and the case is the leading one on the subject. What the court really did in Gibbons v. Ogden was to apply to the facts of the case the constitutional doctrine that in matters of commercial regulation within the jurisdiction of Congress, in case of conflict between a law of a state and a law of Congress, the law of Congress is supreme. The reasoning of the Chief Justice, however, furnished the basis for the judicial doctrine since gradually developed that a distinction is to be made between commerce strictly national, as to which the power of Congress is exclusive, and matters local in their nature, but so related to commerce among the states as to be the subject of regulation by Congress in its discretion, a concurrent jurisdiction remaining in the state to be exercised only so far as not in conflict with existing congressional regulation.

Webster, in his argument for the doctrine of exclusive power said: "It was in vain to look for a precise and exact definition of the powers of Congress on several subjects. The Constitution did not undertake the task of making such exact definitions. In conferring powers it proceeded in the way of enumeration, stating the powers conferred, one after another, in few words; and, where the power was general or complex in its nature, the extent of the grant must necessarily be judged of, and limited by its object and by the nature of the power. . . . Henceforth the commerce of the United States was to be an unit, and the system by which it was to exist and be governed must necessarily be complete, entire and uniform. Its character was to be described in the flag which waved over it, E pluribus unum. . . . The words used in the Constitution, 'to regulate commerce' are so very general and extensive, that they might be construed to cover a vast field of legislation, part of which has always been occupied by state laws, and, therefore, the words must have a reasonable construction, and the power should be considered as exclusively vested in Congress so far, and so far only, as the nature of the power requires."

HAS A STATE ANY RIGHTS THE NATION IS BOUND TO RESPECT?

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The United States Supreme Court decision, rendered April 28, 1890, has affected Kansas quite seriously. At the time it was published, the liquor traffic was suppressed in this state. There was not an open saloon and the "joints" had closed throughout large sections of the state. The capital city was entirely clear of illegal liquor selling, and in only a few of the cities and the western towns, where agitation for enforcement was delayed, was there much or any opposition to our law. But liquor men were not slow to learn they had gained an advantage, and now the original package houses are very generally established in the state, and flaunt their impudent signs in the faces of a helpless people.

The results have been surprising. For the second time the national government seems to be arrayed against Kansas, while it defends a great moral principle. Our laws, which have been repeatedly declared valid and constitutional by the highest court in the land, have been brought into contempt and derision by the same power. Citizens of other states enjoy immunities in Kansas and are protected by United States law in their enjoyment, while they are forbidden to our own people. There is in the state an organized resistance to such conditions, quiet, determined, resolute, and the original package will not stay with us. In many cities the people met before such houses opened, declared hostility, and appointed a committee to protect them from such visitors. In several, after opening, public disapproval and lack of patronage rendered it unprofitable and they closed, "not making enough to pay rent."

The first original package house in Topeka was opened on May 16, 1890. Within a few days there were five. About two weeks later they were all arrested for violating our prohibitory law, and sent to jail. This was the work of our county attorney, R. B. Welch, ever loyal to prohibition. An appeal was immediately made to Judge Foster, of the United States Circuit Court, for a writ of habeas corpus, which was granted, and they were released, and all but one immediately resumed business, while three others at once opened in North Topeka, where heretofore there had been none. The county attorney then proceeded to enjoin them from selling, but before he had perfected it, the original package men appealed to the circuit court for an injunction forbidding the county attorney interfering with them in their business. Yet some of them are doubtless carrying on a liquor traffic which is not restricted to original packages, and makes them liable to our state law; although no decision has been rendered as to what constitutes an original package, and these dealers are handling pint bottles of beer and two-ounce phials of liquor as original packages; and although this injunction forbade investigation as to whether these Missourians or their agents were violating laws over which the United States Supreme Court decision had no influence, the injunction was granted! So we are without police power, or local protection, and the United States Court with every decision puts us in a more helpless position.

Meantime, in Manhattan, a case was brought before Judge Spilman, of the state court. It was an attempt to suppress an original package house under the "nuisance" provision of our prohibitory law. The judge discussed the following points: Citizens of other states cannot have more rights here than our own citizens. A man cannot do as an agent what he cannot do as a principal. As in the United States Supreme Court decision it is allowed that states can by appropriate measures guard against articles of commerce which are dangerous in themselves, it must be granted power to decide what is dangerous, and Kansas has so decided in regard to liquors. The state has unquestioned right to decide what is a nuisance. As the case before him had gone no further, he remanded the petitioner to jail. He has since been released on application for a writ of habeas corpus to the United States Circuit Court. Surely state rights are dead.

Meantime the people, though orderly, are excited. As the Attorney General has said, "The people of Kansas are in no mood to be trifled with at the behest of the liquor power. . . . . But they propose to go about the business of doing away with the effects of these decisions in a decent, law-abiding, orderly manner." It has been determined that our county attorney will violate this injunction; if imprisoned, an appeal for a writ of habeas corpus will be made to the state courts and the issue taken to the United States Supreme Court, so that our rights may be defined by the highest tribunal of the land.

Maynard, Hopkins & Co., of Kansas City, Mo., wholesale liquor dealers, have commenced suit against John M. Wilkerson, sheriff of Shawnee county; R. B. Welch, county attorney, P. I. Bonebrake and F. S. McCabe, police commissioners, J. K. Hudson, editor Daily Capital, and John Gardiner, chief of police of Topeka, for $10,000 damages, and costs and interest, for conspiring to destroy the business of their agent in our city. As this case will be tried in the United States Circuit Court, the decision may be in their favor, but will be only another way to reach final decision from our highest courts. No one will deny that it is our determined purpose to annoy and make profitless, if possible, a business maintained in defiance of public sentiment.

The results of the re-establishment of the saloon in Kansas are deplorable. We have two classes of boys. One whose training has established a detestation of saloon surroundings—and they are greatly in the majority; another whose spirit of investigation leads into danger. Multitudes of boys who never before saw a saloon or smelled or tasted liquor have been drunken during these last few weeks, and the heart-break in many homes can not be measured by the receipts of all the original package men.

Meetings are held everywhere, and the most urgent resolutions sent to Washington, praying for immediate relief. The most interesting of these meetings occurred at Ottawa and Topeka. At Ottawa, during the session of the Sunday-school Assembly, an original package man arrived in town. The news and indignation spread, until, at the close of a concert on one evening, those interested in considering what should be done with him were invited to remain. Dean Wright described that meeting as "ice-cold, red-hot," and said such a sight could be seen only in Kansas, and he would willingly go 1,000 miles to see it. There were there at least 3,000 people, intent on showing opposition. The man was awed into decency, and did not attempt to open until after the Assembly adjourned. He (or some other) did some days later, but before his liquors reached his store-room, citizens turned his horses' heads and billed them back to Kansas City. The other notable meeting was in Topeka, on Wednesday, July 16. A call from the president of the State Temperance Union brought here 3,100 accredited delegates, representing every county in the state, to enter protest against the outrage and memorialize Congress for relief. Two days later, the committee on rules reported the bill. To-day it is to be decided. What a memorable day! During these last three days thousands of hearts are praying that right may prevail.

If Congress does not give relief, then what? The times are portentious. A dear sister at the meeting last Wednesday said she had experienced nothing like it since early war times. A mistake, a needless delay, will be so serious. But, after all, God rules, and all will be well.

THE TEMPERANCE TEMPLE.

MATILDA B. CARSE.

As this number of THE UNION SIGNAL will be read by thousands who know little of the new Headquarters of the National W. C. T. U. it will interest them to have an outline given of the new plans just finished by Burnham & Root, and now in the hands of the builder. Active work commenced on the building June 28th. It will be completed by May, 1892.

The architecture of the Temple is French Gothic. It has a frontage on La Salle street of 190 feet by 96 on Monroe street. The building is formed somewhat in the shape of the letter H, and consists of two immense wings united by a middle portion or vinculum. It has a court seventy feet long and thirty feet deep, fronting on La Salle street, and a similar court of the same length, and eighteen feet deep, fronting to the west. In the front court, facing the grand entrance, and formed in a semi-circle, are eight great elevators which will transport persons in a trice, from the first to the thirteenth story. From this court also rises two grand staircases of marble, which stop not until the towering roof is reached. There will be a central hall on each floor running north and south, and a transverse hall in each wing running east and west. The lower court and halls will be paved in marble mosaic, the upper ones in plain marble. The wainscot in all the halls will be of marble. The material used in the building, for the first two stories, is to be a rich dark red granite, and above that, pressed brick of the same color and terra cotta. But very little wood will be used, iron taking its place wherever practicable, as the building is to be entirely fire-proof.

On the lower floor are to be located three great banks (already spoken for) and Willard Hall. This magnificent audience room which will seat between six and seven hundred, without galleries, is entirely shut off from the rest of the building. It is reached by a long, wide hall opening off Monroe street. The entrance hall as well as the audience room will be lined with marble, the walls being used as well as those in the main hall as tablets on which to inscribe the names of noble women and men as well as societies who have subscribed $100 or over to the building fund of the Temple. Willard Hall will be amphitheater shaped. In the center will be a beautiful fountain. It will have memorial windows, and pedestals will support busts of illustrious persons who have lived and labored and died for the cause of temperance. Memorial tablets will tell of the great and noble departed. Opening off the Hall will be an iron vault which will contain great books of record, one for each state in the Union; the names will be here recorded and kept sacredly, of every person who has given any sum between $1 and $100 to the building fund. From Willard Hall the incense of prayer will ascend every day for the suppression of the liquor traffic and the salvation of the drunkard.

The Temple is to be thirteen stories high; at the tenth story the building line retreats, and the immense roof, which contains three stories, commences, breaking as it ascends into Gothic turrets, from the center of which springs a flèche of gold bronze seventy feet high, surmounted by the beautiful form of a woman with face upturned, and hands outstretched to heaven in prayer over wicked Chicago. On the southwest corner of the building on the street there is to be a beautiful drinking fountain finished with suitable sculpture and inscription.

It will cost $1,100,000 to erect the Temple. Of this amount $600,000 has been raised in stock, the balance will be raised in bonds. The stock has been subscribed by those favorable to the cause of temperance, who are willing to accept of five per cent for the use of their money, allowing the W. C. T. U. the privilege of buying the stock back within twelve years.

It is hoped that in five years this consummation so devoutly to be desired will take place, as the W. C. T. U. has already given and pledged over $150,000 to the building, and money and pledges are coming in daily with increased rapidity. The National W. C. T. U. already own a large block of the stock. The building will bring in a rental of $250,000 a year. After the building is all paid for and necessary expenses, such as ground rent, taxes, etc., are deducted, a magnificent income will be at the command of the National and state unions with which to push on to success educational and reformatory temperance work; $6 from each W. C. T. U. woman in the land would more than pay for the building. Let all who read this article deny themselves a little and send a gift, small or large, for the building fund, to our National treasurer, Miss Esther Pugh, 161 La Salle street, Chicago. Send for Temple Bulletin, descriptive card and a mite-box (all of which will be sent for a two-cent stamp) to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, president Woman's Temperance Building Association, 145 Ashland Boulevard. Chicago.

RAISING CORN FOR MISSIONS.

NCE a wee little girl with two round dimpled cheeks,
And with eyes like a dove's,
soft and fair,
Held her kerchief at once, for the kernels of corn,
Which her teacher placed in it with care.
Then the kind lady said, and in tones full of love,
"Plant this corn for the Lord whom you know,
Th n water it, tend it, and shield it from harm,
And the Lord will Himself make it grow."

Then the wee little girl with her treasure went home,
And quite snug 'neath her pillow 't was laid;
The next morn, ere the sun had sipped up all the dew,
Her neat little garden was made.
And at night she thus prayed, as she knelt by her bed,
"Bless dear papa, and mamma, and Joe,
Please God bless my corn, and just where it is sown
Please don't let the mocking-birds know."

So with watching and praying and tenderest care,
The young blade soon appeared through the sod,
And ere long as it grew, and the wind through it blew,
To the wee little girl it did nod.
Then in time there appeared silken tassels on high,
And bright plumes such as warriors wear;
And the bright golden corn in its cradle so soft,
The wee little girl watched with care.

But when it was ripe and then garnered and sold,
The wee little girl danced for joy,
As ten bright silver dimes lay right in her hand,
And naught could such pleasure destroy.
Now, dear children, go ye and do likewise and see,
If the half of her joy I have told;
Plant your corn for the Lord, scatter broadcast the truth,
He'll reward you a full hundred-fold.

GRANDFATHER'S CIDER.

BY HILARY TRUE.

"Now, boys," said Mr. Perry one morning as he put away the Bible after family prayers, "I want you to hitch up Jack and Jerry to the big wagon and haul those apples over to the cider-mill. You get up the team and I'll come out and help you load."

"All right, father," said Will, and he and Joe—fine, manly boys of fourteen and twelve years—took their hats and started off to do his bidding, while Mrs. Perry gave her husband a look that he must have felt if he couldn't see. But, whether he saw or felt, he made no sign, and proceeded to get ready for his day's work. But he was not allowed to escape so easily, for, when he got as far as the wood-shed, he was waylaid by his wife, who button-holed him, saying,

"Now, Tom, won't you let me have my way this time about the cider? I am sure you would if you knew how it worries me."

"Don't let it worry you, then, my dear wife," he answered lightly. "It is all nonsense for you to worry about cider. Cider never hurt anybody yet."

"No, it isn't nonsense, Tom," said his wife. "The boys are learning to like it altogether too well. I can't bear to think of what may be the result if we keep on having cider as we always have done. I am sure it isn't safe." And the little woman looked distressed.

"Now don't be foolish, Mary," her husband replied. "Just look at father, and look at me. We were both brought up on cider, and have drank it all our lives, and I don't see any prospect of our filling drunkards' graves. Do you?"

"No, I hope not. But Will and Joe might, even if their father and grandfather didn't. You know drunkards are not always the sons or grandsons of drunkards."

"Well, I'll admit that. But what should we do with all those apples? You don't want them wasted, I hope. They are not large enough to eat or sell, and this is the only way to use them."

If Mr. Perry thought this was to be the finishing stroke, he found himself mistaken, for his wife replied, so seriously that he could not suspect her of joking: "Tom, I would a thousand times rather have every one of those apples lie on the ground and rot than have them made into cider to ruin my boys. But then," she added, "they wouldn't have to be wasted, for I have heard you say, yourself, that apples are first-rate feed for stock."

"Well, suppose we should feed them to the stock. What should we do about father? You know he thinks he must have his cider every fall and winter, and it would be pretty hard on him to make him do without it when he might have it just as well as not."

Mr. Perry had begun to feel as if his wife were getting the better of him, so he was bringing up his reserve force. But she was equal to the occasion.

"Well, then," said she, "you could make just a little and keep it especially for him, and let none of the rest of us have a single drop of it. I'll be satisfied with that arrangement, and then I hope my boys won't get so fond of cider that they will think they must have it when they are old men."

"Well, Mary, I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll compromise, if that will do you any good, and make only one barrel of cider this year instead of two. Will that do?"

"Yes, if it has to. I'll try to be thankful, but I hope we shall have still less by one barrel, next year."

So Mrs. Perry released her prisoner, who went off to load up his apples, while she went about her work thanking God and taking courage for even this concession.

The one barrel of cider was duly made, brought home, stored in the cellar and tapped. It was called "grandfather's cider," but he was such a generous old soul that he couldn't bear to drink his cider alone, and would urge all who happened to be near him to partake, while he always insisted that the one who brought it from the cellar must have a glass of it to pay him for his trouble. As this was frequently one of the boys, they were getting fully their share, and much more than their mother felt was for their good. In vain did she remind them that it was grandfather's cider, and urge grandfather to drink his cider himself and not offer it to the boys. He only laughed at her notions, and insisted that anything which had done him so much good all his life could by no possibility hurt his grandsons. And so the cider drinking went on.

One morning in December, Grandfather sent Will down cellar to draw the daily pitcher of cider. Joe happened to be around, so, boy-like, went along to help. While they were drawing it, and filling their pockets with apples, their father, who had started a few minutes before to drive to the village, suddenly appeared at the head of the cellar stairs, calling,

"Will, Will, the colts are gone from the south pasture!"

No sooner were the words out of his mouth than Will was flying up the cellar stairs, two steps at a time, saying to Joe, "You bring up the cider, I've got to see about these colts."

As one of the colts was Will's, his interest in the matter is not surprising. And as another was Joe's, it is no more surprising that he left the cider to take care of itself—which it was fully capable of doing—while he rushed up after Will to see about the colts.

As two or three horses had been stolen lately in the neighborhood, it was natural that the owners of the missing colts should feel some anxiety in their behalf.

Mr. Perry at once drove rapidly away in one direction, while the boys, on old Jerry, galloped off in another, to look for the "strayed or stolen."

An hour or so later, Mrs. Perry went down cellar to get the vegetables for dinner, and the sight which met her eyes would have brought consternation to the heart of any other member of the family. A pitcher full of cider stood under the barrel, which was now empty, while its contents were doing their level best to oblige the little temperance woman by getting out of her sight in any way they could.

As Mrs. Perry shook the old barrel to satisfy herself that it was really empty, there arose from her heart a genuine prayer of thanksgiving that this enemy had been so easily and speedily vanquished.

Soon after this discovery, the boys came home in triumph with their colts, but they were not in a frame of mind to be readily moved to penitence by tales of wasted cider. Will, on being told of his careless trick, calmly remarked,

"Why, I told Joe to bring up the cider."

And when they all looked at Joe, he only said,

"I don't see why you want to make such a fuss over a little cider. We found the colts, and they are worth a hundred times as much as the cider ever was."

As no one could dispute this statement, the subject was dropped, to the great relief, it must be confessed, of the guilty parties. And their happy little mother went around blessing the culprits—mentally—for so kindly gratifying her "foolish" whim.

Before the time for cider-making came again, Grandfather Perry had gone to his other and better home, where every want would be satisfied. As there was no longer any plausible excuse for making cider, Mr. Perry wisely concluded to let his wife have her way, and we may rest assured that from that time to this no apples have gone from the Perry farm to the cider-mill.

DAILY BIBLE READING NOTES.

(Luke 17; Proverbs 8 13.)

Sunday, 17; Luke 17. Verse 5, There is no other instance where the Apostles solicited of Christ a spiritual operation on their souls. We all need the same victory over ourselves, and the triumph of love in our hearts that the twelve needed, and we also should pray for an increase of faith. Verse 13, These lepers had that true faith which recognizes in Jesus an all-sufficient and willing helper. Verse 16, In health, these Jews would not have been found in company with a Samaritan, but misery and suffering break down all superficial distinctions. There is an outcome in character which will make it certain at last that all sinners will drift together and go to their own place; and the same will be true of the righteous.

Monday, 18; Prov. 8. Verse 1, The truth of God that is needful for us, in order that we may be saved, is not hard to find; it thrusts itself upon us. Verse 6, The excellent truths of religion are all just, and plain, and upright. Verse 9, If anything in God's Word does not seem right to us, it is because we, as yet, have not found true knowledge. To those whose minds are darkened by their love for the world, there is much that may not accord with their wishes. Verse 14, True piety is favorable to strength of mind, and helps us in making and executing good plans.

Tuesday, 19; Prov. 9. Verse 6, There are two ways open before every soul, and every person has to settle the question as to which one he will choose. To journey in one of the ways through this world means death; to go in the other way means life. Verse 8, He is wise who values the bitter medicine of reproof, and who because of it goes to work and makes himself better.

Wednesday, 20; Prov. 10, Verse 1, The parents will indeed be happy whose children take to heart the lessons of this book of Proverbs, showing the blessedness here and hereafter of the ways of goodness, and the misery of the ways of badness. Verse 2, How terrible will be the end of those who do nothing in this world but make money by the ways of wickedness! Better be as poor as Lazarus, and righteous, than to live in the palaces and roll in the wealth of the distillers and liquor dealers.

Thursday, 21; Prov. 11. Verse 1, All fraud, deception and dishonesty are an abomination to the Lord. Verse 7, What wretched poverty awaits the rich man who at death has taken away from him forever all the wealth, glory, greed and carnal pleasure for which he has lived in this world.

Friday, 22; Prov. 12. Verse 3, Every young person ought to fix it everlastingly in his mind, that whatever show of splendor bad men may make for a time, wickedness cannot secure enduring prosperity. The proverbs of this chapter should be carefully pondered. Verse 10, We should be kind to the brutes committed to our care; a good man will not be cruel to either men or animals.

Saturday, 23; Prov. 13. Verse 1, A child is wanting in wisdom who does not give heed to the disciplinary instruction of his parents. Verse 5, We should not only abstain from evil, but absolutely hate it. Hating evil is often a greater safeguard than admiring good. Verse 20. One is not apt to be better than the company he keeps, "As bad air injures the strongest health, so association with the bad hurts the best mind."

THE PRAYER MEETING TOPIC.

(The Meaning of Trouble. Job 5: 6, 7.)

No one who passes through this world escapes trouble; and the wise in every case will consider what good may come to them by it.

1. We should never allow ourselves to think when we have trouble that God is unfaithful to us, or does not love us. Christ's conversation with Martha throws some light on this point. John 11:1–15.

2. There is a chastening benefit through trouble that often makes it most useful for character building. Heb. 12:6–11; Psalm 119: 67, 71; II Cor. 4: 17, 18.

3. Trouble is often used by God to thwart us in a course in life which our heavenly Father knows is not best for us, and to turn us into safer and more successful paths. Many a one knows this to be true by his own experience.

4. We should be submissive in our troubles, and always endeavor to see God's hand in them. Read on this topic Mrs. Smith's "Bible Reading Leaflet" for April, 1889.

What I have done is worthy of nothing but silence and forgetfulness, but what God has done for me is worthy of everlasting and thankful memory.—Bishop Hall.

AT MILKING TIME.

BY J. N. MATTHEWS.

At milking time, when shadows climb
The pasture-bars, and sheep bells chime
High up along the sunset hill,
'Tis sweet to wander where we will,
And take no thought of care or time.

* * * * *

There's not in any land or clime,
An hour so sacred, so sublime,
As that when patient kine distill
The wines of life, in many a rill
Of rippling and resilent rhyme
At milking time.

FOURTH OF JULY IN OURTOWN.

BY M. R.

We have had a Fourth of July celebration in Ourtown, a genuine one, I suppose, according to the modern version. The way it came about was this wise: Several weeks ago our local papers began to get patriotic, and called upon all good and loyal citizens to meet and plan for a celebration worthy of our illustrious ancestors who gave to us the "Declaration of Independence," and the right to our freedom in the "pursuit of happiness." The City Fathers of Ourtown accordingly met in council (the mothers were not invited), and considered how best to honor the day, the people, and themselves. They desired on this important occasion plenty of music, a great noise, a strong smell of gunpowder, and a taste of whisky; then there must be the regulation balloon ascension, races and a speech or two. Oh, yes, the "Declaration" must be read, and something about "personal liberty" said.

Of course there must needs be money raised for all this. At this point every man looked doubtful, for, be it known, Ourtown is not noted for its generosity, and the only class who always seem to have plenty of cash are the saloon-keepers, and these "legal holidays," you know, are not supposed to put money into their coffers. But a bright idea struck one of the wise men, and this proposition was made by him: Each saloonist was to contribute a certain sum for this object, and thereby escape all surveillance on the part of the council and police force of Ourtown; and although it would never do to put this on file as a resolution, yet it should pass as an unwritten law that, as far as possible, these venders of liquid fire should be protected, or rather unmolested. There was some demurring at this, but all except one or two finally succumbed to this spirit of patriotism, and active preparations began.

The newspapers announced in large headlines that Ourtown would celebrate, and invited the adjoinings towns to come and bring their children, their young men and maidens, not forgetting the old folks. Flaming handbills and posters were sent out, and as the fateful day approached every one seemed to catch the "spirit of patriotism," albeit there was some anxiety on the part of the wives and mothers who had heard of the "unwritten resolution."

About five o'clock on the afternoon of the third of July, active work commenced, the sound of the hammer was heard, and delightful draperies of the national colors were festooned over windows and porches of both public and private buildings, while the "starry flag" floated gaily from turret and tower. Crowds of people came on the evening trains, and scores of conveyances brought their loads from the country. All the colors of the rainbow, every style of dress from Martha Washington down to the present day, seemed to be represented. My husband (who was a staid Republican) surprised me by hanging a large picture of the "Father of his country" in a conspicuous place among the flags on our porch. The spirit of '76 seemed to have been resurrected. But if you had stayed in Ourtown through the following night, methinks you might have said with Hamlet, "There are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of."

By nine o'clock everything was in readiness, and from that time until four on the morning of the Fourth, you might have imagined with a good show of reality, that Ourtown had been mortgaged to Prince Lucifer, and the time had expired. The report of cannon, ringing of cow bells, yells and ribald singing, flashes of light, with a strong smell of gunpowder, mixed, I thought, with brimstone, were some of the variations calculated to prepare the mind for the day of national rejoicing.

Morning came at last. "Old Sol" was ushered in with firing of cannon and ringing of bells. At an early hour the "celebration" commenced. Starting early to look about, your correspondent found most of the saloons closed, but "original packages" seemed plenty, and one hotel bar was thrown wide open all day long, so that none need be deprived of the "National drink" on this day of days. The long, wide streets of Ourtown were crowded all day. Foot-races, mustang race, Declaration reading, speech making, merry-go-rounds, even the bowery dances, might have been enjoyed without harm; but that open bar, what was its work? A little sketch will suffice.

Men and boys, scores of them, that came clean and bright into Ourtown, before night were groveling in the dirt, worse than brutes. A young man drugged and robbed, covered with a pile of rubbish and left to get sober or die. Some women, trying with tears to persuade their protectors (?) to go home with them; young men and boys going home with a new revelation to their parents. Shade of Washington! I almost expected to find the aforesaid picture turned face toward the wall as I came in sight of home; but no, the kindly eyes still looked out from among the flags, methought in sorrow, that liberty should be thus scandalized.

P. S.—Any person correctly locating Ourtown and sending proper name to THE UNION SIGNAL will be entitled to a copy of that excellent paper from the writer of this sketch.

NO PALACES IN AMERICA.

BY ALICE CLARK WEBSTER.

In the Middle Ages the common people ate black bread, wore tattered garments and shivered over fireless hearths, while day by day and year by year their substance was swallowed up in the building of grand monasteries, palaces and castles that their owners might revel in extravagant luxury, and leave to posterity these monuments of the power of a few and the degradation of the many. To-day as we gaze on these we are fain to cry out with Hood:

"O man, 'twas not of stone you built,
But human creatures' lives."

Thank heaven! we cry, that man has at last awakened and thrown off his shackles, and that we live in the land of the free where no palaces exist.

Do we? What name shall be given those buildings, right in the heart of every city in the union, with marble fronts and stained glass windows, with velvet carpets and luxurious furnishings, behind whose silken and plush curtains red wine flows from cut-glass decanters into cut-glass and silver goblets?

Are such places supported in all their rich appointments by men who have risen in their manhood and thrown off the shackles of slavery? Are we free? Go ask the shivering, ragged, unkempt women and children, aye, the very victims themselves, whose purity, honesty, nobility and brains, are made the foundation of these structures, and what is the answer?

In some of our United States histories, the opening chapter of the Rebellion is embellished with a picture of Liberty standing among cannon balls and other munitions of war, her face averted, her hand over her eyes, while the stars and stripes she is upholding partially envelop her form in its drooping folds.

But "Liberty won," we cry, and our flag floats proudly over a free people. Ah! has Liberty won? Is there no cause for her to weep to-day at the living picture of pleading women praying with uplifted, tear-stained faces, that the Government will assert its high prerogative, by stopping the necessity for the building of these palaces?

As their heart-broken cries go up morning, noon and night, the Government says: "What is all this noise about? What do these fanatics want?"

"We want our husbands and fathers, our brothers and sons freed from the bondage of these palaces! We want less crime, we want less despair."

And the great United States that sends her grains, her fruits, her vegetables, her meats, her ores and her missionaries all over the world says to these starving, helpless agonized citizens: "Be quiet, sisters, do not these palace-owners have to pay the Government for keeping such places?"

Look at the castles money enables us to rear all over the Union, as a menace to evil-doers. He who runs may read: "Sing Sing," "Auburn," "Columbus," "Jackson," "Joliet,"—vast monuments of stone and iron gratings, of broken hearts, desolated homes, and national wisdom.

"But these criminals are ours!" still cry the pallid lips, "our homes are destroyed, our children without shelter. O help us, ye powers that be."

"Have we not helped you, are we not still helping you?" says the Government. "Have we not built magnificent homes for you with a part of this same fund, and written over the door of each costly, magnificent structure its appropriate title: 'Lunatic Asylum,' 'Orphan Asylum,' 'Home for Inebriates,' 'Reform Schools,' 'Homes for the Friendless,' and 'County Houses'?"

Friends, we are living in a wonderful age, but in the broad glare of the nineteenth century I find it very hard to be made to think that Black is White. All along the centuries mankind has left his monuments. Friends, must we leave these things as ours?

*"Carmen Sylva" was the title of the first book of poems published by Elizabeth, Queen of Roumania, and by that sobriquet the royal songstress has since been known in the literary world. She is not only a voluminous writer, and a painter, but above all a broad humanitarian, and is called, in her own country, the "Mother of her people." The illustrated poem evinces as well a tender devotion to "darling bossy," hardly to be looked for in a queen.

Thou visitest the Earth and waterest it: thou greatly enrichest it with the river of God thou waterest the ridges thereof: thou makest it soft with showers thou blessest the springing thereof. Thou crownest the year with Thy goodness, and Thy paths drop fatness. The pastures are clothed with flocks; the valleys also are covered over with corn; they shout for joy, they also sing.—Ps. 65: 9-13.

A LAND TAX.

My friend, Williams, is an extensive farmer. Indeed, I sometimes fear he is slightly afflicted with that land mania which leads a man to wish to buy all the land joining him. At any rate he has bought many broad acres, and is always ready to buy more. Ten years ago, a fine quarter section adjoining him came into the possession of a lady in New York, and Williams, thinking she would not make as good use of it as he could, determined to buy it. He offered her $6,400 in cash for it, the offer was accepted, and the farm became his. He sowed it all to rye; it yielded fifty bushels to the acre, which he sold to the distillers, for his farm was in an adjoining county to the biggest distilleries in the world.

You see, my friend had not yet had the "arrest of thought" concerning the morality of such a transaction, but it came to him through this very rye-field. He was a thoughtful man and good at figuring; one day he thought he would figure up how much whisky his rye would make, and this is the way he worked it out. Each bushel of rye makes four gallons, a little over, but he did not care to bother with the fractions; that is, each acre of rye turned into whisky was two hundred gallons, and that one year's crop of his hundred and sixty acres added thirty-two thousand gallons of whisky to the stream of death. He had never thought of it in that light before; he was an honorable man, and the result of that noon's figuring on a shingle was a resolve never to sell another bushel of rye or corn to the distillers, and he never did.

That was a good thing, but not the thing I sat down to write about. Williams kept on thinking and figuring, and this is how it came out; on every one of those thirty-two thousand gallons of whisky Uncle Sam collected his revenue tax of ninety cents; amounting to $28,800. That is to say, the revenue derived by the United States from the product of his farm for one year was four and a half times as much as he paid for the farm. He scratched his head in amazement, that certainly could not be true; so he went over the calculation in another way; at fifty bushels to the acre, that acre surely yields two hundred gallons of whisky, and ninety cents tax on two hundred gallons is one hundred and eighty dollars, and he paid only forty dollars per acre; the revenue received by government did amount to four and one-half times the value of his land, sure enough.

Now, up to this time Williams had been a strong Republican—he is yet he says "with a but"—and had often laughed at my "woman's reasoning" when I had declared for the abolition of the revenue tax as a temperance measure, but this sum in arithmetic opened his eyes. If through the manufacture of whisky the government can pour into its own coffers each year four and a half times the value of every acre of land raising corn or rye for whisky-making, Uncle Sam would not be the sharp Yankee he is if he should willingly dissolve his partnership with the distillers. But so long as this partnership continues, he is bound by the common-sense laws of trade to protect the interest of his partners, and he will do it.

Now just here comes in the danger which we would ward off by abolishing government tax on liquor. So long as it exists the government will not put down the liquor traffic, for this it thinks will be killing the goose that lays its golden egg. This is the secret of governmental opposition to all temperance legislation; it explains the defeat of all temperance measures in Congress, the open opposition to all "sumptuary legislation" by the Democratic party and the wishy-washy "sympathy with all well directed efforts" of the Republican party.

It is this which furnishes the enormous bribe which has debauched the consciences of even Christian men—unconsciously to themselves probably; it is this which makes the internal revenue the strongest bulwark the liquor traffic has, and because this is true we women of the W. C. T. U. demand the repeal of national as well as state and municipal tax on liquors.

When we first made this demand, nearly a score of years ago, we were laughed to scorn. "What! have free whisky!" our opponents cried. "If you remove the internal revenue tax, whisky will sell for fifteen or twenty cents a gallon; everybody can buy it and everybody will get drunk. A pretty temperance measure that would be!"

Others took us to task on another side: "If you abolish the internal revenue on liquor, you take $72,000,000 annually out of the United States treasury and impose that much more tax on the people" was their assertion. But history has refuted both these arguments.

More and more rapidly the surplus grew in the United States treasury until it reached just the amount received from the internal revenue tax. Meanwhile the eyes of thousands of men had been opened by logic similar to that which convinced my friend, Williams, and the Prohibition Party joined with the W. C. T. U. in demanding the repeal of the tax. God's hour had struck. He showed the nation that this blood-money was not needed to carry on the government, for it only went to form the dangerous surplus. The nation would not heed, but went on clutching its ill-gotten gains.

The party of great moral ideas was again permitted to come into power, as I believe, to give it one more chance to settle this issue. Here it stood confronted with the plea of the Home that it should dissolve its partnership with the liquor power and so set its people free from the greatest curse of Christendom. This plea was enforced by the overflowing treasury, showing that the nation had no need of the revenue and that it was only a menace to the purity of legislation.

But the politicians treated this plea of the Home as they treated its plea in 1884. Instead of cutting off the source of corruption to legislation and danger to the home, by abolishing the revenue which produced the surplus, they contented themselves with reducing the surplus through the most reckless extravagance ever known in our legislative history. So successful have they been in reducing it that to-day the question is not how to dispose of the surplus revenue, but how to prevent a deficit, and government officials are busy giving to the press figures to prove that after all if "we are careful, we shall have money enough to run Uncle Sam's household another year." Isn't it about time that Aunt Columbia took a hand in the National housekeeping?

But what are you going to do about it? Is it not plain that government taxation is the strong bulwark of the liquor traffic? Do one of you believe that if it were left to stand out in its own hideousness, uncovered by the cloak of government "protection," it would live the decade out? Dissolve its partnership with government, and thus remove the bribe which has blinded so many eyes, remove government protection so that the people can get a good whack at the accursed traffic and they will make quick work of beating its brains out.

But what is the government? It is the aggregate of you, and you, and you, my brothers, of all the men in this nation who have votes. Each one of you is a partner in the liquor business so long as there remains a national, state or municipal tax on liquor. Remember this, when you go to the polls, and remember, too, that so long as the Nation annually receives four and a half times the cost of every acre of land whose corn or rye goes into its distilleries and breweries, its politicians will be too corrupt to be trusted with legislation.

HORSES OR CHILDREN, WHICH?

A few weeks ago we visited Ashland, the home of Henry Clay. It has known many changes since his death, being at one time the seat of an educational institution, but has now come back into the family again, having been purchased by Col. McDowell, whose wife is Henry Clay's granddaughter. Loving hands have restored the homestead to as nearly the condition of its historic prime as possible, and it is one of the most beautiful spots imaginable.

To-day Ashland is known throughout the land for its famous horses. The building which was used for the Institute has been transformed into a stable, perfect in its appointments and housing many thousands of dollars worth of horse flesh. We entered it as one might a parlor, chairs were brought us and courteous grooms led out their favorites. There was imperial Dictator, for whom twenty-five thousand dollars were paid when he was twenty years old, King Rene, a beautiful bay, Guadalquiver and Navarre, both only two years old, yet already promising to rival their noble sire, Belle Patchen, Birta, sister of Jay Eye See, and many other notables.

It is said of Henry Clay that when his horse was brought out of the stable he would pass a white handkerchief over its side and if a fleck of dust was discoverable upon it, the horse was sent back to the stable to be groomed. That exquisiteness in the care of horses still survives in Ashland, if we may judge by the glossy coats of the beautiful animals brought out for our inspection; here we seemed to be in the paradise of horses.

From beautiful Ashland to South Clark street, Chicago, is a painful transition and the truth it impresses is more painful still. Here literally swarm men, women and little children, in conditions which make perfect development, either physical, mental or moral, almost impossible. Saloons and gambling hells are on every side, the air reeks with curses and with physical pollutions. Yet in this atmosphere human souls are growing; boys and girls are here being rapidly transformed into men and women. What chance have they of at all realizing God's ideal for them when He created them? And back of their environments is their heredity, bringing to them the curse of ancestral sins, polluting their being at its fountain-head and sending them into the race of life handicapped by their parents' sins, for

"He enslaves his children's children
Who makes compromise with sin."

O Christian nation! can it be well with you when you thus care for your horses and neglect your children? You scan the pedigree of the horse for generations, and carefully guard it against any unwelcome strain; you spare no pains in caring for its mother, watching over its own infant days and in training it for the track. And you feel repaid if, for the few years of its prime, it distances all competitors on the race-course and wins for you premiums and bets.

But the little child, made in God's image, receives nothing of your care. Its father may pollute his blood with liquor, tobacco and licentiousness; its mother is left to suffer all the horrors brutalized man can inflict on woman, its babyhood is so forlorn that the day nursery is its only haven, its childhood knows no care, and government itself sets snares for its unwary feet in licensed rum holes all along its path. And yet, that child has a soul, as the horse has not. There will come a day of reckoning when God will demand the souls of these neglected children at this Nation's hands.

THE FARMERS' NATIONAL ALLIANCE.

Unrest is an infallible "sign of the times" in which we are now living. The Civil War left our country in a torn, disrupted condition, and the only cry was "peace! peace!" For twenty years certain conditions full of danger to our country—unrestricted immigration, the evils of unduly high tariffs, the excess of revenue brought in by taxing liquor and tobacco, the ever-increasing danger from a protected tiger in the shape of this liquor traffic, the race problem in the South and the labor problem in the North—these questions and others have never yet been fairly met, but they must be!

In this year of our Lord 1890 come the mutterings of discontent from all sides. The man who does not recognize this fact is not thoughtful or discerning. The politicians view with unconcealed alarm the action of the farmers in banding themselves together for independent action, politically and socially, under the name of Alliances. No class has been so steadfastly patient under neglect, nor so willing to believe in their political leaders as the farmers. The fact that even now some of the State Alliances hasten to say their work is to be "strictly non-partisan," is a proof of this statement. That term, "non-partisan" has come to be a synonym of "non-entity" in many quarters, and nothing so pleases the professional politician. But it is not so in all states. Thorough independence of parties is often declared and here the politician gets down on his knees and implores the Alliance to be "non-partisan"!

In South Dakota the platform of the Alliance forbids the indorsement of any candidate previously nominated by the old parties. This will be followed by a movement something like it in Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska and Kansas. Undoubtedly the time has come and the spirits of men are ready to receive a thorough political shaking up. But men say "these great questions—the prohibition of the liquor traffic, the equality of woman, class legislation, tariff reform and others, cannot be fully met; we must do a little here and a little there, attempting nothing radical." Yes, and in the meantime the mortgages get heavier and heavier on the farms—the bribery, corruption, and pollution of public morals increase more and more as the natural result of licensing and protecting a traffic in human souls otherwise known as the liquor traffic; public conscience will be debauched as in Louisiana where an infamous lottery bill passed because there was money in it; the laboring man will see a heavier chain than ever of hopeless poverty wound around his life; the rich manufacturers will get richer, our congress halls will be filled with money bags rather than brains, and the grip of death to liberty and prosperity tighten each day. It is not to be so! The Farmers' Alliance, The National Reform Party, The National Socialists, The Prohibition Party, The Union Party. What is the meaning of all these titles? We appeal to the farmers in the struggle that is so nearly on us, to be broad in their views, and to remember that the homes of our land need protection first, last and always.

The farmers of this nation hold the balance of power in it; use that power for the healing of the nation's hurt. In the meeting of the Farmers' Alliance of Minnesota, two weeks ago, twelve hundred subordinate lodges were represented and this means thousands of sturdy, honest men banded together. The resolutions adopted dealt mainly with protection—protection against the greed of corporations, against usurious interest and crushing taxation. This is well, but there is another form of protection more desperately needed—the protection of the home. It is of infinitely more importance to you that your door-yard fence be not made the dead-line beyond which your boy may not pass without peril from the saloon, than that your cattle are protected from pleuropneumonia. The colored orator, Hector, wisely says, "I believe in the protection of wool, but it is first and foremost the wool on my boy's head." The protection of all boys is just as important, even though they may not be woolly-headed.

The farmers of Oregon recognized the paramount importance of home protection when they united with the temperance folk, and made suppression of the liquor traffic one of the main planks in their platform. The Dakotas owe their freedom from the saloon largely to the noble stand taken by their farmers, and we trust Nebraska will repeat this history. In the South the same thought is working, and beside the protection of home, promises to be an important factor in solving the race problem. If everywhere the farmers stand true to the home as we are sure they will when they recognize what is the cause of the home, we believe that out of the political upheavals now upon us, they can help to rally the true Home Protection party, by whatever name called, which, while righting the wrongs giving rise to the present multiplicity of parties, shall prove to the world that it considers its children dearer and more worthy of protection than its stock or the labor of its hands.

In the cities we are under the thralldom of the saloon; it dominates, it puts down whom it will, and raises men to power who are lost to all sense of moral decency and honor. We appeal to you to stand up and be counted as men who believe that women have a right to vote. If you do not favor full suffrage at the outset, stand in favor of giving women the opportunity to vote against the saloon. We appeal to you as men who know the worth of a pure home to stand for national prohibition. Who says it cannot be done? Read some of the "cannots" of past years. The Royal College of Bavarian Doctors declared that railway travel ought to be forbidden, that "The rapid movement cannot fail to produce the mental affection known as 'delirium furiosum.' Even if travelers are willing to incur the risk, the government should at least protect the public!" Stephenson was opposed, scoffed at and his engineers mobbed. Think of Galileo, Kepler, Galvani, Columbus, Fulton, and Morse, if you want instances of popular clamor in the line of "cannots."

Do not make any error of judgment as to the battle against the rum power; it has held sway as the foundation of Satan's throne for centuries, and the battle against it will be the one of Armageddon, but in the name of our God let us raise the standards against it and advance, and may God speed the right!

BONDED WHISKY.

In every letter written against the sub-treasury plan, the right of Government to build and operate the warehouses contemplated in the bill has been denied. It has been pronounced unconstitutional to build warehouses and receive farmers' produce for storage.

C. W. Macune, editor of the National Economist, Washington, on learning that the basement of the post-office, Kansas City, was being used as a storehouse for whisky, wrote the commissioner of internal revenue to ascertain under what authority this was permitted. George S. Batcheller, assistant secretary, in reply, referred him to an act of Congress approved April 29, 1878, and to section 2962 Revised United States Statute. This reads as follows:

"Any merchandise subject to duty, except perishable articles, also gunpowder and other explosive substances except fire-crackers, which shall have been duly entered and bonded for warehousing, in conformity with existing laws, may be deposited, at the option of the owner, importer, consignee or agent at his expense and risk, in any public warehouse owned or loaned by the United States, or in the private warehouse of the importer, the same being used exclusively for the storage of warehoused merchandise of his own importation or to his consignment, or in a private warehouse used by the owner, occupant or lessee, as a general warehouse for the storage of warehoused merchandise; such place of storage to be designated on the warehouse entry at the time of entering such merchandise at the Custom House."

Mr. Macune, in an editorial on this matter, makes this point, which is a good one for farmers to consider:

"Now, if it is lawful to make such provisions for the care of corn after it has been manufactured into whisky, why cannot the same legal rights apply to corn before it has been so transformed? In other words, what particular legal rights has whisky over the products from which it is made? It may be claimed that there is a tax to be collected on the whisky; so there would be on the corn, or wheat, or cotton, after it was taken on deposit. Some will say there is no money loaned on the whisky while there would be on the corn, wheat or cotton. That is not true. There is money loaned on the whisky for a period of three years if desired, in the shape of wages paid for storekeepers, gaugers, etc. At the present time the Government has a loan against whisky in store to the amount of more than $8,000,000, and a storage capacity for 68,512,070 gallons of distilled spirits on hand in warehouses. If money can be loaned to whisky distillers in a blind, deceptive manner, why can it not be loaned to farmers in a legitimate, business-like method?"

Special Difficulties.

PLEDGE.—"I hereby solemnly promise, God helping me, to abstain from all distilled, fermented and malt liquors, including Wine and Cider, and to employ all proper means to discourage the use of and traffic in the same."

FRUIT JUICES.

The number of communications upon this subject coming to us shows the interest felt in it, and it is well worthy of attention. Like every other subject it has two sides to it; indeed, the letters received show it to be many-sided. Some of our correspondents urge very strongly the preparation and preservation of unfermented fruit juice, others as strongly reprobate the practice, fearing that it may lead to the same results that the use of cider does, and also prove an easy medium for the introduction of intoxicating liquors into prohibition states and communities. These are grave dangers and should be strictly guarded against. If it be true, as some hold, that if one has by heredity, or from former indulgence, an unsatisfied thirst for the "wine when it is red," the unfermented grape juice will arouse the appetite, or if through carelessness in allowing the juice to stand open it will undergo alcoholic fermentation, then by all means, banish it from every table.

This is a question which must be settled by experience, not by theory, and we trust our readers will assist in settling it by sending us the results of experience.

Tested in this manner, sweet cider—apple juice, has been found wanting; it is dangerous in itself and in what it leads to. So far as our experience goes, the reverse has proved true in regard to grape juice. The reason was given in a previous issue—grape juice, left to itself, does not pass into a form which makes it a pleasant or intoxicating drink; for undergoing vinous fermentation it requires the addition of sugar, hence it is not tempting, as cider is. So far as we can ascertain, it is only the juice of apples which does spontaneously undergo the vinous fermentation. In "apples" we include crab apples from whosejui ce an intoxicating champagne is made. Grape juice contains more nutriment than apple juice, and if it be a safe drink, this greatly commends it to use. But as we said before, the "if" must be tested by experience.

Each year, through improved methods of cultivation and transportation of fruits, the season during which fresh fruits can be obtained is lengthened; in many localities it lasts all the year round. Where this is the case the solution of the vexed fruit-juice question is very simple; take pains to provide your family with fresh fruit to eat, thus taking the juice in Nature's most approved method. If you wish a refreshing drink, squeeze the juice into water, making all sorts of "ades" in the same manner as we make lemonade. For the seasons when fresh fruits cannot be obtained, can such juices as do not unaided and readily undergo vinous fermentation, test them always upon opening to see that they are unchanged, and if they are, use them as you would in their fresh state.

In this, as in every thing else pertaining to personal gratification, follow the Pauline principle, "If meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no meat while the world standeth."

The Watch-Tower.

The W. C. T. U. of Manitoba held its annual convention this month, at which much grand work was reported, and stirring resolutions were adopted. Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge was present and seems, from the reports of the Winnipeg dailies, to have captured her audience. Of equal value was her work in the convention, giving parliamentary drills, answering knotty questions, and in many other ways helping on the work. Dr. Amelia Youmans read a paper on "Heredity and Health," which Mrs. Woodbridge, who has heard so many, pronounces the best paper on those subjects she ever heard. A pleasant feature of the convention was the presence and hearty coöperation of leading pastors. The pledge of the Loyal Temperance Legion of the United States was adopted for their juveniles. Mrs. Chisholm, the popular and efficient president was reëlected, and the work of the new year is entered upon under most favorable auspices.

These words of Lady Henry Somerset, on accepting the presidency of the British Woman's Temperance Association, cause an echoing thrill in many hearts on this side the ocean: "We need to-day, in the work we have undertaken, two distinct revelations—first, a sight of the power of the Lord, and then we need to go down the mountain-side with Him, among the struggling, surging multitude, and be willing to be instruments in the Divine Physician's hands, to work the miracles of healing which He is ready to perform through us—now and here, in the midst of the din and clamor of this nineteenth century."

Who shall say that the age of chivalry has passed when a high-born society girl works for two weeks in a hot, stifling tailor shop, from seven o'clock in the morning till six at night, just to let a poor, tired-out little girl have her two weeks' vacation? That is just what a young lady, daughter of one of Chicago's Appellate Judges did this month. She had come to know Mary Anderson through the "Girls' Friendly Society," and through her had learned something of the misery of a drunkard's family in a miserable tenement house. The father deserted the mother and nine children, the mother broke down under hard work, and all seemed on the verge of desperation when this friend came to the rescue. Among other things she did for them was to find work for Mary. When the hot weather came on, she saw that the young girl was running down, and arranged with the "Fresh Air" to send her to Lake Geneva. But her employer would not let her go without getting a substitute. She could not find one, so her friend took her place. For two weeks of this hot summer her dainty fingers flew, as from morning till night she basted coarse "pants" in a ramshackle room over a stable, that Mary might rest, romp, and row at Lake Geneva. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these," my sisters, "ye have done it unto Me."

In the carriage which bore Mrs. Massingberd, Miss Ames and Mrs. Foster to the great Anti-Compensation demonstration in London, was Helena B. Temple, editor of the Woman's Penny Paper, the only paper in Great Britain, written, conducted and printed by women. Its pages fully demonstrate Miss Temple's ability. She certainly possesses the "journalistic knack" in an unusual degree; every page is packed full of the freshest, crispiest, strongest material possible. Its first page is devoted to an illustrated sketch of some noted woman worker, but even this is a living "interview" not a formal biography. On the other pages the articles seldom reach half a column in length; but they are condensed wisdom on living themes; for example, a late issue discusses or describes a "Junior Girls' Gymnastic Display," "Woman's Position," "Women, Workmen, and Socialism," "Investment and Management of Money," "National Insurance versus Pauperism," "The Strike of the Tailoresses," "Miss Fawcett's Success," "Parliamentary Jottings," "Miss Colenso and Her Work," "What the Bible Teaches," "Women Inventors," a special department with a "patent editor" (not patented) who is ready to answer all inquiries about the mode of procuring patents—all this and much more, contained in one wide awake issue. Especially does the paper excel in the pith and point of its paragraphs, and all editors reckon "paragraphing" one of their most difficult arts. While in the great procession she and another lady sharing her seat in the carriage, bore aloft a banner declaring "The Woman's Penny Paper Advocates Temperance." Many "God bless you's" were showered on that carriage as it passed.

A DAKOTA WHEAT-FIELD.

BY HAMLIN GARLAND.

LIKE liquid gold the wheat-field lies,
A marvel of yellow and russet and green,
That ripples and runs, that floats and flies,
With the subtle shadows, the change, the sheen,
That play in the golden hair of a girl,—
A ripple of amber—a flare
Of light sweeping after—a curl
In the hollows like swirling feet
Of fairy waltzers, the colors run
To the western sun
Through the deeps of the ripening wheat.

Broad as the fleckless soaring sky,
Mysterious, fair as the moon-led sea,
The vast plain flames on the dazzled eye
Under the fierce sun's alchemy.
The slow hawk stoops
To his prey in the deeps;
The sunflower droops
To the lazy wave; the wind sleeps,
Then all in dazzling links and loops,
A riot of shadow and shine,
A glory of olive and amber and wine,
To the westering sun the colors run
Through the deeps of the ripening wheat.

RECONSTRUCTING THE IDEAL OF WOMANHOOD.

BY FRANCES E. WILLARD.

The sculptor Hart told me, when I visited his studio in Florence many years ago, that he was investing his life to work into marble a few feminine types which should "express, unblamed," the twentieth century's womanhood. The Venus de Medici, with its small head and button-hole eye-lids, matched the Greek conception of woman well, he thought, but America was slowly evolving another and a loftier type. His statue, named by him "Woman Triumphant," and purchased by patriotic ladies of his native state, Kentucky, adorns the city hall at Lexington, and shows

"A perfect woman, nobly planned,
To warn, to comfort, and command;
A creature not too bright or good,
For human nature's daily food,
And yet a spirit pure and bright,
With something of an angel's light."

She is the embodiment of what shall be. In an age of force, woman's greatest grace was to cling; in this age of peace she doesn't cling much, but is every bit as tender and as sweet as if she did. She has strength and individuality, a gentle seriousness; there is more of the sisterly, less of the siren—more of the duchess and less of the doll. Woman is becoming what God meant her to be, and Christ's gospel necessitates her being the companion and counselor, not the incumbrance and toy, of man.

To meet this new creation, how grandly men themselves are growing; how considerate and brotherly, how pure in word and deed! The world has never yet known half the aptitude of character and life to which men will attain when they and women live in the same world. It doth not yet appear what they shall be, or we either, for that matter, but in many a home presided over by a temperance voter, and a Red Ribbon worker, I have thought the heavenly vision was really coming down to terra firma. With all my heart I believe, as do the best men of the nation, that woman will bless and brighten every place she enters, and that she will enter every place on the round earth. Its welcome of her presence and her power will be the final test of any institution's fitness to survive. Happily for us, every other genuine reform helps to push forward the white car of social purity. The great peace movement, seeking as its final outcome a court of international arbitration as a substitute for war, promises more momentum to our home cause than almost any other. For as the chief corner-stone of the peaceful state is the hearth-stone, so the chief pulverizer of that corner-stone is war.

It is said that when darkness settles on the Adriatic sea, and fishermen are far from land, their wives and daughters, just before putting out the lights in their humble cottages, go down by the shore and in their clear, sweet voices sing the first lines of the Ave Maria. Then they listen eagerly, and across the sea are borne to them the deep tones of those they love, singing the strains that follow, "Ora pro nobis," and thus each knows that with the other all is well. I often think that from the home life of the nation, from its mothers and sisters, daughters and sweethearts, there sound through the darkness of this transition age the tender notes of a dearer song, whose burden is being taken up and echoed back to us from those far out amid the billows of temptation, and its sacred words are "Home, Sweet Home!" God grant that deeper and stronger may grow that heavenly chorus from men's and women's lips and lives! For with all its faults, and they are many, I believe the present marriage system to be the greatest triumph of past Christianity, and that it has created and conserves more happy homes than the world has ever before known. Any law that renders less binding the mutual, life-long loyalty of one man and woman to each other, which is the central idea of every home, is an unmitigated curse to that home and to humanity. Around this union, which alone renders possible a pure society, and a permanent state, the law should build its utmost safeguards, and upon this union the gospel should pronounce its most sacred benedictions.

In the nature of the case, the most that even Christianity itself could do at first, though it is the strongest force ever let loose upon the planet, was to separate one man and one woman from the common herd, into each home, telling the woman to remain there in grateful quietness, while the man stood at the door to defend its sacred shrine with fist and spear, to insist upon its rights of property, and later on, to represent it in the state. Thus, under the conditions of a civilization crude and material, grew up that well-worn maxim of the common law, "Husband and wife are one, and that one is the husband." But such supreme power as this brought to the man supreme temptation. By the laws of mind he legislated first for himself and afterward for the physically weaker one within "his" home. The feme-covert is not a character appropriate to our peaceful, home-like communities, although she may have been and doubtless was a necessary figure in the days when women were safe only as they were shut up in castles and when they were the booty chiefly sought in war. To-day a woman may circumnavigate the world alone and yet be unmolested.

Our marriage laws and customs are changing to meet these new conditions. It will not do to give the husband of the modern woman power to whip his wife, "provided the stick he uses is not larger than his finger," to give him the right to will away her unborn child; to have control over her property; to make all the laws under which she is to live; adjudicate all her penalties; try her before juries of men; conduct her to prison under the care of men; cast the ballot for her; and in general, hold her in the state of a perpetual minor. It will not do to let the modern man determine the age of "consent," settle the penalties that men should suffer whose indignities and outrages upon women are worse than death, and by his exclusive power to make all laws and choose all officers, judicial and executive, thus leaving his own case wholly in his own hands. To continue this method is to make it as hard as possible for men to do right, and as easy as possible for them to do wrong; the magnificent possibilities of manly character are best prophesied from the fact that under such a system so many men are good and gracious. My theory of marriage in its relation to society would give this postulate: Husband and wife are one, and that one is—husband and wife. I believe they will never come to the heights of purity, of power and peace, for which they were designed in heaven, until this better law prevails. One undivided half of the world for wife and husband equally; co-education to mate them on the plane of mind; equal property rights to make her God's own free woman, not coerced into marriage for the sake of support, nor a bond-slave after she is married, who asks her master for the price of a paper of pins, and gives him back the change; or, if she be a petted favorite, who owes the freedom of his purse wholly to his will and never to her right; woman left free to go her honored and self-respecting way as a maiden in perpetuo, rather than marry a man whose deterioration through the alcohol and nicotine habits is a deadly menace to herself and the descendants that such a marriage has invoked—these are the outlooks of the future that shall make the marriage system, never a failure since it became monogamous, an assured, a permanent, a paradisiacal success.

SHARP-SHOOTING.

An Exercise for Temperance Societies and Sabbath-Schools.

BY BELLE M. BRAIN.

Many leaders of temperance meetings are often perplexed over their programs, and are glad of any new plan for presenting temperance facts. The following is offered in the hope that it may be of use.

To make the exercise effective it should be literally "sharp-shooting." It creates a pleasant interest to call the items "shot," and each one who takes part a "sharp-shooter."

Distribute the shot several days before the meeting, and as some one is almost sure to be absent, keep a duplicate copy of each item, and the name of the one to whom it was given. Carry these duplicate copies and also the list of names to the meeting. If any one is absent hand his shot to some one else to read. Call the items by number, in quick succession, and put into the exercise just as much "snap" and enthusiasm as possible. Try to drive each shot closer home by a short, pointed comment.

1. A Massachusetts manufacturer, in payment of his seven hundred operatives, gave each one a crisp new ten dollar bill. Each of these bills was marked, so that it could be recognized. By the Tuesday following, four hundred and ten of these seven hundred bills had been deposited in the banks by the saloon keepers.

2. The nation's drink bill—$1,100,000,000.

3. Time is making great changes in the ideas of temperance.

About the time Columbus set out on his voyage of discovery, social custom in England did not allow the drinking of water, except as a penance.

There was also a time when one might be a member of a temperance society, in good standing, on a pledge not to drink more than sixteen (16) glasses of wine a day!

"Eat me, and I am food,
Drink me, and I am poison."

5. The following speech was made at a temperance meeting by a reformed drunkard:

"I have been thinking, since I came into the meeting to-night, about the losses I have met with since I signed the total abstinence pledge. I tell you there is not a man in the society has lost more by stopping drink than I have. Wait a bit till I tell you what I mean. There was a nice job of work to be done in the shop to-day, and the boss called for me. 'Give it to Law,' says he; 'he's the best hand in the shop.'

"Well, I told my wife at supper time, and she says: 'Why, Laurie, he used to call you the worst! You've lost your bad name, haven't you?'

"'That's a fact, wife,' says I, 'and it ain't all I've lost in the last six months, either. I had poverty and wretchedness, and I've lost them; I had an old ragged coat, and a shockin' bad hat, and some waterproof boots that let the wet out at the toe as fast as they let it in at the heel. I've lost them. I had a red face, and a trembling hand, and a pair of shaky legs that gave me an awful tumble now and then. I had a habit of cursing and swearing, and I've got rid of that. I had an aching head, sometimes, and a heavy heart, and worse than all the rest, a guilty conscience. I thank God I've lost them all!'

"Then I told my wife what she had lost. 'You had an old ragged gown, Mary,' says I; 'and you had trouble and sorrow, and a poor wretched home, and plenty of heartaches, for you had a miserable drunkard for a husband. Mary! Mary! Thank the Lord for all that you and I have lost since I signed the Good Samaritan Pledge.'"

8. Twenty-five snakes running through the streets—free whisky.

Box up the twenty-five snakes, and by the authority of the court bore twenty-five holes in the box—low license.

Stop up ten holes so that the snakes can all get out through the other fifteen holes—high license.

Drive all the snakes to the next town—local option.

Kill the snakes—prohibition! ! !

10. The following advertisement appeared in a daily paper:

"WANTED—A nice cottage and grounds in exchange for a choice lot of liquors."

Thousands of drinking men have made just such an exchange. Not only property, but health, happiness, home, the welfare of friends, character, prospects, yea, and their very souls, also, have drinking men given in exchange for intoxicating liquors.

11. My homeless friend, with the chromatic nose, while you are stirring up the sugar in a ten-cent glass of gin, let me give you a fact to wash down with it. You say you have longed for years for the free, independent life of the farmer, but could never get enough money together to buy the farm.

But this is just where you are mistaken. For several years you have been drinking a good improved farm at the rate of 100 square feet at a gulp.

If you doubt this statement, figure it out for yourself. An acre of land contains 43,560 square feet. Estimating, for convenience, the land at $43.56 per acre, you will see that it brings the land to just one mill per square foot, one cent for ten square feet. Now pour down that fiery dose and imagine you are swallowing a strawberry patch! Call in five of your friends and have them help you gulp down a 500 foot garden! Get on a prolonged spree some day, and see how long a time it requires to swallow a pasture, big enough to feed a cow! Put down that glass of gin; there's dirt in it—100 square feet of good rich dirt, worth $43.56 per acre.—BOB BURDETTE.

WONDERS OF THE UNIVERSAL EXPOSITION AT PARIS.

BY JOSEPHINE R. NICHOLS.

National Superintendent of State and County Fairs.

WITH the great Columbian Exposition before us as an established fact in the near future, the marvelous creations wrought by genius and art, and an infinite skill and patience that made the late Exposition at Paris one of unparalleled success in the history of expositions, are more than ever objects of interest to us as Americans.

This was the seventh Universal Exposition held in Paris, and the fifteenth national one. The exhibits of the Exposition which has been called by a prominent French writer a "lecon de choses" (a lesson of things) were included under nine principal heads, and subdivided into eighty-three sections. The different sections were arranged in such groups in their different buildings as to enable one to learn their lesson in "Science" or "Art," "Agriculture" or the "Liberal Arts," in the easiest way possible. To describe in detail all the wonderful things that were presented to the view on every side would require volumes; but there were some attractions that for originality in plan, novelty in construction, and magnificence in appearance, were preëminent as the results of scientific design and artistic finish. First among these, standing out boldly as the greatest triumph of engineering skill in the building of monuments, was the Eiffel Tower. In projecting this unique attraction for the Exposition of 1889, M. Eiffel by no means escaped the criticism and opposition that genius always encounters when it attempts to accomplish any new undertaking. While the government and M. Berger, the "Director General" of the Exposition, gave him encouragement, and the general public predicted a grand success, we are surprised to find such celebrated names signed to a letter protesting against the building of such a thing, as Meissonier, Gounod, Sully, Prud-homme, Robert Fleury, Victorien Sardou, and many others.

In this protest they declare that "such a tower would disgrace Paris;" that "this useless chimney would humiliate all other monuments in the city by its barbaric massiveness!" that "upon the whole city, embellished by the genius of so many centuries, the odious shadow of this odious column would fall like a blot of ink," etc. It is pleasant to know that the signers to this protest afterwards became enthusiastic admirers of the monument.

M. Lockroy, the builder of the tower, asked that the protest should be exhibited as one of the curios of the Exposition with which to astonish the crowds of visitors. M. Eiffel, with full confidence in his calculations, was not daunted by any objections, but proceeded with his labors, sure that the precision of his ideas, and the esthetic beauty of his work, would bring its crown of success, and the verdict, not only of the millions who gazed upon it with wonder, and looked out from its heights upon the magnificent panorama thus presented to them, but the scientific experts who recognized its value for observation and research, has given him the right to believe this.

In the construction of the tower it was very curious to see how little noise was heard, and how few workmen were about. Every part was entirely finished and ready to be fitted into its place before it was brought upon the ground; and the work went on in almost a dead silence. There was at no time any bustle or crowd of laborers, and it seemed more like a work of magic than of human hands, so swiftly and silently it reared itself in its graceful and artistic perfection. The ground beneath the tower was laid out as a beautiful garden with a magnificent fountain in the center, having broad passageways around it for the crowds of people. At the summit was the campanile from which the flag floated, and where the electric search light was placed, and observations taken of the atmosphere, etc. Up here were laboratories for the scientists, and a small room for M. Eiffel. One laboratory was devoted to astronomy, one to meteorology, and a third to biology and micrographic studies of the air. The height of the tower is almost double that of the Washington monument.

The view as one ascended the tower was a marvelous revelation. It stretched out farther and farther as one went up, and new lines in the great picture were constantly revealed. The horizon seemed to be receding, bringing into view new hills and valleys and forests and towns. The most distant sight up to August that had been taken in, was the top of the forest of Lyons, ninety kilometres away (a kilometre is about two thousand yards). The most curious thing about the outlook from the upper platform was, that Paris, so full of feverish life, seemed without motion. It looked like a city struck suddenly dead; and this effect was heightened by the appearance of the buildings, which are white or nearly white, making it look almost like a city of immense tombs all uniform in appearance, with here and there a dome or spire to break the monotony. On looking from the tower, across the Seine, which was spanned by a bridge nearly opposite, one saw the "Trocadero Palace" with its magnificent gardens and fountains. In this palace were congregated exhibits of all works in metals, especially those in gold and silver, from the time of St. Louis to the present. Besides this there were curios of all kinds in literature and art. The principal feature was the great audience hall where concerts were given, and where great international conferences were held upon questions of world-wide interest. In this hall was held the opening conference for International Peace and Arbitration. Out in the gardens were the exhibits of horticulture, and each month saw the whole grounds transformed as if by magic as the floral seasons succeeded each other. Opposite the Trocadero, on the other side of the tower, and beyond the garden in the center of the Exposition grounds, was the "Central Dome" of the Palace of Fine Arts. No words can paint the numberless beauties in painting and sculpture through which one might wander here for days, only to be constantly seeing new beauties.

The Central Dome was itself unrivaled in beauty as it lifted itself up in the air, seemingly so light and transparent that the wind might blow it away; and at night, when illuminated from within, and with its delicate lace-like tracery of decorative lights without, it seemed like an immense globe of crystal in the sky, yet so strong it was, that it held together the immense galleries containing such stores of art as were never seen before in one building; and so large that in its lower hall was congregated the immense concourse of people when the President of France announced the formal opening of the great Exposition, from a platform directly beneath the flying figure that poised upon its summit. Opposite this palace was that of "Diverse Industries" which had its central dome, also a marvel of beauty. Not far off was the "Palace of Machines," which structure was a rival of the Eiffel Tower, being the largest hall under one roof in the world. In here the United States had her crown of glory in the Edison exhibit of electrical machines, which was the largest exhibit of any kind in the whole Exposition. It is useless to try even to mention what was in this great machinery world, which seen either by day, when the light of the sun poured down upon its roof of glass, or when lighted up at night by thousands of electric stars, seemed a veritable wonderland where the necromancers, steam and electricity, wrought out with fairy fingers all imaginary things for the comforts and luxuries of humankind. This great triumph of mechanical art proves that the progress in mechanics has fully kept pace with that made in steam, electricity and railroads.

We passed along by the great glass buildings of the agricultural exhibits, and at the Quai d' Orsay, we saw the "Palace of Alimentary Products," where every imaginable device that human brain had conceived, and human ingenuity had devised was at work producing food from every known material that was available for such purposes.

On we went to the "Esplanade des Invalides," which was considered beyond all others the most unique in its attractions and interest. Here the colonies were placed. Indians were dwelling in their tents, Javanaise in their straw houses. Turks, Senegambians, Arabians, the people of Cochin-China, Madagascar and Annam, Algiers, Tunis and Japan, China and many other countries all lived here in palaces or huts, and carried on their life and daily vocations as they did at home. There were pagodas and temples covered with gilt and decorated with an indescribable splendor. Worshipers made their daily offerings to their gods in the temples; and there were processions in which all these barbarians and semi-barbarous representatives of heathendom took part with all the paraphernalia of their native climes. It was like a picture in a kaleidoscope, gaudy in color, constant only in change.

Among the many beautiful palaces that illustrated this home life of other nations, none were more effective than the "Algerian Pavilion." It was pure white with finishings of green, and its halls and galleries, porticoes, and latticed windows, made up a cool and pleasing picture that was especially delightful to the eye, after the red and gilt barbaric splendors of many of the pagodas and temples near.

But that part where the humanitarian loved to linger, and which showed more than anything else the progress of civilization, was the "Social Economy Exposition" which was on the opposite side of the promenade. Here were shown the hospital arrangements for the relief of the sick and the wounded. The buildings, tents and ambulance trains of the Red Cross Society were also here. There were improved hygienic houses for workmen, and immense halls with all the appliances, ancient and modern, for the care of infants, and for the insane, showing what improvements had been made for infants since they had been bound hand and foot in wraps and strapped in a basket that was suspended from the wall; and for the insane, since they had been chained in the same way to stone floors in noisome cells. Every kind of hygienic apparatus was shown that would make buildings healthy and comfortable to live in. On every side were the results of scientific research and skill to render social life happier and healthier.

In this hall all the conferences were held upon social questions. Here was held the congress for the discussion of the observance of Sunday as a day of rest,—not from a religious standpoint, but from an economic one. All the different leaflets of the "Sabbath Observance Department" of the National W. C. T. U. were also distributed at this conference by gentlemen of the jury of this part of the Exposition, who came to the W. C. T. U. pavilion for them. In this hall the International Temperance Congress was held, where moderation in drink was presented as a cure for individual intemperance, and limitation as a cure for the spread of the liquor traffic. "Total Abstinence" was a term scarcely understood except by a few, and was considered a wonderful advance; regulation was the ultimatum hoped for, finally. A few men, on the alert for progress, came to the W. C. T. U. pavilion for everything that there was about prohibition. In this conference, Leon Saye, the presiding officer, startled the government by his statistics showing the terrible increase of drunkenness in France in the last ten years, especially in the northern part, where the people had been manufacturing alcohol from potatoes for exportation, and had fallen victims to its seductions. There was one thing noticeable in this Exposition of social economy, and that was the entire absence of any kind of liquors, either as exhibits or for sale. Only mineral waters were sold in the pavilions devoted to them; and no restaurants were allowed, except the soup house for workmen, and the W. C. T. U. Temperance Café. M. Robert, who planned this Exposition for the advancement of social health, evidently did not consider even the wines of France a necessity to it in any way. Immediately in the rear of this Hall of Conference, a little to one side, under the trees, in the midst of flowers and shrubs stood the pavilion of the World's W. C. T. U., a strong contrast in its simplicity and retired position to the ornate and fanciful homes of the barbaric people on the other side of the main avenue. It was not only unlike them in this, but in its open hospitality, with its wide doors at each side, near the ground to be easy of access, and its large windows, with only a draping of white lace, instead of a covering of lattice work through which one tried in vain to catch a glimpse of what went on within. It was a typical pioneer American cottage in the woods, the only building where anything was given away. The filter of water stood with the faucet turned out so as to be within reach of any one who wished a drink as they passed by, and near each door stood a home representative in the form of an English and American woman, standing for the two nations of homes, and speaking the language in which is imbedded the word HOME in its truest sense; who gave to every one literature that was for the furtherance of such principles as would advance the cause of "God, of Home and of Native Land."

THE SALOON AND ITS RELATIONS TO THE FARMER.

BY MILTON GEORGE, EDITOR WESTERN RURAL.

It seems hardly necessary to write for farmers on the evils of the saloon. No one pretends to deny the general charge that the saloon is a bad thing. It is my purpose to speak briefly of the relation of this National curse to the farmers, as a class. The licensed saloons in the towns and villages of this country impose a double and underhanded form of taxation upon the farmers that would not be tolerated under any other name. Towns license saloons to help pay their own expenses. They build sidewalks, pay p licemen, build jails, and become extravagant in proportion as the income from saloons increases. The farmers, or their sons and laborers, help to maintain the saloons, and lose their efficiency and often their farms. When the crop of crime is ready to harvest, the farmer is again called upon to pay taxes into the county treasury to cover the expenses of detecting, convicting and punishing the criminals that have been turned out by the village saloons. In addition to this, the farmer pays more than his share of the direct tax by reason of the tangible character of his possessions which are more easily found by the assessor and more readily valued than many other forms of wealth.

Let us concede the necessity of a tariff under our existing conditions for obtaining revenue for the support of government. Under our constitution the only method of raising this revenue is by a tax upon imports, unless we accept the internal revenue system which is too obnoxious to constitute a permanent part of our financial system. Having admitted this necessity, there remains the fact that the farmer pays a considerable portion of this tax in the prices of the articles of food, clothing and the agricultural machinery which are manufactured or imported for his use. Owing to large sums spent by the government for internal improvements, for pensions, and payment of war debts, these taxes form a considerable aggregate which is largely imposed upon the necessaries of life. On the other hand the farmer must sell the products of his farm in free and competitive markets against which there can be imposed no barrier of protection which would advance the price on what he has to sell.

It is very evident that our tariff system inures to the benefit and advantage of the manufacturers and wage-workers, rather than to the farmer, which may be illustrated in the statement that the average wages of the laborer is $2.11 per day, while that of the farmer is but sixty-one cents a day.

The open saloon, especially in large centers, consumes a large part of the wage-workers' earnings, and thus destroys a vast resource which should be invested in the products of the farm for food for their families. The wage-workers being exposed to special temptations by reason of their proximity to the saloon, are more likely to fall under these temptations, and thus spend large sums of money in a wasteful manner. The annual saloon bill of Chicago is estimated to be about $70,000,000. Of this amount probably more than one-half comes out of the pockets of the laboring men and women. This will show that the laboring people of this one city spend each year a sum large enough to support on salaries of $62.50 per month, 50,000 heads of families, or a population of 250,000 people. Of this sum the farmer receives nothing for the products for which he is seeking a profitable market; while this money goes into the pockets of an idle, lawless class of saloon-keepers, or wealthy monopolistic brewers and distillers; and a vast sum of money is thus diverted from the legitimate channels of trade where it would be used to pay for the produce that the laborers' wives and children would use if only they could get it.

The tendency of our time is toward the centralization of population, of wealth, and of power. Cities and towns are increasing in population while country places are being in a measure deserted. In them may be found much of what is best and noblest in education, art, science and religion. In them there is also found much of that which is meanest and vilest in corrupt humanity. The open saloons of these cities are not a menace to the people of the cities alone.

The marvelous improvements of modern times, and the material developments which have brought us the ready means of conveyance of information and for transportation by railroad, telegraph, and daily newspapers, have brought the city and country near to each other. A sort of familiarity with vice is developed, even in the homes at a distance, while the ease of access makes the countryman, unused to city ways and dazzled by its rush and glamor, become a more easy prey to these evils than even his city cousin. The city thus infected by the liquor traffic sends out evil influences from itself as a center and attracts the giddy and the unwary into the range of its own evil environments.

By its influence in politics the saloon has a most serious effect upon the farmer and his best interests. The stronghold of the saloon is in cities, and the larger the city the greater its influence. It becomes a controlling element in politics. It becomes the resort of repeating voters, and harbors a class that is ready to sell its vote for a pittance in the form of a glass of drink. It dictates nominations for local offices, and with its hand on the lever of the political machine, it becomes a controlling influence in state politics. The state holds the balance of power in national affairs, and thus it comes that the liquor interest often has the nation at its mercy. The saloon vote being at all times and in all places, a purchasable commodity, it naturally follows that any immoral or corrupt enterprise that can obtain this vote will have such a foothold in state and national legislatures as often to make it an easy winner over all respectable opposition. Of all resulting legislation the farmer is reasonably certain to be at least one of the victims.

In the great, plain people of the country lies the future hope of our free institutions. If the saloon continues to dominate in all the affairs of the nation, the farmers, to a large extent, must be responsible. They are, as a class, conservative and honest, and constitute a conserving element in our political affairs. When they make up their minds that something must be done, the doing is only a question of time.

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA.

PACIFIC COAST WHITE-RIBBONERS.

No better thermometer for gauging the heat of temperance enthusiasm can be found than the county convention, and California will vie with any of her sister states in excellence in this regard. While our climate is the most equable and delightful in the world, the W. C. T. U. fervor always marks "100 in the shade."

Alameda, as usual, is the banner county and her convention in Oakland was a grand success. Mrs. Sturtevant-Peet, the able president, is indefatigable in her labors, and the temperance cause prospers in her hands. Mrs. L. W. Farish, secretary, gave a splendid report of the year's work. The amount of money disbursed in temperance work has been $3,325.56, and 150,000 pages of temperance literature have been distributed. Miss Henrietta Moore and Miss Matilda Hindman held good meetings, Mrs. Emily Pitt Stevens, in her tour through the country, addressed fifteen meetings, pledged four hundred people, organized nine unions and added largely to the membership. As superintendent of franchise and finance, her work has been likewise most acceptable. The Ninth Street coffee house under Mrs. Barnum's able management has done a business of over $17,000, and the receipts of the East Oakland coffee house in the first two months of its existence have been over $500. Mrs. Burbank, superintendent of evangelistic work, reports Bible study well prosecuted. M. G. C. Edholm, superintendent of press, reported 225 columns of original matter published in seven dailies and fourteen weeklies. Mrs. Weed, president of the Berkeley union, spoke most favorably of the efforts to enforce state law against selling liquor within one mile of the State University. They have battled bravely, and have prosecuted several saloon-keepers for illegal sales. Their victory has cost them several hundred dollars. Haywards and Livermore maintain free fountains and watering troughs.

The Y's, under the leadership of those consecrated women, Dr. Van Kirk, Mrs. Dr. Southard and Miss Rosamond Johnston, are creating public sentiment for prohibition. Mrs. S. C. Borland, superintendent of juvenile work, has four companies of temperance cadets, and one class of girls.

The papers of the convention were all admirable. For lack of space only the program can be given: "Loyal Legion," Mrs. S. C. Borland; "Scientific Temperance Instruction" (illustrated), Dr. Carrie F. Young; "The Neighbor," Mrs. Lockett; "Ways and Means," Mrs. J. H. Rhodes; "Finance," Mrs. L. R. Webster; "Practical Suggestions," Mrs. W. H. H. Hamilton; "The Pharos," Mrs. Mary Franke Browne; "Light," Mrs. E. G. Garrette; "Gospel of the Body," Mrs. E. M. Higby; "Working Women," Mrs. R. R. Johnston; paper, Mrs. S. J. Avery.

An entire day was devoted to a Woman's Congress consisting of papers on the different professions: "A Practical Business Woman," Mrs. M. K. Blake; "Woman as a Voter," Mrs. M. H. Weed; "Women in Journalism," M. G. C. Edholm, presented by Mrs. H. H. Havens; "The World Needs Women who do their own Thinking," Mrs. Emily Pitt Stevens; "Mulier Domestica," Miss S. M. Severance; "Castle Garden," Mrs. S. C. Sanford; "Woman as an Educator," Mrs. R. R. Johnston; "Woman in Literature," Mrs. Nellie B. Eyster; "Woman in the Ministry," Mrs. E. G. Greene; "Woman in Law," Mrs. Hannah Tracy Cutler; "Woman in Medicine," Dr. A. C. Buckel; "Woman as an Inventor," Miss S. E. Sherman; "Woman in Art," Mrs. E. H. Burbank. Miss Cram of the Y's gave a delightful recitation; the University Glee Club rendered a fine concert pleasing all.

The Mendocino county convention was one of the very best of the year. A magnificent country, the San Francisco and North Pacific railroad will ere long develop its wonderful resources and people its fertile valleys with toilers from the East. Many of these brave W. C. T. U. women drove seventy-five miles over precipitous mountain roads to attend the convention at Ukiah. The county was organized by Mrs. Henrietta Skelton and Mrs. Emily Pitt Stevens only one year ago, and yet fourteen unions were represented by fifty delegates. Mrs. B. G. Mast presided most gracefully, and her president's address was a fine plan of work for the coming year. She has great executive ability, and inspires all her co-workers to "do their best." Mrs. Whipple acted as secretary, and as superintendent of press reported active work for prohibition. Mrs. Johnston gave a cordial address of welcome, to which Mrs. Griffin well responded. Rev. Dr. Priddy welcomed the convention on behalf of the churches, and Mr. Sewell, the mayor, for the city. Mrs. Henrietta Skelton wittily responded, saying in jest many a temperance truth, otherwise unpalatable. Mrs. Wade, superintendent of evangelistic work, reported many men redeemed from drink through gospel temperance meetings. Mrs. Barnard, superintendent of franchise, outlined practical work and every mention of suffrage brought applause.

The press department was thoroughly discussed. M. G. C. Edholm, official reporter, urged that every paper in the county be requested to grant space to Miss Mary Henry's Bulletin items, and spoke regarding the wonderful power to thus bring temperance into every home by the secular press. Judge Heeser, of Mendocino City, controlling three county papers, grants a column in each. Other editors are likewise generous. Dr. Priddy advocated the claims of the California Prohibitionist, and Mrs. Skelton spoke for THE UNION SIGNAL and Pharos. "Fair work" was well debated by Mrs. Carpenter. Mrs. Anna Morrison Reed, the noted poet and lecturer, delivered a fine address on Pundita Ramabai Sarasvati. Mrs. Dashiel gave an excellent poem, "Monuments." Mrs. Dr. McKown read a most instructive paper, "The Effects of Alcohol on the Human System." Mrs. Wm. Heeser gave a spirited address on "True Temperance," a ringing call for prohibition of the liquor traffic. Mr. Ward made a strong speech for the Prohibition Party and its honored nominee for Governor, General Bidwell.

One of the most touching scenes of the convention was the tender dedication to the Prohibition Party and W. C. T. U., as a life member, of a precious baby boy, Willie Neal, Mrs. Skelton making the dedicatory prayer. Mrs. Brayton read one of the very best papers, on "Faith." Fine speeches were made Sabbath by all the pastors, and an evening mass-meeting was addressed by Mrs. Skelton and Rev. Messrs. Priddy, Moody, Brutan, Atkinson, Waterman and Dr. Barnes, the patron saint of the county hospital. The music of the entire convention was well conducted by Mrs. Campbell. So enthusiastic are these white-ribboners that a second annual conference will be held in September, in Mendocino City, thus influencing votes for prohibition.

CONNECTICUT.

LITCHFIELD COUNTY CONVENTION.

Our fifth annual convention was held with the New Milford union June 17 and 18. The Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor and W. C. T. U. temperance service on the evening of the 17th was well attended. The Rev. Frank Johnson, pastor of the Congregational Church, conducted the devotional exercises, then introducing the county president left the meeting in her charge. She in turn introduced Miss Helen Haskell, state superintendent of Y work, who gave an address to which all listened attentively. A brief consecration service followed. During the exercises a note was brought to the pastor, and just before the closing hymn he made the announcement that the county commissioners would give a hearing on the application of one of the citizens for a license on the following day, with the request that all present attend the hearing. Six of the prominent men of the town had, previous to this, sent a request that our convention adjourn its morning session and in a body repair to the court room that by our presence we might add our influence against the granting of that license. These circumstances made the devotional meeting of the morning of the 18th one of peculiar solemnity. Fervent were the prayers offered that the blessing of God might rest upon the work of the day; earnest pleading that the license might not be granted; petitions for the young man making the application, that God might show him the wrong of it and lead him into a better path. With an added sense of the importance of our work, the usual routine of convention began. We were given a hearty welcome by our veteran worker, Mrs. M. A. Stone, president of New Milford union, to which was added that of the pastor of the M. E. Church, Rev. R. T. Cooper. The Congregational pastor, Rev. F. Johnson, gave us kindly greeting on the previous evening. Mrs. M. A. Gordon responded in a most happy manner. Reports from unions showed good work accomplished. Eight unions were represented, while among our visitors six unions from other counties were noted, two new unions formed within the year, Morris and Torrington, the latter with fifty members at the start. It was voted that the invitation to attend the hearing be accepted. Shortly before the time appointed the president called on the Rev. R. T. Cooper to offer prayer, then with the reverend gentleman as leader, fifty-two women passed out of the church down the shaded street and into the court room. Until half-past twelve we listened eagerly to those opposed to the applicant.

As the court adjourned for dinner we returned to the church, taking up convention work which was briskly carried on until collation was announced. Notice was given that the citizens would gladly entertain the convention another day if by adjourning we could give further help. After consultation this was not deemed necessary. It was decided that a remonstrance be framed, signed by the members and taken by the ladies of New Milford to the commissioners, while we who could have no legal voice in the matter remain in convention. This was accordingly done, and throughout the afternoon the New Milford ladies remained at the court room, some of them taking the witness stand, while we at the church in the midst of all our work were sending silent prayers to our Heavenly Father that He would grant success to the right.

Mrs. McLaughlin, state superintendent of jail and prison work, gave her report. The county constitution was adopted. Encouraging word was given by Mr. James Woodbridge of the Connecticut Temperance Union. The needs of the W. C. T. U. were ably set forth by our state president, Mrs. S. B. Forbes. A message was brought in and the glad announcement made that the license was not granted. Immediately all voices joined in singing "Praise God from whom all blessings flow." The former officers were reëlected and according to county constitution two vice-presidents were added to the list. Despite the interruption of the morning all necessary business was completed before adjournment.

In the evening an interested audience listened to an admirable address, "Facts and Fancies," by Mrs. J. K. Barney, National superintendent of jail and prison work, who also gave a Bible reading early in the afternoon. Tenderly she besought the husbands, fathers and brothers to do all in their power to protect the lambs of our home folds and to keep the wolves of the saloon at bay. A generous collection rewarded the efforts of the young collectors and with the benediction the convention adjourned.

Thankful are we for the success of the past year, hopeful for the future, rejoicing that in addition to the plans made for coming days we were permitted to assist in doing practical temperance work during our stay in New Milford G. C. NORTON, Co. Pres.

JOTTINGS.

Middletown union has just organized three new Loyal Temperance Legions. The union holds meetings biweekly which are growing both in interest and numbers. In June a pleasant meeting was held at the residence of the president, Miss Mary Burton, each lady carrying provisions for a collation, which was greatly enjoyed. Among the pleasing exercises of the afternoon was the presentation of a purse containing $38 50 in gold to Miss Burton, who has so very faithfully served the organization for so many years.

The colored Loyal Temperance Legion, which was organized Jan. 29, has twenty-six members. It has given one entertainment during the month of May, consisting of readings, recitations and singing, which were all rendered in a most admirable manner, far exceeding expectation Nineteen dollars were cleared; this sum was given to the parsonage fund of the African M E. Zion Church of which the Legion forms a part.

Mrs Fitz Gerald was in Middletown the first Sunday in June and addressed the Sunday-school of the South Congregational church, the African M. E. Zion Sunday-school, also the children at the State Industrial School, and organized a Legion at South Farms, a suburb of Middletown.

A union has just been formed at Westchester with twenty-one members. M. BELLE SMITH, MISSISSIPPI.

NEWS AND NOTES.

The W C. T. U. of Mississippi at their annual convention in May, resolved to remove the state headquarters from Meridian to Jackson. This move meets with opposition from the mighty City of the East, but is a most desirable change, Jackson being the capital of the state and more central in its location. An eligible lot has been purchased and a commodious building will be erected thereon with rooms for our state paper and also for the conduct of the Woman's Exchange.

The capital city will not be a bed of roses for the White Ribbon, but Mrs. Kells (unlike many Jackson editors) will keep her paper afloat, pure and unspotted, above the whisky slums and political pitfalls that mar and scar that beautiful city of bishops and ministers and prominent laymen, whose combined influence, so far, has not been sufficient to overcome the whisky demon that awaits his prey in the capital city as nowhere else. "Strong men" have gone down before him and his allies, but the White Ribbon, manned by a woman, asking no favors and expecting none, will not go down in history as one of the papers that obligated itself to a political boss or a whisky ringster. This thought arises from the expressed fear of a prominent Prohibitionist that the W. C. T. U. may become contaminated by associations into which they will be thrown. But the Governor's mansion is a stronghold for W. C. T. U. women and Mrs. Gov. Stone has offered her parlors to one of our committees. Other true-hearted Jackson women will uphold the hands of our editor, and it remains for the unions all over the state to maintain this enterprise, with promise of more good than anything else ever attempted by our organization.

The Prohibitionists of Mississippi are determined to secure constitutional prohibition at the convention which meets in August. It will be their own fault if they do not get it However, there has been a division in their ranks, and if defeat comes the main responsibility will rest here. As a result of this, some favor the old local option law, while others have set their faces like a flint toward statutory prohibition, and God grant they may get it! We may be trammeled, perplexed, bewildered, even, by the strangeness of humanity, but we cannot be dismayed in a cause like this, and the truest, bravest men and women of the state are going forward.

The declaration of principles adopted at the recent prohibition state convention stands for constitutional prohibition, demands that no license system be engrafted on the new Constitution, favors scientific instruction, and recommends a ceaseless agitation until a complete victory is won. The new executive committee have Rev. J B. Gambrell as chairman and are as one man on the "constitutional" question. A majority, so far, of the delegates to the convention are Prohibitionists, aggressive and true. However, Prohibitionists concede that in that convention the leading issue will be ballot reform, and they are willing to make Prohibition secondary to this, believing as they do that, based upon intelligence, the ballots of the people will win for them their hearts' desire It is needless to say that the "race question" engenders this willingness. A majority of the educated colored people and of the white people of our state are Prohibitionists.

At the state prohibition convention the W. C. T. U. was represented by a trio of our most intellectual and brilliant sisters:—Mrs. H. B. Kells, Mrs. Adelia M. Hillman and Miss Addie Purnell. The convention indorsed the White Ribbon.

Be it remembered that prohibition has on "seven league boots" in Mississippi and will find its bag of gold somewhere short of the end of the rainbow.

NEW YORK.

CHAUTAUQUA COUNTY CONVENTION.

This was held at Chautauqua June 3 and 4. We were all impressed by the fact that we were on ground made historic by the organization, sixteen years ago, of the National union. This event was celebrated in a most practical and appropriate way, by holding the largest and best convention in our history.

We were made thrice welcome by the addresses of the oldest member of the county union, Mrs. Flint, of Chautauqua, eighty-one years of age, of Rev. Mr. Elson, pastor of the church, and the following letter from Bishop J. H. Vincent, Chancellor of Chautauqua University:

To the Members of Chautauqua County Woman's Christian Temperance Union,

DEAR "SISTERS OF THE PEOPLE;"—As an officer of the Chautauqua Assembly, having charge of the department of instruction and public meetings at Chautauqua, I take pleasure in thus giving my official approval of the act by which your convention has been brought for this year, to the Assembly grounds. It seems fitting that you should meet in the place where sixteen years ago, your now world-wide organization was begun.

The work of agitation in the interest of temperance which your union has accomplished is phenomenal; and the agitation has resulted in great good to the cause of temperance, Christian morality, and religious faith.

Wishing you the largest success in all legitimate and judiciously conducted effort in behalf of temperance, and praying that your meeting may be full of wisdom, harmony and power, I remain your servant in the cause of religion, righteousness and reform,

JOHN H. VINCENT.

The address of our president, Mrs. Amanda F. Mason, was an able résumé of the work accomplished, and the opportunities before us; arguing strongly for the principles on which our organization is founded, and urging us to dare to undertake great things through faith in our Divine Leader. Of necessity the convention reluctantly and sadly accepted her resignation, after four years of most successful leadership, feeling that it thus lost, for the time, at least, one of the most able and dignified presiding officers in the state.

Mrs. A. S. Benjamin, of Michigan, contributed greatly to the instruction and gratification of the convention by conducting a question drawer; a parliamentary drill in which she showed herself skillful in making learning pleasant and easy; and by an excellent address in the evening, clearly presenting the need of temperance work in the church, led by the ministers, and incidentally showing some of the fallacies of high license.

Very full reports were given by the superintendents of departments. The presentation of the banner to the union having the largest percentage of increase was made by Mrs Mattie S. Mead to the Jamestown union. Good music through all the meetings was a marked feature.

The exercises of the Loyal Temperance Legion of Chautauqua were most inspiring, and the session closed with a "Y" evening which was very successful as regards both instruction and entertainment.

The following officers were elected: President, Mrs. Mattie S. Mead; vice-president, Mrs. Lucy Ellsworth; corresponding secretary, Mrs. J. E. Almy; recording secretary, Mrs. Rose E. Putnam; treasurer, Miss M. L. Stevens. MRS. MATTIE S. MEAD.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

Washington county, Iowa, W. C. T. U. convened May 27, in the M. E. Church, Washington. Number of members of convention present, twenty-five. Mrs. S. M. I. Henry, National evangelist, assisted and gave several able lectures. Mrs. M. H. M. Blair was reëlected president; Miss Maggie Duff, secretary; Mrs. E. B. Scofield, treasurer; Mrs. F. A. McDowell, chairman of auditing committee. Number of subscribers to the Messenger, ten; to THE UNION SIGNAL, sixty-four.

THE W. C. T. U. of Newport, Ky., keeps a good supply of literature in the wall-pockets placed in various public quarters. The most effective work of the society has been among the prisoners. The Newport and Covington jails are both regularly visited. Mrs. James Corbet's work is spoken of as especially successful among the prisoners, several having found Christ through her influence and faithfulness. The president, Mrs. Dr. Lewis, is untiring in her efforts, and spends a large proportion of her time in visiting the sick, filling wall-pockets, ministering to the necessities of the poor, and doing all in her power for the temperance cause.

MISS FANNIE ARMSTRONG, superintendent of the Loyal Temperance Legion of the Dallas W. C. T. U., organized a Loyal Temperance Legion in the Floyd Street M. E. Church, South, June 29, with sixteen members. The following officers were elected: President, Mr. John McIntosh; vice-president, Miss Roxie Hughes; recording secretary, Mr. Robert McClendon; corresponding secretary, Miss Emma Gooding; treasurer, Miss Lizzie Wheeless, Mrs. Anna Martin, leader of the "Little Workers," honorary member.

THE members of the W. C. T. U. of Knightstown, Indiana, were fortunate in recently securing the services of Mrs. Trego, state evangelist and lecturer of Ohio, for a series of meetings. Three evening and one afternoon meeting were held, all well attended, and the people express themselves as well entertained. The city papers, the Sun and Banner, spoke well of Mrs. Trego's lectures. The Banner said: "Would that all parents in the city could have heard her earnest appeal for the suppression of evils which so glaringly menace the future of our sons and daughters!" In her lecture on "Popular Fallacies" she warmly espoused the cause of woman's suffrage, her arguments in support thereof being simply unanswerable.

IT is not often that a church service is punctuated by applause, but this happened lately in Minneapolis. Mrs. E. R. Newcomb, state organizer of W. C. T. U. gave an address in Dr. McLaurin's church. At its close the pastor arose to say a few words. He touched on politics a bit, and at last gave utterance to this sentiment: "I had rather see the noble old Republican charger lie down and die in its tracks than to be bridled, saddled and ridden by the saloon," and was heartily applauded.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

MISS WILLARD'S BIRTHDAY.

The National organizer and chalk talker for the Loyal Temperance Legions, Mrs. Ellen A. Blair, requests that all the Loyal Temperance Legions of the United States make Sept. 28, 1890, Miss Willard's birthday, a day of prayer and contributions for the "Great Battle" now being fought to save the children of Nebraska from the curse of the saloon. She suggests that a union mass-meeting be held upon that day by the Loyal Temperance Legions and Sunday-schools, inviting their parents and friends to listen to their songs and recitations. In connection with the anniversary exercises, brief talks on the prohibitory amendment, and simple questions as to what it is and what it will do, should be interspersed by those familiar with the subject. A vote should be taken at this meeting as an expression of how the children would vote if they could, upon this subject. At the close a liberal collection should be solicited, with the explanation, and sent to Mrs. M. A. Hitchcock, Lincoln, Neb., state president of the W. C. T. U.. A package of leaflets containing appropriate selections of songs and recitations for such a meeting, with questions and answers on the prohibitory amendment, can be obtained by sending ten cents to Mrs. E. A. Blair, Creighton, Neb. This is heartily indorsed by MRS. HELEN G. RICE, Nat. Supt. Juvenile Dept.

MISS ANNA GORDON, Associate Supt. Juv. Dept.

MRS. P. C. TEMPLE.

If a Good Idea Why Not Try It?

Please send me the set of eight books for $1.50. Your Circulating Library scheme, as it might be called, is one I have followed for years with religious books, offering them to friends with warm approval and urging them to read them. I have lent Christian's Secret to dozens of people,—and many other books. I think I shall follow your plan with Temperance books, too. MISS C. C. W.

New Publications.

Try the new Responsive Readings for the L. T. L. Eight numbers are ready. They have new music, bright pieces of poetry, Scripture readings and good information on live topics. Three cents each, samples free.

National Prohibitory Amendment Leaflets.

Three numbers are ready. The first is the basis of all such work—the constitution of the United States. The second discusses the amendment to the constitution submitted by Senator Blair in 1887.

The third is an extract from Senator Blair's great book, "The Temperance Movement," and outlines what National Prohibition is and how attained. Get these leaflets going. Your strongest Republican can find no word of fault with them, not even the Iowa non-partisans. So get them going, as that means Education. 100 sent postpaid for 50 cts.

Melinda Allen's Letter,

In this number of THE UNION SIGNAL, can be had in leaflet form with a cute and catchy cover, free in any reasonable number for those who will write asking for them for distribution.

For 25 Cents–

We will send you the "Handy Manual," over 300 pages packed full of valuable tables, statistics and information, and also the paper bound edition of either "Boys and Other Boys" or "Girls of To-day." The regular price of any one is twenty-five cents. We make this offer for a short time only. We will give any two of the three above named books as a premium for getting one new subscriber to THE UNION SIGNAL at $1. Generous enough to overcome 90 in the shade.

The Temperance Circus Tent

SPLENDID PROGRESS.
Started late in 1889 with no population or improvements, the development already made is surprising. Five factories are building, and several companies organized to build others. No booms, but steady, substantial progress. A knitting factory company is organized, the stock to be all owned, and entire business managed by women. It will pay large profits. Those who want homes in a "clean city," where the rumshop, brothel and gambling den are perpetually excluded, should buy soon, as prices are rapidly advancing.
PROFITABLE INVESTMENT.
Stock in the Demorest Home, Mining and Improvement Company will pay large profits. There are also good opportunities to make paying investments in several manufacturing enterprises. For ful information address

Nasal Catarrh can be easily, quickly, pleasantly, and lastingly cured, providing one KNOWS HOW. I do know how, can do it, and guarantee just such a cure. MY HEALING CATARRH POWDER (perfectly soluble) will positively and effectually cure in a few days only any ordinary case not complicated with scrofula. There is no humbug and no disappointment about it. I know what I am talking about, and what I say is the TRUTH; if not, denounce me in this paper as a fraud. Many thousand packages sold in past twelve years, and I hereby declare upon oath that I seldom have a complaint, and do not know of a failure to cure in all that time. It is perfectly harmless, safe and pleasant to use, clears the head without sneezing, purifies, heals, stops and cures every discharge from the nose, sweetens the breath, and cures catarrh in all its stages. A package, enough to last two weeks, and more than enough to surely and infallibly cure nearly every case, sent post-paid for only 25 cents by GEO. N. STODDARD, 1226 Niagara St., Buffalo, N. Publisher's Notes.

In One Bushel of Corn.

This is how some one figures it out: From a bushel of corn a distiller gets four gallons of whisky, which retails at $16; the Government gets $3.60, the farmer who raised the corn gets forty cents, the railroad gets $1, the manufacturer gets $4, the retailer gets $7, and the consumer gets drunk. No wonder so many Kansas farmers are using corn as fuel.—New York Tribune.

Facts, Facts, Facts

are what the people want. Let the farmers know the rottenness of beer arguments and whisky ideas and they will be ready to do away with rotting grain in order to make beer and whisky. We claim that this number of THE UNION SIGNAL is a great help that way. We have promised an extra edition of 65,000 copies but we think

You, Our Friends,

Can see to it that double that number is sent out. Send us lists of your friends to whom you want the paper sent and they will go providing you agree to follow up the work with a personal request for a year's subscription.

Use Facts Intelligently!

Ten dollars paid for drinks creates a market for corn to the value of a fraction over eleven cents. Ten dollars expended for pork, even with the present exorbitant profits of butchers, creates a market for corn to the value of $3 75. Every bushel of corn used by the distillery, therefore, cuts off the market for over thirty bushels of corn made into pork.—Resolution offered at the Ohio State Grange.

DR. WILFORD HALL'S

HEALTH PAMPHLET.

IN AMERICA.

Dr. W. B. Forden, M. D., St. Louis, Mo., 706 Pine St., writes, March 2:

"Dr. A. Wilford Hall:—I have just finished reading your health brochure. To say that I am amazed does not express it—to think of the stupidity of our profession to have overlooked this factor in the physical economy for so long, and at last leave it to a layman to make the discovery! I had already an experience with a partial application of the remedy, but your pamphlet has convinced me that I did not know it all by half, and yet I thought I was in the van. I am fully convinced, however, that my partial application of the treatment has saved my life, and I now as fully believe that your advance application of the same will prolong it. Although a graduate of medicine and regarded as a successful practitioner, I have a supreme contempt for drugs, and for some time had contemplated changing my business, etc., etc. . . . Very truly yours,
W. B. FORDEN, M. D."

Dr. John Kaufman, M.D., of Hazleton, Pa., writes, March 16th:

"Dear Dr. Hall:—I received your Health-Pamphlet yesterday, and have examined it sufficiently to grasp the rationale of your treatment. Please accept my thanks for the valuable little work. Your reasoning is logical and your conclusions are strictly physiological. I believe your discovery, as elaborated in your treatise, has more intrinsic value than all other pathological theories.
Very truly yours, JOHN KAUFMAN, M.D."

F. H. Miller, cashier of Merchants' Bank, Appleton City, Mo., writes, March 3d:

"Dear Dr. Hall:—I have been troubled with liver complaint and constipation for years, and after a thorough application of your treatment I am glad to report that I am entirely relieved of these troubles. My wife had been under the doctor's care more or less for about eight years with a complication of difficulties, and could receive little or no real benefit. Since she began the use of your drugless remedy last September she has not taken a dose of medicine, and is now enjoying better health than she has for years past. In a word, I regard your treatment as the greatest discovery in the healing art ever made. Very truly, F. H. MILLER.
"P. S.—You are at liberty to use this testimonial, and to publish it to the whole world.
F. H. MILLER."

by buying the cheap phototype reprints of an obsolete "Webster" now being foisted upon the market. From A to Z they are all alike, being poor reproductions of the Dictionary of over 40 years ago. Announcements concerning them are very misleading; for instance, the supplement of 10,000 so-called "new words" was compiled by a gentleman who has been dead over thirty years, and was published before his death. What Agents are Doing on Glimpses.

"You can send me 53 books; 20 cloth, 25 half morocco, 8 morocco. These are for my August delivery, and while I hoped to send for a larger number at this time, perhaps I ought not to complain. Several agents for other books tell me they can do nothing, and are surprised that I do so well. I tell them it is because I sell 'Glimpses.'"

[NOTE.—This agent's July work netted $70.60 commissions, and $7 premiums. Total $77.60. Ought she to "complain"?]

Find herein order for five copies of "Glimpses." I did not intend to order these till next month, but as the subscribers are ready for them, and they will entitle me to the extra premium of a Dictionary for my July work, I send them now. This order makes one hundred and two books I have sold since accepting an agency some months ago. I did not think I could do as well as I have, but I just kept on working when I could, and I am more grateful to you than I can express for inducing me to take up the agency and for the help you have been to me.

How sewerage, shade, light, water, and grading are provided for, and finally how the lots (25x171 feet) sell for from $180 to $450 each. There is every reason to believe that an investment now will meet with ample profit.

CURED

Of Female Weakness and Nervous Prostration.

COLEBROOK, O., January 24, 1890.
The Owen Electric Belt and Appliance Company:
GENTLEMEN: About two years ago I was induced to obtain one of your Ladies' Electric Belts, it being considered by my husband and friends as a last resort in the effort to regain my broken health and shattered nervous system.

My trouble began when our first child was born, at which time my health became so impaired that for some time it was feared by my friends that I would never rise from my bed again. Partially recovering, however, I went on with my duties, becoming more nervous and with constant painful sensations.

Afterward, as years passed by, our home was brightened by three more children, whose happy faces and childlike prattle should have made and did make us happy, only my health became still more broken, and I finally became so prostrated as to be entirely unfit for any household duties, and in fact so nervous as to be a burden to myself and all my friends. The weakness and nervousness increased. We tried every known remedy, employed doctor after doctor, and all patent medicines, using all the means we could accumulate from our farm in paying doctors' bills, but I constantly declined in general health, until I became discouraged and willing to die. My friends and neighbors began to offer consolation and to express pity for my children, whom they thought were soon to be deprived of their mother's care. In this condition, with daily headaches, throbbing pains in my back, a constant feeling of weight, no appetite, extreme nervousness, sleeplessness, restlessness, hysteria, constipation, and all attending difficulties, my life truly was a burden. Worn out and completely discouraged, as a last resort my husband, learning of the wonderful cures having been made by wearing the Owen Electric Belt, determined to obtain one for me. I began wearing the body belt and noticed first that it gave me strength, then my habits became more regular, the sense of depression began to leave me. I began to gain in flesh, as I had been reduced to less than ninety pounds from 125, my appetite returned and my digestion began to improve.

I soon noticed that my blood began to course through my arms and limbs and my pulses began to thrill with new life; I began to take an interest in life and enjoy exercise. My nervous trouble and troubles peculiar to our sex began to leave me, one after another; I resumed my old duties about the house, until now, with brightened eye and buoyant heart, I take entire charge of my household duties, care for my entire family of four children, my husband and the added help incident to a large farm, and consider myself entirely cured.

All this change from the very edge of the grave occurred during the first year I used the Electric Appliance, and now for more than a year I have continued in excellent health and spirits, feeling no returning symptoms of the disease. I can walk any distance I desire, stand upon my feet in conducting my household duties nearly the whole day without any of the old feeling of pain and weaknesses. I do my sewing for a family of seven and keep a large house in order.

I owe all this wonderful transformation from entire prostration to perfect health to the magic power of the Owen Electric Belt, and my heart goes out to my suffering sisters throughout the land, and I desire to say to them, by this testimony, that, if suffering from diseases peculiar to our sex, they can find in the use of the Owen Electric Belt a happy relief, and, I have no doubt, a permanent cure.

I consider it but little I can do in return for all the good I have received from Dr. Owen's Electric Appliance to thus add my testimony as one having entire faith in electricity, as given by the Owen Electric Body Belt in curing disease. Sincerely wishing that others may find the relief I have in their use, I am thankfully,
MRS. ELLA TRAUTMAN, Colebrook, Ohio.

Persons making inquiry from the writers of testimonials must in all cases send a self-addressed stamped envelope to insure a reply.

All persons desiring any information regarding the cure of ACUTE, CHRONIC, and NERVOUS DISEASES please inclose SIX (6) CENTS and write for Illustrated Catalogues and valuable information, together with recent sworn testimonials of parties cured by the Owen Electric Body Belt. Catalogues in English, Swedish, Norwegian, and German. Address

Will You Do It?

An old board can be painted, so can your face—but do you compare your face with a board?

NO YOU DON'T!! We did not suggest the comparison. All face paint makers do and every lady in the land resents it. Naturally so, but they make and sell paint all the same—What for?

TO BEAUTIFY THE COMPLEXION—so claimed—but we with you say, it works an injury, and that the beauty of nature in all its natural purity is the desirable end to be obtained by the use of face treatment.—Paint is a covering—momentarily presentable—easily destroyed—hurts the skin.

DEAR LADY, let us be consistent. YOU SAY "YES." We believe then that the skin should be treated with a tonic medication of known ingredients—harmless in effect but possessing great medicinal value for the purpose of assisting in restoring the skin to a healthy and natural condition-that means, the complexion of an infant-skin soft-clear-natural-beautiful. Now you say

"HOW DELIGHTFUL" But wait-internal treatment should be taken in order that the system be freed from impurities so plainly shown by their disfiguring discoloration upon the face and other parts of the body. Now you say-

"HOW VERY REASONABLE"—So do we, and we have studied, experimented, expended money and time freely-desirous of obtaining the combination treatment talked about-it is purely an American Formula-has never been to France-when we say anything in favor of ourselves and our treatment it is based upon the satisfactory results obtained by the use of our combination treatment in several thousand cases-well

BUT NOW ONE POINT—and this is the most important one we shall make.-Don't you think it useless to try to remove the torpid condition of the skin, unless the cause is removed?-so-

DON'T PUT ON A FALSE FACE—that is paint—pure and simple-when you can accomplish so much good for yourself by an effort so little you won't notice it if you will only start in the right direction, and in order to determine how to do this if you will take our advice-

WE DON'T ASK MUCH OF YOU! Only look in your mirror. Can your complexion be improved? Are you tanned-freckled here and there-pimples big and little scattered all over your face-blackheads-how many-so annoying and disfiguring-moth patches-liver spots-dark rings beneath the eyes-unnatural blueness-exceeding paleness of the skin -nose red, with the pores showing plainly-in fact an ugly complexion-We say it can be improved.

DON'T STOP NOW—confidently act upon our advice and take a guaranteed course of the only combination treatment-internal and external-ever successfully formulated -It is called

VENUS SKIN TONIC for external use. Promotes healthy, natural, vigorous action of the skin. Stimulates secretions, throws off accumulated impurities from the pores. Smooths the skin, and removes all complexional imperfections

VENUS PURITY PELLETS. Pages descriptive of the beneficial results obtained by using could be written but to be short—They make the blood pure. Normal in quantity and quality. Regulates torpid organs to natural activity. Rejuvenates the system, imparting vigor and vitality to listless, lifeless human beings.

VENUS SKIN TONIC for external use—PURITY PELLETS for internal use The original combination complexion treatment-put up in one package-cost $1.00-for all-and we mail it upon receipt of price or you can buy from our agents or druggists generally everywhere.

GUARANTEED RESULTS. We positively guarantee each and every course of combination treatment sold, when used according to simple directions to produce results claimed. We are anxious and willing to refund money to dissatisfied purchasers of Venus Skin Tonic and Venus Purity Pellets. As to our reliability we refer to the publishers of this paper.

GOOD ENERGETIC WORKERS who desire to make money because they need it and can appreciate what an income of $5 to $10 a day means, will find steady and lucrative employment with us. Write for terms to-day; secure territory quick! Send for "Mother's Talk to Her Daughter."

ORDER NOW! You will never regret it for you run no risk. Remit $1.00 in the most convenient way and receive by return delivery the combination treatment complete.

THIS CONCLUDING STATEMENT is made for the purpose of asking that you give Venus Skin Tonic, Venus Purity Pellets, the original combination complexion treatment a trial—That's all. We have not talked about our preparations in technical terms, because we wanted you to know all about these sterling qualities. We hope you do and that you will profit by your knowledge. WILL YOU DO IT?

Signal Notes.

THE British House of Commons defeated Lord Meath's bill making it legal for the three ladies elected members of the London City Council to serve on that board.

THE Egyptian government is about to construct a system of irrigation costing $30,000,000. A basin has been discovered seven miles from the Nile, supposed to have been constructed when Joseph was Prime Minister of Egypt. A canal two hundred and fifty feet deep is to be dug from the Nile to this reservoir, through which the overflow of the Nile will flow and be there stored for use during drouth.

MRS. LUNIER has given to the French Temperance Society one thousand francs to be given as a prize for the best essay on the question, "What are the consequences of hereditary alcoholism and what are the best means of prevention or means to limit or lessen its effects?" The society wishes this study and research to embrace all the questions of moral, social, and therapeutic means for prevention and limitation of inebriety.

SEVEN women of Washington, D. C., with Miss Mary Desha at their head, have incorporated a joint stock company for the purpose of providing suitable headquarters for the many women's organizations which, from year to year, meet at the National capital. It is to contain an auditorium large enough to accommodate the National American Suffrage Association, the National W. C. T. U., the Woman's National Press Association, and similar bodies. Besides this it will contain a library, reception rooms, an art gallery, and rooms for classes, a gymnasium, natatorium and a bowling alley. A capital idea, but its name is unpronounceable—Wimodaughsis. What does it mean?

POSTMASTER JOHN WANAMAKER made this good temperance speech to his Philadelphia Bible class not long ago: "The drunkard who votes for Prohibition is a freer man than the total abstainer who carries water on both shoulders and then votes for liquor, or to put it in the harness of high license. Just as the saloon-keeper must answer for every glass he sells, so we must answer for voting for liquor. It is simply a question of whether or not we are in favor of the saloon. It isn't a question of high license. The quibble that Prohibition does not prohibit has nothing to do with it. The law against stealing does not prevent stealing. The same power that puts the amendment on our Constitution will attend to the enforcement of the law. It is our duty to make it as difficult to get liquor as it is to get poison."

TALMAGE describes a city farmer as well as if he had been one. Hear him: "Even a stupid turnip knows a city farmer as soon as it sees him. Marrowfat peas fairly rattle in their pods with derision as he passes. The fields are glad to impose upon the novice. Wandering too near the beehive with a book on honey-making, he gets stung in three places; his cauliflowers turn out to be cabbages; the thunder spoils his milk; the grass-butter, that he dreamed of, is rancid; the taxes eat up his profits; drouth consumes his corn; the rust gets in his wheat; the peaches drop off before they ripen; the rot strikes the potatoes; the bay mare runs away with the box-wagon; his rustic gate gets out of order; his shrubbery is perpetually needing the shears; it seems almost impossible to keep the grass out of the serpentine walks; a cow gets in and upsets the vase of flowers; the hogs destroy the watermelons, and the gardener runs off with the chambermaid."

THE city of Liverpool has a practical object lesson in the shape of a district in it that is free from dramshops. It is the Toxteth district, containing 10,300 houses and a population of 50,000 or 60,000. Close to it is the "Dark spot upon the Mersey" where the publican reigns supreme, and the contrast between the two is very striking. Before Toxteth had prohibition its rate of taxation was two shillings six pence or three shillings a pound; it is now one shilling or ten pence, making a saving of from £20,000 to £30,000 a year in poor rates alone. And most of the paupers whom it still has to support come from the neighboring "dark spot" which supports a hundred public houses and cannot support all the paupers they make. In Toxteth pauperism is said to be a vanishing quantity; schools and churches are well attended; the police have an easy time, the people are well fed and well dressed, and there are no memorials that the "wants of the neighborhood" demand a public house.

Steketee's Worm Destroyer.
Read what its mother says:
"The undersigned has a child only three months old. It became sick with pains in its bowels and stomach when scarcely two months old. It cried and whined nearly all the time, and was completely run down in flesh. We gave it everything that we thought would relieve the child, but it grew worse all the time. We made twenty powders from a teaspoonful of Steketee's Worm Destroyer, gave it one powder three times daily. To our astonishment it was relieved of thousands of worms. We have given the child but twenty powders. It is entirely cured. I shall always recommend Steketee's Worm Destroyer.

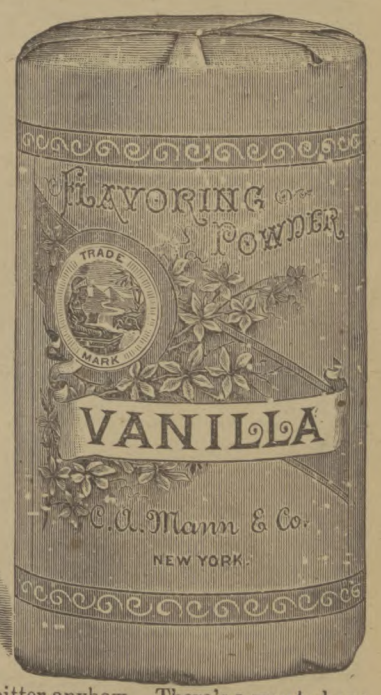
Flavoring Powders.



Good cake is a rarity. Not a lost art exactly, but if your cake isn't better than that found on the tea-tables of nine-tenths of your neighbors, it can certainly be improved upon. Good puddings and pies are hard to find, but cake is the hardest. Figure it up, now. How many ladies of your acquaintance can make desserts that are invariably successes? How many of them will bother to find out the reason for their failures? It don't pay a merchant to carry poor goods, and food is an important part of a housekeeper's stock in trade. To prepare it carelessly is a bad investment. Poor cake don't pay.
Better not have any. Of course a tea or a lunch without cake seems to have something lacking about it, but a cheap or badly-made excuse for the real thing is only an aggravation. You can spread your table with rich and creamy-looking damask, sparkling cut-glass and delicate china, and your silver cake-basket may be both artistic and elegant, but if the pile of cake does not diminish, there's something wrong with it. It may be one thing, it may be another. The easiest place to look for it is, What do you use for Flavoring? Perhaps that's just where the trouble lies. Liquid Extracts, four times as much alcohol in them as anything else, and adulterated besides. The spirit in the Extracts is quickly volatilized by heat, and if you put in enough to taste, your cake will be spoiled, and the flavor is rank and bitter anyhow. There's a way to have light and delicious cake always. By all means see to your oven, for there is as much in baking as in mixing, but in the beginning, use our Flavoring Powders, and everything else of as good quality. Then you won't have to complain that your cake gets stale from being on hand so long, though your family will likely think it is a joy forever. The best costs more? Perhaps it seems so just at first. But isn't it better to have good materials and the food all eaten up, than poorly prepared stuff of a cheaper grade, which is thrown out and wasted in the end? There is nothing ahead of our Flavoring Powders. They have the lead. Everybody says so when they have tried them. Why don't you? If your grocer doesn't keep them, and you can't get him to order a supply, send us 50 cents, and we will mail you a package of the 1-ounce Lemon and Vanilla for trial. Inducements to agents.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Amherst College has just received $50,000 to endow a professorship of hygiene.

The Illinois Legislature passed the Columbian Exposition Bill, and adjourned Friday.

The New York City public baths were patronized by 36,000 persons in one day last week.

Washington, D C., has 1,064 licensed liquor-selling establishments, wholesale and retail.

In a test case against a Cincinnati saloon-keeper, the decision is against him, thus sustaining the Sunday closing law.

Mrs. Marian Baxter, Rev. J. H. Hector, Mrs. Hoffman, and others made telling speeches at the Decatur camp-meeting last week.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has issued its order to take effect September 1 for reduction of railroad rates on food products.

July 31 completed the century since the first American patent was granted. The total number of patents issued during the century is 433,432.

A corrected list of the dead from the Johnstown flood fourteen months ago has just been issued, showing 2,187 as the entire number lost.

The Rock River Lutheran Assembly petitioned the Fair Commission to exclude drinking establishments and to close the Exposition on Sundays.

Representative citizens of Hyde Park and Englewood have formed a permanent organization to resist all attempts to open saloons in the "prohibited districts.'

J. C. Bonnell, of Lincoln, Neb., writes to correct our statement concerning the population of that city according to the last census. It has grown even faster than we gave it credit for, increasing from 13,200 in 1880 to 55,600, in 1890; four hundred and eighteen per cent.

Joseph Chamberlain in a speech at Birmingham, Eng., Saturday night, acknowledged that the Government made a mistake in introducing the licensing bill in a crowded business session, but declared the purpose of government was good and denounced the "unexpected hostility of temperance fanatics" which defeated the bill.

By request of Congress, the correspondence between Secretary Blaine and Lord Salisbury, concerning the Behring's Sea difficulty, has been published. The whole matter hinges on the question, whether that sea, the especial home of the seal, is a "closed sea" and as such belongs to the United States by virtue of its purchase of Alaska.

The National Assembly of Norway has voted $50,000 for a new expedition in search of the North Pole, moved thereto by finding articles from the Jeannette lost in Behring's Straits, floating on a cake of ice off the coast of Greenland. The supposition is that they must have come across the Arctic Ocean by way of the North Pole, proving the existence of the open polar sea.

The Supreme Court of Michigan reversed the decision of the Bay county circuit court convicting a man for selling liquor on a scow anchored opposite Bristol. This decision throws all river and lake towns open to the ravages of floating saloons. Like the Federal Supreme Court, this one calls the attention of the legislature to the necessity of remedying this state of things. What next?

CONCERNING the School of Methods at Ocean Grove, in charge of Mrs. S. J. C. Downs, Professor Cornwell says many good things. Among them this: "For common sense, reason, wit, eloquence—the rarest gift of the gods to man—this woman's School of Methods excelled all meetings we have ever known. It was an axe at the root of the tree, and best of all, the spirit of God was in it all. The closing address by Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap, of Michigan, was lightning from a clear sky. The vast assembly was thrilled, startled, exalted, subdued. 'Knowing the wrath of God, we persuade men,' was the foundation of that marvelous address. Mrs. Downs, the presiding officer, could well rule a senate."

AT a World's Fair Conference of gentlemen who have been identified with similar enterprises, held lately in Philadelphia, Mr. George W. Childs expressed the most kindly feeling of the Quaker City for its big Western sister, and declared that all classes there were animated by a patriotic desire to make the Exposition of 1893 a success. He promised to send on for exhibition some of the most rare and valuable articles in his collection. Among these are Tom Moore's harp, which belonged to the great Irish poet "in the days of his greatest triumphs as poet and singer;" the superb silver vase presented to Henry Clay by the Whig ladies of Tennessee; a massive silver salver presented to General Jackson by citizens of New Orleans after his victory at that historic spot; a miniature likeness of General Washington, encased in gold, and having set in the back of the case a generous lock of Washington's hair; a miniature ship, once the property of President Jackson, and made from a timber of the noted war ship, "The Alliance," which "thrice bore Lafayette's fortunes across the ocean," and some of the magnificent trophies brought home by General Grant from his celebrated tour around the world.

"No Christian man can go round the world without becoming a Prohibitionist—and a Woman's Christian Temperance Union man, too." This is what Rev. W. B. Palmore, of Kansas City, said, as he called at our office on his return from a round-the-world trip. Everywhere the fearful drink curse confronted him, as it confronts our missionaries; everywhere he felt that Christ is dishonored before the heathen by the conduct of Christian nations. In his travels he met Mrs. Leavitt and many times crossed the path of her labors; he gladly testifies to their efficiency. Thus the ends of the earth are brought together in sympathy and service.

THE State Central Committee of Texas Prohibitionists, Mr. J. G. Allison, Dallas, secretary, desires to secure a consensus of opinion upon the following question: "Do you not believe that the cause of prohibition will be advanced and the annihilation of the liquor traffic hastened, if voters who control the purses were organized in some such manner as the W. C. T. U., holding weekly meetings, gathering funds, distributing literature, pushing the circulation of state and national organs, holding county and district conventions, as well as state and national, throughout the off as well as the campaign years, and with individual heads of departments, state and national, who shall be held responsible for the work of their department? Have this superstructure built upon our present Third Party political foundations, so that it may subserve all campaign purposes and thus have both a peace and a war footing, an educational, a moral suasion and a daily personal man-to-man agitation side, to cultivate high-toned moral ideas, and a legal and political side to crystallize them into ballots and hold them ready for the campaign years. A body having such a legal status as to be able to receive bequests and legacies from patriots who may wish so to invest a part of their estates as to have it doing good service in the cause of moral reform long after their hands have ceased to labor and their tongues to speak for it, and thus after death continue their labors for the glory of God and the benefit of posterity." If modesty did not forbid a W. C. T. U. woman giving an opinion on the subject we should say that no party can have a better model of organization than the W. C. T. U.

SOUTH Dakotans do not propose to sit still and allow saloons to flourish. A saloon at Hitchcock having failed to close up, its proprietor was on Monday served with a civil process to abate a nuisance, and an injunction restraining him from selling intoxicating drinks. He was then arrested on a criminal process and brought before the county judge who bound him over till next term of court, fixing his bail at $700. Blume, the proprietor of the Huron distillery, was served in the same way.

A NATIONAL Missionary Conference is to be held in Indianapolis, September 3–9, 1890. Its theme will be: "Shall the Gospel be given to all people during this generation?" To meet the needs of the great world lying in darkness, one hundred thousand missionaries should go forth this year. It is hoped that this gathering will result in greatly aroused interest in sending them. Among the prominent workers expected are: Bishop William Taylor, of Africa, Dr. James H. Brookes, W. E. Blackstone, Rev. Geo. F. Pentecost. Dr. A. J. Gordon, C. H. Yatman, Dr. A. T. Pierson, James Johnston, of Jamaica, Rev. H. L. Hastings, H. W. Frost, T. C. Horton, Orr Ewing, of China, Robert E. Speer, A. Nash, Chas. E. Hurlburt, and many others. A large number of missionary volunteers are confidently expected to be present to bear testimony and add fuel to the missionary fire. Much time will be given to Bible study. One entire day will be set apart for prayer. The needs of some of the great fields, such as China and Africa, will be presented. The facts concerning foreign missionary work, both past, present and future will be considered. Testimony meetings will be held, and opportunities for small gatherings for prayer and conference. For further information address George S. Fisher, Y. M. C. A. Building, Topeka, Kansas.

MISS MERI TOPPELIUS, while in St. Paul, received so many calls for teachers in Slöjd, she has determined to open an institute for training teachers in that department of education. The first course will begin early in September, at corner of Fifth avenue and Madison street, Chicago. Miss Toppelius has had five years' experience as a teacher of Slöjd under Vera Hjelt, of Finland, whose work in this department of education is excelled by none. Miss Toppelius has been teaching several months in Chicago and has won many friends. She is remarkable for her painstaking with her pupils and her devotion to her work. No doubt this is a field where there is going to be a great demand for teachers, and those who prepare themselves cannot fail of finding employment.

LAST week 141 "country weekers" were sent out by the Chicago Daily News Fresh Air Fund. Of this company 140 were girls, only one boy. During the season, so far, not a dozen boys have gone, simply because they have not been invited, everybody seems to prefer to take girls. That is good for the girls, we would not have one less go, but do open your hearts wide enough to take in an equal number of little boys. Hundreds of them in the city need this outing quite as much as the girls; no farm is complete without a boy, yet there are scores of farms without this necessary appendage. We wish that many large-hearted farmers knew the sorry history of many of these lads—little bread-winners for mothers and younger children, many of them are old before their time, and dying for fresh air and green fields. If they did, we are sure more invitations for boys would come in. The effect of "country week" on a boy's life is likely to be more marked than even upon that of the girls; it is more likely to decide him to seek a home in the country, a safer thing for him and for the nation. Hundreds of little boys besiege the News office with petitions to go into the country. Can not you open a way for them

THE fight is on in Chicago between the "prohibited districts" of the lately annexed suburbs and the saloon men. All knew it would come when annexation carried, and that was the root of much of the opposition to that measure. Englewood and Hyde Park are all up in arms over attempts to plant saloons within their limits. The fight here, as everywhere it ought to be, is between the Christian, respectable element of the community and the saloon element, the English syndicate backing the liquor men.

GOD FIRST.

BY M. J. BIRDSALL.

I loved too well humanity,
And gave myself right willingly
To toil and sacrifice and pain.
Alas! 'twas all in vain, in vain.
Returns so pitiful there came,
My heart was torn 'twixt grief and shame.
I laid me down and thought to die,
And find a world for such as I.
For Thou, O Christ, wert but a star,
Seen and worshiped from afar;
Thy life a sweet but olden story;
Thy death a great but saddened glory;
Thy resurrection,—ah, for man
Too deep a mystery to scan.

But while I broken-hearted lay,
And prayed for death from day to day,—
Lo! the star came near and nearer,
Growing brighter, growing clearer,
Until its strong and glowing light,
Dispelled my soul's fast gathering night;
And, shining as the open day,
I saw the better, perfect way:—
God first,—in heart, and head, and life;
Then man,—and earthly toil and strife;
Still loving all in heaven, on earth,
Since human love that finds its birth
In love to God, is freed from stain,
And never spends itself in vain.

AN AUGUST APPLE BLOSSOM.

BY ROBERT ST. JOHN.

CHAPTER I.

During my sojourn in England in the summer of 1872, I spent a week in a pretty and affectionate, but melancholy, home at the base of Duncliff Hill, which is a small wooded mountain, a sort of "sugar-loaf," in one of the southern coast counties. The locality had been within sight for a month before I finally reached it in the course of my jaunts on foot, and my visits among my mother's friends.

Duncliff Hill is one of the measuring points for all the country round about. This or that farm, or house, or road, or stream, is said to be, or to pass, so many miles from Duncliff Hill; and everybody was saying to me, after I had been in the county a fortnight, "What! not been on Duncliff Hill yet!" But the fact was I dreaded to go. I feared to face my poor uncle and the two motherless girls, because I had possession of a secret which they must not get from me; a secret concerning their son and brother, away over the sea.

I arrived at the house late in the afternoon. After the shyness of the first meeting had worn off I was, as I had expected to be, hard pressed with questions about "poor Joe:" was he well? when would he be coming back home? why did he not write? did I think he would come that summer? was he "steady"? did he go regularly to church? did he send messages? how had he accepted the tidings of his mother's death? Most of these questions I could answer by saying that I had been with Joe very little, as America is a very large country, and Joe lived in Ohio while I was in central New York. Yet, I evidently showed some embarrassment, for Uncle Ben kindly desisted from questioning me further, and the girls, following his manner in everything, also became silent on the subject that was so near to their hearts.

After the early tea Uncle Ben invited me to go with him into the copse, half way up the hill slope where he was to count a load of fagots which the village baker had been buying for his oven. Of course, the girls were asked to accompany us, for they always went with their father for the sunset walk, ending regularly at the churchyard on the other side of the Hill. I fancied that he was glad to hear them say that they would have to decline the invitation this time, for the bonnets they had agreed to have ready that evening were hardly done. They would meet us on the return. Uncle Ben had something to say to me alone. I could divine that clearly enough, and it made me uneasy. There were some more questions, no doubt.

We finished our errand in the copse and then ascended to the summit for the sunset view, which was the most impressive of all that summer's list. The Vale of Blackmore, in which Duncliff stands up as a pivot to the horizon, was flooded with mellow light, which brought all the prominent figures of the landscape into strong relief. Away in the west was the "Glastonbury Tor," of which every intelligent English boy or girl can tell you some weird tale. A little to the right, and twenty miles nearer, was Storerton Tower, a very ancient structure erected to commemorate King Alfred's great victory over the Danes upon that spot. Every prominent hill had its legend of battle, defeat and victory. To the east of us rose the delicate but commanding spire of Salisbury cathedral, the highest in England. Listen, and we might hear the sunset bell! No, the wind was wrong. But the Tisbury bell we could hear distinctly. "Did I ever hear of the Tisbury stone?" Uncle Ben asked. No, I had not. Then we must go right over to it while the bell was ringing. "You see," said Uncle Ben, "this stone has a curious habit. It rolls over and back again every time it hears the Tisbury bell." I did not catch the meaning of the twinkle in his eye, and was a trifle disappointed when the stone failed to roll over.

On our way down the hill we heard a rustling, and an instant later a fox stood in the edge of a clearing and stared full at us, then turned and walked into the thicket. I was glad to have had a deliberate view of a fox in its native state and home, but Uncle Ben felt dismayed. He said that such conduct in a fox boded evil. It was a bad sign to have a wild fox stare you in the face. I laughed at his superstition, but it hurt him to have me treat the matter lightly. I could see that it was as much revelation to his soul as if it had been a part of sacred gospel. He was sure that signs were from God, and were given out of compassion, bidding us be ready for what might be near. To more fully convince me of the truth of his doctrine he told me the story of poor Aunt Sara's death, which had occurred two years before, just two years that month.

"You see," said Uncle Ben, "your aunt had been as well as usual until that day. She went to call on an old dame at the infirmary and came back across the hill, and I met her at the Tisbury stone and we walked home together. Just about here, as I recollect very well, a fox came exactly as that one did just now, and stared us in the face. That night your poor aunt went home. She was seized with sickness before we reached the house, and all the evening she called for Joe. She knew he was near. She was sure he was knocking at the back gate of the garden as he would come across the fields from the station, and time after time I went to the gate to satisfy her affection and let her poor boy in. Joe didn't come, but his mother went before morning, and we've been expecting him every night since. And we've never again locked the gate or the back door of the house. Joe can come by the nearest way and always find the house open."

I had not the heart to dispute further over the doctrine of signs. Besides, what was the use?

"Then there was another premonition," he said, "if I had only found it in time. As I went out through the garden as usual the next morning to see if Joe was coming from the early train, I saw something white on a branch of the dwarf apple tree by the path, and when I came near I found that it was a flower, a real apple blossom in August, but it was double, like a rose. That, too, was a sure sign of some one going to be called for. Isn't that a sign in America?"

This time I smiled quite confidently, for hardly a year passes in which I do not find apple blossoms in late summer and autumn, sometimes single, sometimes double like a rose, for the apple and the rose are of the same family of plants. But Uncle Ben's faith was not shaken by my adverse testimony. He would show me the branch on which this blossom had appeared, for he had marked it with a shred of white muslin. When we came to the tree and Uncle Ben sought out the particular branch, he stood a moment in silence, for there, in the very same place, was another untimely blossom, a single one this time, but white as the snow, with not a tinge of apple-blossom pink. I could say no more.

We had been so engaged in our somber conversation that we had forgotten the arrangement to meet my cousins at the cemetery; so we hastened thither by the roadway, as it was now nearly nine o'clock and growing dark. Uncle Ben said little as we walked, for he was thinking intently. Finally he said. "I wouldn't have you think, my child, that I am afraid or reluctant to go. The Lord knows best when to call me, and I have had my share of happiness in life. I am only thinking for the maidens. You see if I should be called before Joe comes home they might have trouble in taking care of the place. The oversight of the copse and income from our three cows and the maidens' sewing is enough to keep us comfortably, and if Joe comes before I go, then things could go on just the same. Do you really think he will come this month? But to be sure you couldn't tell" Then, after a long pause: "If I should be called before Joe comes, why couldn't you stay with the maidens till he comes? O no, you must go back to college; I am forgetful. But I am so anxious about the maidens, the Lord bless them!"

"I will do anything possible for them, uncle," I said; "but how are we to know that you are the one to be called? It may be the signs were for me instead of you. The fox looked at me as well as at you, and I saw the apple blossom as soon as you."

True enough, here was a possible solution that had to be respected, and Uncle Ben, a man of most delicate sensibility, more from sympathy than from conviction, assumed that my surmise might be correct. During the remainder of my visit in his home he treated me as tenderly as an infant, and never again hinted that I might remain with the maidens if he should be called. Yet his silence was far more pitiful than had been his planning upon the other theory, and I regretted that I had deprived him of what I believe was a consolation to his soul, the privilege of preparing us for his departure. Whether or not he talked the matter over with my cousins I never had the courage to ask, but one circumstance led me to believe that he did. One night as I was about to retire to bed, and had taken the candle from the hand of my cousin May, I stood for a few last words. Probably the draft from the door ajar caused the flame to veer and flicker, for it burned unevenly into the tallow, and when at the final word May stepped forward to snuff the wick for me we saw that a "shroud" had been formed. She said nothing of it, but from her manner in throwing her arms about my neck and kissing me again and again, I could see that she, too, interpreted tokens.

Upon my departure for London I was most affectionately advised about caring for my health, about avoiding the perils of the city, as to accidents, robbery and the like, and was urged to return to Duncliff Lodge the moment I felt ill at ease. When I did return a month later, poor Uncle Ben had passed away—and Joe had not come home.

I shall not ask any reader to believe that the tokens which meant so much to the poor, kind man had any part in hastening his death, or my Aunt Sara's, nor am I prepared to believe that these tokens were "sent" as a warning. But I do know that another cause had much to do with shortening those lives, the mysterious absence of their cherished boy, the story of whose life, which follows in another chapter, is far more pitiful than the story of their death

THE PLENARY POWER OF CONGRESS OVER THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

BY EDWIN C. PIERCE.

(Concluded.)

Chief Justice Marshall, in the opinion, expressly denies that the powers granted to Congress are to be construed strictly, and he also spoke of Webster's statement that the Constitution is one of enumeration, and not of definition, as apt. The opinion says "among" means "intermingled with." "Commerce among the states cannot stop at the external boundary line of each state, but may be introduced into the interior." "It is not intended to say that these words comprehend that commerce which is completely internal, which is carried on between man and man in a state, or between different parts of the same state, and which does not extend to or affect other states. Such a power would be inconvenient, and is certainly unnecessary. Comprehensive as the word 'among' is, it may very properly be restricted to that commerce which concerns more states than one. The genius and character of the whole government seem to be that its action is to be applied to all the external concerns of the nation, and to those internal concerns which affect the states generally; but not to those which are completely within a particular state, which do not affect other states, etc."

Again, the opinion remarks: "No direct general power over these objects (inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a state, and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries) is granted to Congress, and, consequently, they remain subject to state legislation. If the legislative power of the Union can reach them, it must be for national purposes; it must be where the power is expressly given for a special purpose, or is clearly incidental to some power which is exclusively given It is obvious that the government of the Union, in the exercise of its express powers, that, for example, of regulating commerce with foreign nations and among the states, may use means that may also be employed by a state, in the exercise of its acknowledged powers; that, for example, of regulating commerce within the state."

The case of Gibbons vs. Ogden was decided in 1824, four years after the Missouri controversy excited the Union. The slavery question from that time cast a shadow over the country and influenced all constitutional discussion whether political or judicial. The strongest considerations operated upon the minds of men to support the theory of state rights. There was no party in the country interested to press the far-reaching national doctrine that Congress might treat as commerce among the ates any commerce which although confined within the orders of a state, affected the general welfare of the Republic; nor at any time in the history of the slavery struggle was the anti-slavery party powerful or bold enough to attempt the abolition of slavery in the states in the exercise of powers incidental to the enumerated power to regulate commerce among the states. The state rights doctrines held sway from 1800 to 1860, and even the opponents of extreme state rights opinions were moderate and cautious in their assertions of the more liberal and nationalistic view of the Constitution. Since 1860 there has been a great advance in the popular appreciation of the utility of the National idea, and in the future new applications of that idea will be made.

It is most convenient and safe to adopt the broadest, most liberal theories of the Constitution, trusting to the judgment of the people to make, in practice, the wisest partitions of powers between the Nation and the states. But even in 1824 we see that the Supreme Court suggested that as an incident of the power to regulate commerce among the states, Congress might interfere with commerce purely internal in a state. Moreover, although by dicta the court repelled the idea of an original jurisdiction over all commerce in the country, it still intimated that that commerce is "among the states" which affects the states generally.

But it is not necessary to maintain that the liquor traffic, or manufacture, in a state, is, in the constitutional sense, intermingled with the several states, because it is a matter of National concern. The power of Congress to suppress the liquor traffic rests securely upon the ground that it would be incidental and necessary to the suppression of interstate traffic. In the legal tender cases, decided in 1870, the Supreme Court speaks of non-enumerated powers included in the authority expressly given "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the specified powers vested in Congress." The opinion says: "In McCulloch vs. Maryland (4 Wheaton, 405) it was finally settled that in the gift by the Constitution to Congress of authority to enact laws 'necessary and proper' for the execution of all the powers created by it, the necessity spoken of is not to be understood as an absolute one. On the contrary, this court then held that the sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the National legislature that discretion with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it in the manner most beneficent to the people."

Hamilton (Works Vol. III, p. 186) said respecting the words "necessary and proper" in the Constitution, now under consideration: "Necessary often means no more than needful, requisite, incidental, conducive to. It is a common mode of expression to say that it was necessary for a government or a person to do this or that thing, when nothing more is intended or understood than that interests of the government or person require, or may be promoted by the doing of this or that thing. This is the sense of the Constitution."

Such is the now well-settled doctrine. Congress, in the exercise of the power to declare war, or of the power to borrow money, or doubtless as a necessary means of regulating commerce among the states, may provide a legal tender paper currency.

It is hard to see how any one can rise from the reading of the Legal Tender Cases, including the later case, without the clear conviction that if Congress should, as it has an undoubted right to do, declare the interstate traffic in alcoholic liquors as now existing against public policy, and regulate or prohibit the same, and should as necessary to the enforcement of its policy in that behalf deal with the manufacture of liquors, or even the traffic within states, as it saw fit, it would be constitutional legislation. It would in fact be impossible to enforce prohibition of commerce among the states in liquors, unless the manufacture was controlled by the national government.

There is a continuous line of decisions of the Supreme Court in which subjects, clearly not interstate commerce in the ordinarily accepted sense of the term, but mere "aids, incidents and auxiliaries" to such commerce are said to be subject to the power of Congress to regulate them. And under the power to regulate, the court has steadily inclined in favor of legislation which only affects interstate commerce indirectly and incidentally. It was in recognition of the sound and established doctrines of constitutional construction here presented that I said in the course of a brief address at the National Temperance Congress in New York, June 11: "Is national prohibition desirable? Yes. Without it the rum power cannot be crushed. That power must be extirpated, torn up by the roots. But do not seek to amend the Constitution by laying a mandate for prohibition upon Congress. It is a very difficult thing to amend the national Constitution. Let us be thankful that it is a national Constitution. Instead of amending the Constitution, apply it, construing it beneficially." I think the constitutional doctrines that would support the exercise of plenary power by Congress over the manufacture and traffic in intoxicating liquors to be not only well established by the Supreme Court, but that such broad construction will prove beneficent and not hurtful.

Upon no other constitutional basis can the union of these states be attended by so many blessings to this and succeeding generations.

Providence, R. I.

PROHIBITION AS A FACTOR IN RELIGION.

BY JAMES CLEMENT AMBROSE.

We should like to persuade our friends who are fervent in religion but cool toward prohibition, that there is a great deal of religion in prohibition, and ought to be a great deal of prohibition in religion. In other words, we wish to rivet this conviction, that the man or woman who is sincere and in earnest to promote the kingdom of Immanuel, to lead humanity out of all moral danger, away from all temptation unto sin, and up to the plane of widest usefulness, utmost security in domestic happiness, and the most satisfying hope of heaven—that disciple cannot "cold-shoulder" the prohibition of the liquor traffic.

What is religion—Christianity—its office toward men? It is the system of doctrines and precepts taught by Christ. And nothing did His teaching better emphasize than the duty of man to love his neighbor as himself. And certainly the truly religious man so loves himself that he will put liquor away from himself and all his household. Prohibition is exactly that factor in religion through which the religionist is to apply his love for his neighbor by protecting him against the evil which is hostile to that neighbor and all his household. And if prohibition is protection of every neighbor, and every citizen on the Jericho road is a neighbor, how shall any citizen of Christ's Church enact the good Samaritan and omit prohibition from the ritual of his duties alike at the polling-place and the prayer-meeting?

If hitherto, brother, you have failed or declined to help this principle in all possible ways, please kindly remember it is still true that "he who is not for Me is against Me," and that if the liquor traffic be an evil and the prohibition of evil be God's principle, to stand against prohibition is to stand against the wise Master we serve. Surely you will not assert that liquor drinking is less than the source of abominations beyond counting, and the traffic is the source of the drinking. Hence to prohibit the traffic is to walk with God in exterminating what He hates, in promoting what He approves, in making it easier for weak and tempted man to be at one with his Maker. That is the work of prohibition, and in that work is prohibition an unavoidable factor in the religion that is the revealed will of God.

The Word says, "Thou shalt not kill!" Does the liquor traffic? No. It says, "Thou shalt kill!" and enforces its commandment. But prohibition, in keeping with the Word, prohibits killing—spills the madding potion that is loaded with manslaughter. It keeps God's law. License breaks God's law. Which way shall the Christian vote and pray? Which way must he vote and pray to be a Christian? Brother, if the licensed liquid kills your neighbor, and you licensed its sale, whose hand lifted the blade—pulled the trigger? On the hand that casts the license ballot is there not a spot that will not out?

The Word says, "Thou shalt not commit adultery!" and prohibition is the sword of the Word to enforce its command, for, as liquor is the prime inspiration to this prime infamy, so the demolition of the tap-room is the Nemesis of shame. Nay, tell us, man of license, can one license the cause yet not license the effect? You shut your eyes, whirl round and fire in the street. A passer-by falls dead, and you stand arrested for murder. You did not mean to kill him; but you set in motion the cause of his death, and the logic of the law rightly handcuffs you. You did not mean to license adultery; it shocks you to be so charged; but you license the stimulus that stifles conscience and stirs passion; and can the moral law keep its logic clean yet brand you cleaner than procurer of uncleanness? Surely, the logic of moral cause and effect is severe; but is it not the judgment of justice? Indeed, how far and how long is that religion worth living which omits from its daily creed and practice the prohibition of evil and the seed of evil.

Does a sound, unmortgaged mind witness the inward sowing and the outward harvest of the saloon, yet find either better than profoundest evil? Brother, eliminate prohibition from your mother's religion, and the factors remaining would not cipher the problem of her life to that solution of Christian uprightness you love to remember her by. And what is right in the mother cannot be wrong in the son. Were your wife, too, a communicant, praying the good Father to bless with many drunkards the saloons you voted to license, that your devotion might not go unrewarded, you would think her mad. And if the license be out of place in religion, certainly prohibition is in place there.

Moreover, the Book God wrote commands observance of the Sabbath day, forbids theft and false witness; and prohibition of the liquor traffic takes by the arm the most lawless man and leads him into the companionship where those commandments are kept—helps to make truth and honesty and Sunday worship easy, while the traffic helps to make them all hard to some and impossible to a multitude. And since the traffic is a factor in iniquity, is not its prohibition a great factor in religion and its license a great rent in the holy vestment? Should all good men of twenty-one years espouse total abstinence and total abolition of the traffic, would not the rest of the virtues have a much easier time, and much of humanity shift rapidly from cactus barrens to fields of clover? And to help humanity thus is one purpose of the true religion. And if the Bible be the sibyl of truth in pronouncing woe upon him that putteth the cup to his neighbor's lips, do not its same words equally pronounce blessings upon him that taketh the cup away? And that is prohibition. It is ever blessed of God; 'tis license that is cursed; for if it be wicked in A to put the cup to the lips of B, it adds cowardice to wickedness to get C to do the evil deed. Brother, if no man would vote another the law's protection in doing what he would not do himself, would not prohibition prevail? Would not humanity be happy? Would not vice and crime be discouraged? Would not poverty have a new suit? Would not God seem great and the devil small?

Then why let the cowards conquer the world? When every man shall stand as if he alone gave tone to the moral world, the world will ring out the right moral tone, and only the meanest minority will seek to license the source of iniquity.

WHISPERING WIRES.

BY FELIX L. OSWALD, M. D.

It is curious how many fables of ancient times have been surpassed by the realities of the present age. Tethis and the Oceanides could foretell a sea storm; our signal office predicts all sorts of weather, as well as droughts and earthquakes. Our traveling Arions need not bestride a dolphin to defy the winds and the tides. Prometheus pilfered the fire of Jove; we have got hold of his thunder, too, and the "harnessed electric spark" performs greater wonders than the oak-shivering lightning. The ancients had a tradition of a despotic king who constructed his palace at Syracuse in a way that enabled him to hear every word whispered in any room of the vast building, but electric experts tell us that the "ear of Dionysius" will soon be surpassed by the improvements of the modern telephone. Words spoken in the British House of Commons or sung in the Grand Opera of Milan will soon be made audible to New England audiences, and Eastern despots may be restrained by consulting an American phonograph and listening to the Transatlantic comments on their arbitrary acts and preposterous laws.

Imagine the hereditary Queen of Madagascar overhearing the following passages of a lecture on the customs and statutes of her kingdom: "The whole southwest of the island is a vast swamp, but its malaria is not the worst affliction of the native population. All classes of society, from the poorest berry-gatherer to the feudal landowner, are infested with the miasma of monstrous superstitions—some of them so ineffably absurd as to be almost inexplicable except upon the theory of an epidemic mental disease. We need not mention such trifles as the belief in witchcraft, or the dread of omens and portents, which makes the forest-dweller shudder at the cry of a prowling lemur, or night-ape. But take the firmly established custom which compels suspected criminals to establish their innocence, by undergoing the ordeal of the savahat, or judicial poison-test. It matters not whether or no the presumptive proofs of the defendant's guilt are many or few; it is enough that his offense can be classified with the list of the graver crimes, to subject him to the necessity of swallowing a life-endangering dose of a strong vegetable poison. The 'spirits of the air,' it is supposed, will protect him if innocent; but should he succumb to the outrage, the proof of his guilt is considered complete. The worst of it is that even those who survive the ordeal are inoculated with the seeds of premature death or life-long infirmity."

But is it wholly impossible that the phonographs of the future might favor us with the report of something like the following lecture delivered before the Ethnological Society of Tananarivoo, Madagascar?

"The entire northern half of the United States is subject to desolating winter-storms; but frost is not the worst affliction of the native population. All classes of society, from the poorest rag-picker to the railroad magnate, are stricken with the blight of ignorance and monstrous prejudice. We need not mention such trifles as the time-dishonored injustice which excludes women from nearly every office of trust, nor the short-sighted greed by which the wholesale destruction of woodlands turns vast areas of fertile soil into sand wastes; there are worse follies—some of them so ineffably absurd as to seem almost inexplicable, except upon the theory of an epidemic mental degeneration. Take the firmly-established custom which permits a large number of licensed scoundrels to coin profit from the sale of health-destroying poisons. At the principal street-corners of every large city, at cross-road hostelries and public pleasure resorts, those poisons are administered—not to suspected criminals, but to weary travelers, to hard-working mechanics and farmers, wishing to sweeten a week of toil with an hour of recreation,—and often to innocent children and to relief-seeking invalids. The laws of a so-called civilized republic protect that infamy, men not otherwise afflicted with mental disorders countenance the preposterous custom by their example and actually call it 'drinking the health' of a favored friend to dose him and themselves with large quantities of alcoholic hell-broth

"That insanity has caused the ruin of thousands of thoughtless victims, but the worst of it is that even those who survive the ordeal are inoculated with the seeds of premature death and life-long infirmity. All the poison used by the sixteen provinces of our kingdom in the trial of malefactors does not exceed a hundred gallons a year, while a six hundred thousand times larger quantity is annually dealt out to innocent citizens of the United States."

WHAT ONE MUSIC BOX DID.

[June 9, 1890, was Miss Jennie Casseday's fiftieth birthday. To commemorate that event, as well as to show their appreciation of the wonderful "Ministry of Flowers," which this beloved invalid superintendent has introduced to the world, the National W. C. T. U. and a few personal friends presented to Miss Casseday a handsome music-box. From the following, an extract from a private letter to Miss Willard, written by the dear invalid's sister, will be gathered the appreciation of the recipient, who seems too full of joy to answer for herself.—ED.]

MY DEAR MISS WILLARD:—I think Jennie, in her own room, is struggling with her emotions in a vain endeavor to express something of the surprise, gratification, delight, gratitude, and other lame English appellatives, which mastered her completely, when the big, anticipated express box at last got opened, and the handsome, costly music box was brought to view. It has been the dream of her shut-in years to own such an instrument, and my husband and I were hoping to secure such for her in the not distant future. The cyclone toppled over our prospects, and now this, the offering of many hearts, the fruitage of much tenderness and love, is a thousand times better to her, means more, gives more, binds closer. If the sweet women who thought of and planned this token could have seen her receive it, they would need no words. They, too, would have shed tears over this little, brave, limited, shut-in soul, craving music, craving nature, liberty-loving, and in harmony with all things harmonious and beautiful, yet shut up to one narrow corner, tied to six feet of one room, and withal cheerful, sunny, self-abnegating, giving of such as she has with both hands. Fancy this harmonious, poetic, loving soul having brought to her the gathered love of dozens and dozens of other souls! It was like a caged woodland bird, with all the songs of the wild woods trembling in its throat unspoken and unknown, to whom come the songsters of the wilderness, blithesome and cumberless, and pour out the wealth of their freedom and their sympathy.

The music of the instrument is as sweet as music can be, but its notes falter and fail before the larger music that is behind it. Jennie says that with a heart and brain fuller than ever before in her life, she is absolutely dumb. So if I tell you how grateful we all are, you will understand. May the good Lord reward you W. C. T. U. women a thousand fold for all the shine and uplift you bring into other hearts! FANNY C. DUNCAN.

[As this letter was being put into type the mail brought the following one from Miss Casseday herself, and we cannot debar our readers from the pleasure of reading it.—ED.]

SICK BED, July 26.

MY DEAR "WHITE-RIBBON SISTERS":—I have just found out "the how" of my magnificent music box. I do not know yet who are the donors, but I have by searching found that Mrs. J. T. Foote planned the surprise, and asked our "Peerless Queen," Frances E. Willard, to start the ball to rolling, and that Miss Willard communicated with every state president, and that they responded. I suspect our "Esther," too, had a share in that part. But how it was possible for so many to know the secret and I not get the faintest whisper, is a mystery to me. I have been longing to tell you some of my grateful, loving appreciation of your magnificent gift, but neither tongue nor pen can find adequate expression of what it means to me.

It was the Thursday after my birthday, and every hour of the whole week love and beauty and gladness had been pouring into my cup of happiness until it was filled full to flowing o'er; the mid-day mail brought me quite a budget of letters, and as I looked over them before opening I recognized Miss Pugh's handwriting and laid it aside saying to myself, "Oh, that's good! they have sent me birthday greetings from Headquarters; I will read it after the business letters." It is well I did, for I was quite unfit for work for the rest of that day. Miss Willard's letter fell first from the envelope, and as I read I became more and more mystified. What could she mean? A music box? and for me? "Your white-ribbon sisters from many points of compass," she said, "have thus conveyed their loving thoughts of you, beloved little sister," and, "it has been thought fitting to send this music box as a birthday souvenir."

I attempted to read it all aloud to my nurse who was the only one in the house at that time. I began very bravely but broke down in the first sentence, and cried like my heart would break. Again when my sister came home, and the box had come, and the music started, I lost all control and acted the baby. My tears lie very deep, and so seldom come to the surface that I was really quite exhausted by night, and could not bear the excess of pleasure the sweet strains gave me, and had to have them shut away from me until the next day. Will you laugh at me when I tell you that I had my nurse "set it a going" at five o'clock the next morning? For several years I have longed for a music box, and all this spring I think "my mouth must have been a-makin' up for it," as I have had an increasing desire for one.

I only wish each and every one of you could come and sit down by my bedside and listen to its exquisite music. It would rest you as it does me, and I think you could hear the wonderful notes that it sings to me of more than earthly sweetness, tuned as it is by love to heavenly music. I was lying here in the moonlight the other night, listening to the "Wedding March," and as I listened I thought it would soothe me to hear that if I was dying. To each and all who have had a share in making this new source of happiness in an already happy life I want to send my most loving and grateful thanks. I wish I knew how to express what I feel; but I believe I need not wait for that now, but one day, when I have exchanged it for a harp you will find some notes ring out clearer and more praiseful because of your beautiful gift, and the tender thought that lies behind its sending.

In bonds that endear in time, and endure through eternity, I am yours lovingly and gratefully,

JENNIE CASSEDAY.

OFFICIAL ACTION OF THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL CONVENTION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Permit a statement ot the action of the Triennial International Sunday-School Convention, recently held in Pittsburgh, Pa., from the point of view of one cognizant of its deliberations. What was asked in the memorials and by Miss Kimball and myself was four specific temperance lessons yearly, on some other than review Sunday. What was granted was:

First. Two specific temperance lessons in 1892, and two optional temperance lessons in the same year, none of the four being placed on review Sunday. It was stated to be the opinion of the Lesson Committee and of the Executive Committee, ratified by the convention, that a similar arrangement would in all probability be practicable for the lessons in the years that follow 1892.

Second. There was no dissent from the opinion that the temperance lessons should not come on review Sunday. This, in itself, is a great gain.

Third. It was urged that temperance be taught in every lesson, so far as practicable.

Fourth. It was especially urged upon Sunday-school editors and publishers that the temperance lesson should be as carefully elaborated as any other lesson furnished.

Now I do not know how this may look to temperance people in general, but to me this action, unanimously gained (for it was finally made unanimous), is a long stride ahead, for which I feel sincerely thankful, though I most earnestly desired the four Sundays set apart. But I believe we should make the most of the gain that has come to us, looking forward to the years of instruction that are provided for under this plan, and with the utmost good will and faith toward our Sunday-school comrades coöperating with them to bring about the best results possible in the Sunday-schools of the nation for total abstinence in the individual and personal alliance with the temperance movement of our time.

Yours in the faith, FRANCES E. WILLARD.

Miss Willard having sent me the foregoing statement, I freely indorse it as correct, and express my confidence in the carrying out of the plan. B. F. JACOBS,
Chairman Ex. Com. International S. S. Asso'n.

A SABBATH IN TORONTO.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Toronto is a city of 216,000 inhabitants. I have been fortunate in forming the helpful acquaintance of the proprietor of one of the largest publishing houses in the Dominion. He is a Prohibitionist and an advocate of Sunday rest.

There are in Toronto one hundred and ten churches, all well attended. The one to which I was directed is a handsome stone church, Presbyterian, where a very plain talk was given to a large congregation. I am told that two of the Methodist edifices surpass this in the elegance of their interior finish. During a walk of about eight miles, in which I purposely included a number of the lowest streets and nearly the entire length of Jarvis and one or two other of the best streets, I saw only two intoxicated individuals. The most diligent search failed to discover an open saloon, and not a hotel had its bar open. There was not a semblance of a fight or trespass upon the public peace or order. In one instance, a number of men emerged from a low restaurant with a look as though their food did not quite agree with them, and that a slight provocation might make them cross, but it may have resulted from the lack of the stimulant to which they had been accustomed. If the sale of liquor can be repressed thus on the Sabbath and the effect of it is so beneficial, why can it not be done the remaining six days of the week?

The observance of the Sabbath is better enforced in Toronto than in any large city that I know of. The railroad trains are all stopped. Those arriving in the city on Saturday night or early Sabbath morning are compelled to "lay over" until evening. Not a street car is run on the Sabbath. What a delightful quiet and peace pervade! All day I have been asking myself if a city of 216,000 people can enforce Sabbath laws in Canada, why cannot we do so in the states? What a blessing to the people, and so to the country, would it be, to be able to have one day in seven for soul culture. To have entire suspension of business, of work, of noise, confusion, clatter; even on our business streets to have a sensation of rest; the stillness broken only by the melodious chimes of the church bells; surely this would have a softening, cultivating, refining influence on character. Every heart might not be lifted to worship, but the very change from the rush, hurry and noise of the other days carries an element of sacredness. A calm creeps into the spirit that invites contemplation.

Much has been said of the need of one rest day for all, especially for our laboring people,—our railroad employés, street-car conductors and drivers, and it has been objected that if they had the day they would spend it in debauchery. Whether this is a valid objection or not, they should have the day. If they abuse the privilege, the responsibility is theirs; if we refuse to give it to them, we are responsible. Certainly it seems, that with their week's wages in their pockets, the saloons closed, the churches open, a day of rest with their families, the chances of the laboring classes of our country coming to the discovery that they each have "a never-dying soul to save" would be greatly enhanced.

A FEW BITS FROM AN ASSEMBLY CAMP.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The Prohibitionists had two days at Long Beach, California, during the various assemblies there, and some bits of related personal experience were very interesting.

Mr. Henry French, of San Jose, chairman of the Prohibition party's central committee, was present. He is a groceryman, and ten years ago put out a sign, "No liquors nor tobacco." He had worked with the Republican party, helping it with his money and time, and one night was in a torchlight procession when he heard the street boys picking out men here and there in the procession.

"There's Mr. Jones," cried one, "and Mr. Smith," said another. "And there goes 'No liquor nor tobacco,'" shouted a third.

"Even the street gamins," said Mr. French, "could see the inconsistencies in my putting out such a sign and working with the Republican party.

It set him to thinking and he came out a party Prohibitionist with the result that at the end of the year he had done but $25,000 worth of business, while he had been doing $75,000 worth a year. "But," said he, "grocerymen are not the only ones persecuted. I've known even ministers to be."

He went out with Governor Waterman and a party of gentlemen to visit the poor-houses and asylums. "The boys" poked their fingers in his ribs and laughed at him for being a Prohibitionist, when Governor Waterman remarked, "Well, boys, I've been thinking if we all stood on Henry's platform there'd be no poor-houses and asylums to visit." And Governor Waterman is by no means a Prohibitionist.

Petitions were sent in without the knowledge of Mr. French to ask that he be made trustee of the Normal at San Jose. It was done, and his appointment not only astonished him, but the party politicians he had been ignoring. They even had it announced in the papers that it was "the other French who lived out a ways and kept a saloon."

He began to investigate to know if scientific temperance was taught in the Normal school, and when he found it was not, insisted that it should be. The others objected it was unusual; unheard of; this was not a common school; it would raise a furor; they didn't know how to teach it.

"Did you ever hear of Frances Willard," asked Mr. French, "or Mrs. Livermore, or Mrs. Hunt?"

"No, they were sure they were not Republicans."

"Well," said Mr. French, "some of them have been working this matter up, and the teaching is all provided for, and it must be done."

It was. Ninety-eight teachers taught scientific temperance in the training class and came out to teach it on graduation day.

Another gentleman who said he was "a Quaker tenderfoot from Indiana," told how he was at one time one of a legislative committee to consider the Baxter Bill, which was really a high license bill. One member of the committee was an infidel, all the rest were professing Christians.

"I hope that this bill will pass," said the framer.

"I hope it will not," said the infidel. "You are all Christians; I am not. I ask you this question, if selling liquor is right, why tax it so heavily; if wrong, how can Christians license it?"

After firing this shot, he picked up his hat, bowed politely and went out of the committee room. "And," said the gentleman, "Methodist, Baptist, and all, held a Quaker meeting. At last one remarked, 'Gentlemen, this is an embarrassing situation.'

"I thought so, too," went on the speaker, "and I made up my mind then and there that I would never be found in such another, and I never have. And that is how I became a party Prohibitionist."

At the Assembly Rev. Mr. Cherrington, a missionary for eighteen years in India, was teaching a class on the New Testament. Paul's much discussed instructions to the women of Corinth in regard to speaking in public was under consideration. He maintained that it was only because of the peculiar state of society there at that time.

He had, he said, known a parallel case in Lucknow, India. The only educated women were the dancing girls, women of known infamy. Among the Christians was a native helper, a woman of wonderful power, but when in Lucknow the ministers urged her to keep silent, because they said the native gentlemen will say, "Betsy Paul is a wicked woman." In the then weak state of the church it would have wrought great injury, "but now," said the speaker, "times have changed; Betsy is speaking with great and unusual power, and most wonderful results."

OUR ROUND-THE-WORLD MISSIONARY IN FRANCE.

My Dear Sisters:—In Lyons, a small total abstinence society exists, of which M. Bes, an earnest young worker, is president, but in consequence of its principles it is despised of men, even most of the good Protestants. Several opportunities were made for me to speak in regular meetings already arranged for, but only one was made for me, and that was of a class of boys which the Y. M. C. A., or the society corresponding to that, has taken in charge. Pasteur Theodore Monod translated for me once, and his eldest son at the boys' meeting mentioned, but none of that admirable family are abstainers, Mrs. Monod being more opposed than her husband. It was not possible to form a union. The Lord only knows whether time, money and strength were wasted in going there.

I took one afternoon for pleasure, and accompanied by my hostess, Mme. Müller, by means of three tram-lines, the last drawn through tunnels, by cables attached to stationary engines, reached to the top of a bluff, the old, first banks of a river or lake covering formerly much of the plain where the city stands. Here is a very old church, which has many tales of miraculous things connected with it, and, almost adjoining, a large and fine one is in course of construction. We entered both, and ascended to a balcony of the latter, on a level with the roof. If I had had strength to continue to the observatory at the top of one of the four corner towers, I should have had a finer view but from the balcony it was wonderfully beautiful. At our feet the city of 400.000 inhabitants, the Rhine and Saone winding through it, and meeting before its limits are passed; then the plain of Dauphiné, dotted with villages and small towns, and entirely under the highest cultivation, stretching many miles away, then in the horizon at the east, the Swiss Alps and Mt. Blanc, and round the entire horizon mountains so distant that they are a filmy blue, in color.

On Wednesday, the 21st, I left Lyons for Paris, accomplishing the journey in ten and a half hours, and I am established at Miss Norton's, a cousin of Miss Willard, who is studying French language and literature there, and supports herself by taking boarders. Americans preferred.

Two statements that I have seen in print in regard to drink in France, one about five years ago, concerning the quantity of alcohol per capita, and the other this year, as to deaths caused by drink, had led me to suppose that I should see more ill effects from it than travelers generally report. What I may see in Paris, or other cities that I may visit I know not, but my apprehensions for the future of France have become very grave in consequence of what I have seen in Lyons.

I arrived on Wednesday; Thursday was a holiday, Ascension day, and I think there was less work than on Sunday. As I sat by my window from 5 o'clock to 6:30 a. m. looking into one of the principal streets leading to the suburbs, I noticed many, many people, old and young of both sexes, greatly excited and flushed by wine. The cars of the trams were almost as high as my window, and very close; I could see the faces of the twenty or more people on each very clearly. Quite a number had fallen into a heavy, drunken sleep. During that hour and a half six men passed staggering to such an extent that they would probably have fallen had they not been supported by others less affected than themselves.

On Sunday I was out three times. In the morning I saw no effects of immediate drinking. In the afternoon only an excitement and uproarious hilarity in many persons, which, making due account for the joyous and effervescent temperament of the French, must be attributed to drink. On returning from my evening service I saw a number of persons on their feet, but still much excited and unsteady in their walk. We entered a tram where were seven or eight workmen in their good clothes. All were excited, rude and boisterous but one. They threw articles at one another, talked very loud, and not very properly. The one quiet one was in a heavy, drunken sleep. It was my unhappy lot to sit by his side, and the sickening stench of his breath was terrible. A young woman, very pretty, but of an extremely modest and quiet demeanor, came in; the only place for her was between two of these men. She was evidently made very uncomfortable. Presently they all left us, crowding, laughing, and still talking loudly.

Soon we alighted and sat down on a bench by the station to await the tram of another line that would complete our journey. A sleeping woman was already upon the bench when my hostess and I seated ourselves. As we were talking together we felt the bench move suddenly, and looking around the woman was not to be seen. We rose and soon found that she had fallen backward in the seat, into a sort of ditch that extended from the side station house. I felt for the beating of her heart, and found that her hand had quite a warm and natural feeling. My hostess was running about to find a police officer, but as our three times an hour tram came, we pointed her out to the man in the station who said he would call a policeman, and left her.

In the corner directly opposite me in the second tram was a military officer, wearing his uniform and sword, in a heavy drunken sleep. A neat girl, bareheaded, sat beside him, holding a parcel and a bottle of wine. She evidently had the care of the man, for when near where they left the car, she began shaking him violently, and calling him loudly. After repeated shakings, he woke and when the car stopped he rose and staggered out after the girl.

As to traces of the effects of drink to be seen in the people generally, I would mention a fixed, blotchy red on the cheeks, many times extending over the whole face, with red lines running through, showing permanent engorgement of the capillaries. If what Dr. Richardson says is true, namely that this is an indication of the same condition in some or all of the internal organs and their covering membranes, it would be well worth the while for the French to study alcoholism as a health measure.

At English tables in many parts of the world, I have seen much drinking, but taking all the meals of the day, more of other liquids have been taken than of alcoholic drinks, but the French drink wine, and almost nothing else. I took breakfast by invitation with the leading protestant pastor's family. Wine was poured for all the family, reduced more or less with water, according to the age. I suppose the mother would have thought me an impudent wretch, could she have seen the tempest of feeling that swept over me as I saw her hand a glass to each of her growing sons, and to her little daughter. Indeed, wine is drank in families, on trains, and in all places, as water is with us, and pure water, that is water unmixed with wine, more rarely than wine with us. One reads this in books, but it is not burned into the soul by that process as it is by seeing it day after day.

Within the last twenty years, so all tell me, there is a fearful increase in spirit drinking. It is possible that good may grow out of this. The evil may become so startling that good people will be willing by and by to give up their "good and harmless wine" in order to get rid of the stronger drinks.

With many pleasant memories of host and hostess, other friends and helpers, I came on to Paris. In reply to a letter to Miss de Broen I had received a postal from her secretary, who was with her, saying that she was in England. I wrote again, asking that some one from her office might come and talk with me about our W. C. T. U. work. A very pleasant and capable young lady, Miss Bidwell, came. It appears that nothing has ever been done by Miss de Broen for our work, except to wear the name of president. There are no meetings; those who gave their names at first cannot be gathered.

Miss de Broen has a flourishing medical mission to the poor, which is doing very great good. The entrance to her dispensary is through a gospel hall, where service is held from ten to eleven, four days every week, and at eleven, those in the hall pass into the dispensary. Miss Bidwell invited me to speak there. About two hundred had gathered. My interpreter was Mr. Hoste, brother to the missionary on the Congo who writes hymns by the wayside when his men stop to quarrel. At first he seemed quite unwilling I should talk on temperance, but as I insisted, he yielded, and I think in the end he did not repent my decision.

Thus the hope of assistance and advice from Miss de Broen failed me. Meantime I had been driving here and there, calling upon those whose names had been mentioned to me, as those who would be interested in my work, or to whom I had letters of introduction. Some had left Paris; some were too busy to undertake anything more; some believed in temperance, but not in total abstinence; some were quite certain that it was too soon to try to do anything in Paris.

I spent three hours and considerable money in going to see Mr. McAll, only to find that he would not be disturbed. Rev. Mr. Gibson and Rev. Mr. Hart, of the English Wesleyans, and Rev. Mr. Anderson, of the McAll Mission, gave me all assistance and countenance in their power, and so did Rev. Thurber, of the American Church, though circumstances prevented the help of the latter being as effectual as otherwise it might have been. Rev. Anderson is from Mauritius, and has two brothers in that island who helped me effectually there. He opened three of his meetings to me in different quarters of the city, and these were the largest audiences I had. Three meetings were arranged for me, one for French, two for English-speaking people, but all were poorly attended. I spoke in all nine times, and I think about one thousand people were present at these various meetings.

I called upon Mme. Emelie de Morsier, whom I had met in Geneva, but to my grief found her at the bedside of her husband, who is most seriously ill. There is hope of M. Morsier's ultimate recovery, but for many months his wife must devote herself wholly to him. The severe illness of Mme. Morsier's father confined her all winter, so that the year will be lost to the work she hoped to have done in gathering up the fruits of the Woman's Congress of last summer, which she so actively and successfully promoted; and in forming working committees.

The views expressed in regard to drunkenness in France, when writing of Lyons, were confirmed by what I saw in Paris. It is not necessary to enter into further details. Police regulations are, if not less strict, less rigidly executed since the Republic came into existence, so that drunkenness is less concealed than formerly, but still there has been a fearful increase within the last twenty years.

I would like to mention again, for the benefit of any Americans who may want a pleasant home in Paris, that they will find one at the house of Mrs. Van Pelt, 78 Boulevard St. Michel, or at Miss Norton's, 220 Rue St. Jacques. Both these ladies speak French admirably and there is much French conversation in both houses. I had the pleasure of meeting Dr. Helen Morton, of Boston, and other admirable Americans at Mrs. Van Pelt's, and others at Miss Norton's.

Very sincerely your sister,
Mary Clement Leavitt.

ANTI-LOTTERY WORKERS.

Dear Union Signal:—The New Delta, the New Orleans Anti-Lottery paper, in a recent issue, thus speaks of the labors of two of our temperance workers:

"The ladies are manifesting interest in the proceedings of the General Assembly and the spare seats are occupied by them nearly every day. Prominent among those present are Mrs. Goodale, one of the most noted ladies of the South, who has been characterized by the Northern press as the 'Little Phil Sheridan' of the temperance cause.

"A measure has been introduced rescinding the act of the session of 1888 relating to scientific and temperance instruction in the public schools. Mrs. Goodale is trying to prevent the passage of the measure.

"Mrs. Dr. J. J. Lyons, of New Orleans, was also up for a few days. Both these ladies are earnest anti-lottery advocates, and did not hesitate to 'lobby' among their friends on this question."

I need scarcely add that the "Mrs. Goodale" referred to is Mrs. Mary Read Goodale, our National organizer. Your readers will be glad to know that the efforts to prevent the repeal of the scientific temperance instruction law are likely to prove successful.

Yours very truly, Mary Lee Read.

TEMPERANCE TEMPLE ITEMS.

MATILDA B. CARSE.

Dear white-ribbon sister, brother, boy or girl: Have you a Temple mite-box on your table? If not, write to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, 145 Ashland Boulevard, Chicago, inclosing a two-cent stamp, and it will be promptly sent you on condition that you will drop into it a cent a day, or its equivalent, during the next twelve months. Mite-boxes in quantities will also be sent to unions for the cost of transportation.

The following frank confession from the vice-president of a county union in a certain Western state shows the state of mind of some of our white-ribboners, that we are induced to publish it and see if it will not set other prejudiced persons thinking, and incline them to make as noble a confession as the good woman who has written the letter, which is as follows:

"In making a program for our county W. C. T. U. convention the committee have put me down for a paper on the Temple. I have thought myself not in sympathy with the movement, and have kept myself willfully ignorant of the subject till now. As I study into the matter I find it decidedly important and myself very ignorant, notwithstanding the fact that I have read The Union Signal ever since it has been published. Can't you help me by sending me some paper on the subject, about the origin of the movement, its progress and present standing? It might do some good here, as it is a subject that has never been brought before the county union, and has not been urged with any vigor upon our local unions."

I ask the presidents of states if they have not been much at fault in the matter, in not urging with vigor this important work upon the local unions? The excuse that the unions are too poor to give is not a sufficient one. As the plans for raising the $100, which each union having thirty members is requested to give, can be easily accomplished by each member taking a mite-box, assuming the responsibility of either dropping in, herself, or getting her friends to drop in a penny a day during one year. The poorest surely can accomplish this without any great hardship. Miss Willard truly says—in her article on the Temple in The Union Signal of July 17—speaking of the great benefits the W. C. T. U. will derive from its erection: "I do not regard the money as by any means taking first rank. It is the esprit de corps; it is the turning of all our faces toward one point, and uniting our hands in one single great endeavor."

Among the resolutions adopted at the third annual convention of the Indian Territory W. C. T. U., which was held a short time ago, the following was passed:

Resolved, That we indorse the Temperance Temple, and recommend that each union take up the Temple work, distributing mite-boxes, getting up Baby Bands, etc.

May we not hope that a resolution of like nature will be adopted at all state W. C. T. U. conventions the coming fall? Indian Territory also has pledged $100 for the Temple, and is at work raising it. Mrs. Laura E. Harsha, of Muscogee, sends $3.36, her regular semi-annual donation from her own and her children's mite-box. She deposits thirty cents a month in the box, and her six little children a cent a week each. That cent a week will so engraft temperance in their character that the snare of strong drink will have no power over them in after life. Why do not more mothers try this plan? Mr. Dempsey, an Indian of the Cherokee nation, who lives at Tahlequah, Ind. Ter., called at the Temple office some time ago He knew all about the Temple, and was anxious to do something for it. He took six mite-boxes back with him to distribute among his people.

The personal gift fund for the Temple keeps increasing. Mrs. C. F. Woodman, of Cambridge, Mass., from a sick bed sends $100. A gift of $50 comes from an aged saint, Mrs. Nancy Hilliary, Burlington, Iowa; she is over three score years and ten. Mrs. C. S. Burnett, of Hartford, Ohio, sends $25, another installment on her pledge of $100 Mr. S. H. Haines, of Orange, N. J., sends another installment of $10 on his pledge of $100. He writes: "That Temple must go up, and I feel just as Daniel Webster did about the national debt when he said, 'I'll pay it myself,' so would I build the Temple if I could." Miss Kate Sanborne, of New York, sends $10 on her pledge of $100. Mrs. Nancy J. Hart, of Chicago, sends $50 on a pledge of $100. She denies herself her usual summer outing so she may be able to give to the building fund. Rev. Ada C. Bowles, of Abington, Mass., sends a second payment of $25 on her pledge of $100.

Mrs. E. N. Clements, of Philadelphia, Pa., sends $50, being the last payment on a subscription of $100, in memory of her husband, Rev. Samuel Clements, D.D. Mrs. Juliet Shannon, of Lee, Mass., sends $50 in addition to $50 already sent in memory of a beloved grandson, Wellington Hyde Shannon.

Mrs. G. H. Reed, of Bloomington, Ill., sends $5 on the anniversary of her son's, Clarence Gordon's, birthday (July 16). He was born into heaven, Feb. 28, 1890, after gladdening the hearts of his parents for twenty years by a spotless and beautiful life. Mrs. Lydia E. Graves, of Derry Depot, N. H., sends $1.55, in memory of her little boy, Eugene E. Graves, who died ten years ago. The money was found in his pocket and was too sacred for any other purpose than the building fund of the Temple, as he was a stanch little temperance boy.

All money orders and checks for the Temple should be made out in the name of Miss Esther Pugh, 161 La Salle Street, Chicago, National treasurer, and treasurer of the Temple fund. All information in regard to the Temperance Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, Pres. Woman's Temperance Building Association, 145 Ashland Boulevard, Chicago, Ill.

Our Children.

"BOYS WILL BE BOYS."

BY HARLAN H. BALLARD.

"Boys will be boys." We resent the old saying,
Current with men;
Let it be heard, in excuse for our straying,
Never again!
Ours is a hope that is higher and clearer,
Ours is a purpose far brighter and dearer,
Ours is an aim that should silence the jeerer:
We will be men!

"Boys will be boys" is an unworthy slander:
Boys will be men!
The spirit of Philip, in young Alexander,
Kindles again.
As the years of our youth fly swiftly away,
As brightens about us the light of life's day,
As the glory of manhood dawns on us, we say:
We will be men!

When "Boys will be boys" you exclaim, with a wink,
Answer us, men!
How old are those "boys"? Is their age, do you think,
Fifty or ten?
It may be the boys with whom you used to go
Considered wild oats not unpleasant to sow;
But how looks the harvest you hoped wouldn't grow,
Now you are men?

"Boys will be boys"? Yes! if boys may be pure,
Models for men;
If their thoughts may be modest, their truthfulness sure,
Say it again!
If boys will be boys such as boys ought to be—
Boys full of sweet-minded, light-hearted glee—
Let boys be boys, brave, loving and free,
Till they are men! —Exchange.

HER SPECIALTY.

BY A. N. EVERETT.

"What is your specialty?" said I, the other day, looking out over the top of my spectacles in a mildly-wise way at a fair young teacher who sat in authority over forty or fifty mischief-loving boys and girls ranging from seven to ten years of age.

"Good manners," said she promptly, smiling back at me in a way that made her remark a perfectly pleasant one. "At least, that is what they say, here in the building."

"Do you find the practical working of it brings about good results at the end of the year?"

"As good as the average and sometimes better. I hope I can teach something else, but I am willing to confess I give much of my time to my pet hobby, and find it helps me greatly in my regular school work. Would you like to look at my reports for the last few years?"

"You do not believe in corporal punishment, I see," said I, pointing to a column with no entries for several months.

"When positively necessary," said she; "but for three years I have not had a case of whipping in my room."

"And to what do you lay this?"

"I think I can venture to say—politeness, supplemented by unvarying kindness and patience."

Just then she was called out of the room for a few minutes. I am always fond of getting opinions of pupils themselves on various subjects connected with their school life; not because they are generally correct—do not imagine that for a moment—but one can often draw an inference and strike a pretty fair average by hearing all sides. So, as soon as she left, I pointed to a rough-looking little fellow near the front row and said—

"What kind of a school do you think this is, my boy? A pretty good one?"

"It's the politest one in town," answered he, promptly, "and we've got the politest teacher, too."

Several heads round about nodded approval.

"Good sentiment," said I, "but poor grammar. Well, what makes it such a polite school? Can any one tell?"

Silence for a moment, then another little chap in the next row said naturally enough:

"Guess it must be teacher."

"How does she do it?" asked I. "Does she make you mind pretty well?"

"Oh, she don't boss us around, you know. She always says 'please' and 'thank you,' and a fellow don't mind doing things when he ain't got to unless he has a mind to."

Commend me to ignorant and unthinking childhood for discovering the underlying motive that governs much of the conduct of mankind! I had discovered the secret force of this teacher, and saw that her school could be said almost to govern itself.

After the close of the session, I noticed a sulky, disagreeable looking boy who remained at his desk after the others had passed out. The teacher went over to him, and I could hear some low, earnest words from her and a few short answers from the boy. Presently he took up his book and slate and went to work with a will.

"I have conquered him," she said smilingly, as she came back to me. "He has been idle and sulky all the afternoon."

"What did you do?" asked I.

"I left him alone until all the others were gone; then I asked him if I had ever been unkind to him. He said 'No.' Had I ever done a rude thing to him? 'No.' Then why should he be both unkind and impolite to me? I showed him how he had displayed such feelings toward me by refusing to do what I thought a proper amount of work. He is both ashamed and repentant now."

On my way out, I passed a group of boys playing marbles. I stopped to watch the game, and fell into conversation with one little fellow, whose face I thought I recognized. He talked with me about the game for a moment, and then, as if a sudden thought struck him, pulled off his cap.

"What made you do that?" said I.

"Teacher says we always must, to old people." I would willingly have been twice as gray as I was, to hear that remark, and to see such a result of some one's good work.

"Have I seen you before, this afternoon?" asked I.

"Yes, sir. You have just come from my room."

So the good seed is bearing fruit already, thought I.

I afterwards learned, from frequent visiting in the building, that this teacher had so established the pleasant reputation of her room that children from lower grades looked forward to it as a sort of Mecca, in their pilgrimage through the course. I give the incident and experience for the help of young teachers, and I pray for the increase of such a spirit of kindly and beneficent rule in our schools.—The American Teacher.

WHAT CHILDREN THINK.

Professor G. Stanley Hall, of Harvard University, has made an interesting inquiry in the public schools of Boston, with a view to determine the contents of the minds of little children, and the results of his investigations have been published in the Princeton Review. Judging from Professor Hall's canvass, the average child has an extraordinarily confused notion of things, and much of its after life must be spent in reforming its early misconceptions.

Out of forty-eight children questioned, twenty believed the sun, moon, or stars to live; fifteen thought a doll, and sixteen thought flowers would suffer pain if burned. About three-quarters of all questioned thought the world a plain, and many described it as round like a dollar, while the sky is a flattened bowl turned over it. The sky is thin, and one might easily break through it. Forty-eight per cent of all thought that the sun at night goes, or rolls, or flies, is blown, or walks, or God pulls it up higher out of sight. He "takes it into heaven," and, perhaps, "puts it to bed," or—this is a pretty thought, even though unscientific—it "lies under the trees, where the angels mind it," or it goes through and "shines on the upper side of the sky."

Only in a single case were any of the heavenly bodies conceived as openings in the sky to let light or glory through, or as the eyes of supernatural beings—a fancy, Professor Hall remarks, so often ascribed to children, and so often found in juvenile literature. Thunder was considered to be God "groaning," or "kicking," or "rolling barrels about," or "turning a big handle," or "having coal run in," or "pounding about with a big hammer," or "clouds bumping or clapping together"—a superstition which is by no means confined to children's minds. Lightning is God "turning a gas quick," or (very common) "striking many matches at once," throwing "stones and iron for sparks," "setting paper afire," or it is a light going inside and outside the sky. God keeps rain in heaven in a "big sink," or in "rows of buckets," or in a big tub, or barrels and they run over, or he lets it down with a water-hose through a sieve, or "turns a faucet."

Not less confused are their notions of God and heaven, of which many curious examples are given. More satisfactory than these are the answers regarding matters of duty, showing, as Professor Hall observes, not necessarily an intuitive perception of right or wrong, but a general consensus at home in what is allowed and forbidden. The most frequent answers were to mind and be good, or to disobey, be naughty, lie, and say bad words. Boys say it is wrong to steal, fight, kick, break windows, get drunk, stick pins into others, or to "sass," "cuss," shoot, while girls are more apt to say that it is wrong not to comb the hair, to get butter on the dress, climb trees, cry, catch flies, etc.

Altogether this is a most interesting report. Allowance must be made, of course, for the children's timidity, for their tendency to answer at random without reflection, and for their desire to appear wise and to say not what they really think, but what they judge we would like to have them think. But, taking all these into account, there can be no doubt—as The New York Observer, from whose condensation of the article much of the above is quoted, says—that Professor Hall has got far enough into the interior of children's minds to prove their lack of definite conceptions and to emphasize the responsibility of parents and teachers.

The Still Hour.

FOR THE WEEK BEGINNING AUGUST 10, 1890.

BY REV. C. C. HARRAH.

DAILY BIBLE READING NOTES.

(Luke 16; Proverbs 2-7.)

Sunday, 10; Luke 16. Verse 8, The world should not be allowed to surpass the church in the adaptation of means to ends, and as the world shows so much purpose in its works, so should we prosecute with determination all means by which God may be glorified and an eternal home secured. Verse 10, The fact of our having one talent or five in no way adds to or diminishes God's favor toward us. His favor depends upon our fidelity in using what we have.

Monday, 11; Prov. 2. Verse 5, Continued, constant, and earnest seeking after wisdom will lead to the fear and the knowledge of God. Verse 6, No one should expect to get true wisdom by his own unaided efforts, but should ask it of the Lord in prayer. James 1:5.

Tuesday, 12; Prov. 3. Verses 1, 2, Wherever any one diligently keeps the law of God the best kind of a life is always the result. "Godliness . . . . hath promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." I Tim. 4:8. Verse 5, In order to accomplish success in life one should use all exertions of head and hands; but when he comes to death, the past will appear very unsatisfactory if all the way through he has not put his trust in God. Verse 9, When by diligence and God's blessing we are prospered in the things of the world, we should be unselfish, and show our gratitude by giving to good objects.

Wednesday, 13; Prov. 4. Verse 1, Every child should heed well the instruction of this chapter. Verse 14, One cannot too carefully avoid taking the first step of union with the wicked in their ways. Verse 15, Do not delay a moment when temptation stands in the way, but as quickly as possible get away from every occasion to sin. Verses 18, 19, Darkness always describes the way of the wicked, while light describes that of the righteous.

Thursday, 14; Prov. 5. Verse 5, Spiritual death here and eternal death hereafter are the doom of the strange woman and her followers. Verse 8, Safety is in flight, to those who are ensnared by the temptations of the flesh. II Tim. 2:22. Verse 21, No one can hide his sins from the eyes of God, and the justice of God will see that every one meets the punishment of his evil doing.

Friday, 15; Prov. 6. Verse 1, We should beware of improvidence and rashness in incurring obligations. Verse 6, A thoughtful person will find valuable lessons in the study of the common things of life. The ant does not borrow or beg, but provides for its own wants with a care and industry which many would do well to imitate.

Saturday, 16; Prov. 7. Verse 2, Every tempted soul should adhere closely to God's law, for his life depends on his keeping that law. As we have no other organ of light but the eye, so without God's law we would be in utter darkness. Verse 14, The devil always approaches an innocent soul on his blind side, and is likely to surround with a religious covering the most dreadful sins.

THE PRAYER MEETING TOPIC.

(The Benefits of Christian Work. Matt. 12:30.)

1. It unites all people who are engaged in doing any good services for humanity, and brings together and unites all good influences, so that their power may be most deeply felt upon the world.

2. Christian work proceeds in the direct lines of truth, and wherever it is in progress the minds of men are kept active in searching for the truth. The pulpits and the churches may not see clearly, as yet, the higher and better things, but they cannot proceed one step in Christian work without encouraging people to look toward the higher and the better. Under the stimulus of this common talk, some will always push ahead to find the things of progress, and, by its very nature, the church has been and always will be raising up reformers.

3. No one can put too high an estimate upon the benefits of the common lines of Christian work to the prodigals, the tempted, the needy and the poor.

The Household.

WELCOME HOME.

BY MRS. M. O. PAGE.

There is no life too sweet to live,
No day nor hour too rich to give
To winning back from paths of sin
The hearts who sadly tread therein.

Who would not run on willing feet
Along a hot and dusty street,
To point to some dear soul instead
A cooling path on which to tread?

Who would not place on some far height
The burning splendor of a light,
That shining on o'er land and sea
A "welcome home" its light may be?

WORDS TO THE WISE—"MAKING 'EM BEHAVE."

BY ABBY MORTON DIAZ.

"Catechised the young children, and made 'em behave."

"What an acting child!" "Stop that!" "Shame on you!" "Come, Miss Slowcoach!" "Now I'm afraid you're telling a lie!" "Do that again and I'll punish you!" "Naughty child! Now you shan't go to the party!"

Fathers and mothers have the wish in common that their children be truthful, brave, kind, faithful, honorable, polite, unselfish, energetic. By way of securing these qualities it is customary to denounce the opposite ones, exhibitions of these calling forth anger, ridicule, reproach, contempt or bodily chastisement, or continuous nagging, according to the moods, or the intelligence, of the powers that be. The wise will please take notice that this state of things implies a division of interests; implies antagonism. Stating the situation in a general way, the children are supposed to delight in evil, to consider it ever so much better than good, and to try to get all they can of it, or, as one may say, to take comfort in badness; and the mother as trying to spoil their joys and take away this comfort by means above mentioned. It naturally follows that to indulge in conduct which has met disapproval is considered by the children as so much advantage gained over the opposing force.

Here is a newspaper illustration: "Billy—'I say, Tommy, let's go off behind the barn with these crackers and burn our fingers.' Tommy—'Whatcher wanter burn y' fingers for?' Billy—'Mommer told me not to.'"

Children, as human beings, have the common human propensity to do the forbidden. Why not recognize this and act accordingly? The happy secret of success is to win the children over to the other side, thus causing them to have the desire to be what they are desired to be. To illustrate, suppose that meanness or deceitfulness be strikingly manifested. The mother arrays herself against this, lectures, denounces, threatens, punishes, all to no purpose. Now suppose that instead of all this she takes opportunities, or makes them, of showing up these and other evil traits in a despicable light, or their opposites to admiration, doing this so skillfully that the aim is not apparent. An effective way, the most effective way, of doing this is by reading, or telling, now and then, a story bearing on the special point. Appropriate incidents occur in every neighborhood, and meet the eye in every newspaper. Let these receive judicious comment.

At a dinner table recently an invalid lady acquaintance was the subject of conversation. Perceiving the children's earnest attention, one of the company spoke in warm terms of this lady's remarkable qualities, saying, "It is wonderful. Lying there, seldom free from pain, she has always for her friends a pleasant word and sunny smile, and is always planning for other people's happiness." No doubt the children caught something, for goodness is as catching as badness, though many seem loth to believe it.

It is said that the thrifty are those who make the most of the resources close at hand. Every mother has close at hand the child's longing for stories. By taking advantage of this, children can be reached to the very inmost by means of the imagination and the heart, and never suspect that any good is being done to them. Yes, by keeping this aim in view, and by taking pains enough and time enough, and giving sufficient thought to the matter, children can be reached and made positively in love with all that is good and to hate all that is bad. Thus antagonism will be avoided, the opposing forces will be at one, concord will vanquish discord, and we shall have harmonious homes. Probably fathers and mothers in general will not keep the aim in view, will not take the trouble, will not give the matter sufficient thought. Far easier are reproof, sarcasm, ridicule, the angry word, the brutal blow. These give vent to the impatience or irritability of the mother or of the father, and are quick over, leaving time for the main things, so-called. But what are the main things? Were there space enough much might be said of the advantage of interesting children in their lower kindred; the human traits in animals, the mysteries of insect life and of insect intelligence; the wonderfulness of plant structure. To follow out together either of these lines would establish companionship between parent and child and thus tend to do away with that apartness, that division of interests so common in families.

And there are other lines for mutual following, that, for instance, of taking concern for the needs of those outside the family, and of striving that kindliness and a gentle spirit pervade the home. Moreover, by moving in, so to speak, upon the territory of a child's mind, the good can take possession before the enemy has a chance to preëmpt the ground; the enemy being dime novels and all kinds of low pleasures. How shall mothers be made to think about all these things? They, sooner than the fathers, can be aroused to thought. The next Words will suggest how.

THE QUIET STRANGER.

BY NOBLE M. EBERHART.

John Ledyard wandered slowly and disconsolately along the almost deserted street. It was all over. Nancy, his long suffering wife, had passed beyond the reach of earthly trials and afflictions. How vividly the past came back to him now! Nancy and he had been schoolmates in the old days. The youthful love had ripened when he led blushing Nancy to the altar. What a glorious future had seemed to open before him!

It was the old story. The temptation; the first glass; the growing appetite; and finally the drunkard's curse. One by one their three children had died through the workings of this same dread curse. Still the faithful wife clung to him; ever laboring and ever hopeful; but now, she, too, was gone. With the feeling of despair came the desire to drown it all in drink. Quickening his pace he soon entered a saloon. Several glasses were drained, but such was the nervous excitement he was laboring under, that the pain in his heart would not be stilled.

While thus engaged, all eyes were attracted to a quietly dressed stranger who entered the room. Tall and erect was his bearing, and on his face an expression so kind, so mild, as scarcely to be mortal. But why was he here?

Interfering with no one, he sat down quietly in a chair at one of the tables. In answer to the waiter's inquiry, he shook his head quietly, but firmly, and continued to sit there as if lost in thought. Many were the strange speculations of the men as to whom he was, whence he came, and what was his mission. But still he sat there, seemingly unconscious of the attention he was attracting.

Men ceased their carousing to stare at him. At last, when there was a momentary hush in the room, he arose and mounting a table stood for a moment looking upon his surroundings.

Immediately every eye was fixed on him. Then with his face looking down upon the men like some messenger of the Omnipotent, he commenced the old song, "Long, Long Ago." His voice was singularly rich and clear, and as the mellow notes rose and fell, the crowd seemed to rise and fall with them.

"Where are the friends that to me were so dear,
Long, long ago, long, long ago;
Where are the hopes that my heart used to cheer,
Long, long ago, long ago.
Friends that I loved in the grave are laid low,
Hopes that I cherished have fled from me now,
I am degraded, for rum was my foe,
Long, long ago, long ago

"Sadly my wife bowed her beautiful head,
Long, long ago, long, long ago;
Oh! how I wept when I found she was dead,
Long, long ago, long ago.
She was an angel, my love and my pride,
Vainly to save me from ruin she tried,
Poor broken-hearted, 'twas well that she died,
Long, long ago, long ago.

"Let me look back on the days of my youth,
Long, long ago, long, long ago;
I was no stranger to virtue and truth,
Long, long ago, long ago.
Oh, for the hopes that were pure as the day,
Oh, for the love that was purer than they,
Oh, for the hours that I've squandered away,
Long, long ago, long ago."

When the last word had died away, the stranger bent his head for a moment in silent prayer. Tears stood in the eyes of many of the men as they bowed their heads. Then, as quietly and unostentatiously as he had come, the stranger glanced slowly around, stepped down and passed out. One by one the men followed him until but few remained.

John Ledyard sat as if stunned. Ever through his weary brain surged the words of the song. Then, straightening up like a man, with a look of determination on his face, he strode firmly out into the night.

Back along the quiet streets to the old church-yard he went with rapid strides. At last he paused before a newly-made grave—that of Nancy, his wife. Standing there he bowed his uncovered head in a long and fervent prayer, the first that had escaped his lips since Nancy and he had knelt together with their first-born.

It was not easy to keep the vow he made that night. Many and long were the struggles against temptation, and often when he was almost yielding came back the remembrance of the quiet stranger, and the words of the old song, which gave him new strength and courage.

HOW TO DO IT.

BY EARNEST.

"It was not accomplished suddenly and spontaneously, but by patient, plodding, persevering application, the way all great things come to light and usefulness in the world." So says one writing of Samuel F. B. Morse and his great invention, in a current magazine. As I read it I felt its truth most forcibly as applied to reform work of all kinds. "Patient, plodding, persevering application." It is this only which can bring about deep and lasting changes for good in human life and character, and only as we keep this thought in mind can we stay our souls upon the meager results of to-day's toil and go hopefully on with renewed effort for the morrow.

Think how Morse worked and waited. It was eighteen years after he began the study of electro-magnetism before the first short telegraphic line was constructed, and from Washington to Baltimore flashed the message, "What hath God wrought." Eighteen years of hard work and poverty, made still harder by the unbelief and indifference of those whose aid he sought, but he had the "courage of his convictions," as all must have who stand for innovations, and would not be defeated or turned aside. He must have felt that he was working with the eternal forces and in the line of truth, and why should he falter? Why should any one falter who works for the truth? All truth, of whatever nature, is God's, and He is working through all our efforts to know the way of advanced life. It is His strength that sustains us; His love that makes our hearts tender and true; His wisdom that guides and directs us, His patience that inspires our patience, and, surely, in His own good time, He will help us to overcome all evil.

It is not the impulse to good, born in a moment of excitement and enthusiasm, that is most lasting or that tells deepest in our after life, but that born of calm judgment and deep thinking, the fruit of "patient, plodding, persevering application." That which comes with excitement too often goes when the excitement is over, leaving one with less strength to stand erect, less courage to combat with temptation.

True reform grows slow, almost imperceptibly so, we sometimes feel, but God works with us, and in the "fullness of time," the glad morn comes, when we know the good we sought is done, and over the lines from brain to brain, from soul to soul, flashes the glad message, "See! 'What hath God wrought!'"

The work, the hope of the future, lie with the children of to-day, and because of this, we would inspire the parents to give them a right start in life. Lead them early into the kingdom of Good and Beauty, and teach them of the work which awaits the hand of the toiler. Fill the youthful mind with the courage of a high resolve and the patience necessary to continuous effort. Teach them the grandeur of human life. Let them learn to know that in man is the highest expression of the all-pervading God-life, and fit them to live as becomes children of the King, regarding their bodies as temples for the indwelling of immortal souls, and to be kept "pure and undefiled."

O FOR the spirit which is content with nothing less nor lower than the highest help. To turn in temptation directly to the power of God; to cry out in sorrow for God's company; to be satisfied in doubt with nothing short of the assurance that God gives; to know that there is no real escape from sin except in being made holy by God's holiness—these are what make a man's complete salvation. It is your privilege and mine, as children of God, to be satisfied with no help but the help of the Highest.—Phillips Brooks.

SOME PHASES OF THE SITUATION.

In the seething whirl of opinions started by the Original Package decision and Congressional action growing out of it, we are in danger of drifting into mistakes. Mr. Edwin C. Pierce, whose able article on the situation is concluded this week, warns us against the notion that if Congress should succeed in passing the Original Package Bill in such shape that it can become a law, it will thereby exhaust its powers in aid of temperance. He argues that this is a mischievous doctrine, and one having no foundation in fact. In a private letter received after his article was in type, Mr Pierce writes: "In their regret that the assertion by the Supreme Court of the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress over original package sales in states has impaired the value of state legislation, many are inclined to exalt the state rights idea. It would be unfortunate in the extreme if prejudice in favor of the exclusive jurisdiction of the states over the traffic internal in a state should take root in the temperance mind. The confusion arises because the friends of temperance are now called to be, in a sense, upon both the national and the state rights sides at the same time. Their interest is to maintain that the liquor traffic affects the general welfare and ought to be suppressed by the nation, and at the same time to maintain that the jurisdiction of Congress is concurrent, not exclusive, and to demand that until the decision is rendered, Congress shall interpose for the relief of the states; but further, and this especially, to maintain that Congress indeed possesses paramount, although concurrent power over the whole subject, which ought to be immediately exercised to kill the traffic. Happily the Constitution is in accord with their interest. The jurisdiction of Congress is plenary and paramount, but concurrent, not exclusive, over internal traffic having national relations."

It is well for us all to be thinking and studying along this line. If the position taken by Mr. Pierce is the true one, there is no need of waiting for an amendment to the Federal Constitution before national prohibition can be secured. Congress already has the power to sweep the liquor traffic from the land.

Judging from its present attitude, Congress is a long way from the point where its constitutional right to abolish the liquor traffic will be tested. It shows no desire to hurt the pet institution. One who has carefully watched the discussions in the House can hardly help feeling that the do-nothing policy is the one deliberately adopted. Every speaker deplored the situation, and declared that something ought to be done; yet the fact that nothing tangible is done, suggests the suspicion that all this regret in speeches is only buncombe designed for the respectable part of their constituency at home.

Hon. William D. Owen, of Indiana, said: "The country suddenly finds itself confronted by the confessedly greatest of evils and the proclamation of the United States Court giving it the freedom of the land. The country is appalled and appeals to Congress. The Supreme Court itself saw the inevitable result and counsels Congress to exercise its legislative functions. It is a condition of things which meets the approbation of nobody in the government." And this is true; yet what is Congress going to do about it?

This is the condition of affairs: the country is confronted with the situation depicted by Indiana's representative; the greatest of evils has been given the freedom of the land by the Supreme Court, at the same time the court suggests to Congress a way in which it may restrain the evil it has invoked. It seems to us very much like a man's letting a mad dog loose in his neighbor's yard and easing his conscience by yelling at his neighbor to muzzle him; but with that phase of the question we have nothing to do now, we are simply considering the action of Congress in the premises. When confronted with the situation, the Senate passed an Original Package Bill, not as good as it might have been, but better than nothing. It went now to the House; that body, after dilly-dallying over the matter for weeks, passes an entirely different bill which, of course, cannot become a law until passed by the Senate. Taking into consideration the time of year—a season beyond which Congress seldom remains in session—the amount of business on hand, and the natural disinclination of the Senate to take up a bill framed by the House that had rejected its own, there seems very little prospect of the enactment of any law by this Congress to relieve the situation.

We do not believe in speaking evil of dignities and are very slow to impute bad motives to our rulers; but we cannot help feeling that there is some method in this which seems so like madness. It looks very much like an attempt to carry water on one shoulder and whisky on the other; whether they intended it or not our lawmakers in either house are now in a condition to say to their temperance constituency, "Don't you see we did all we could for you, we passed the bill and cannot help it that the other house did not agree to it." At the same time they can say to their liquor constituency, "We took good care that nothing should be done to interfere with your privileges under the United States court's decision." This may not have been intended, but such convenient situations are not apt to come to politicians accidentally.

MISS WILLARD'S DEN.

One result of the visit of delegates to the National Convention last fall to Rest Cottage was the determination of Mrs. Thorp and Mrs. Shapleigh, of Massachusetts, to make Miss Willard's workshop more worthy of its occupant. During all the spring, masons, carpenters, painters, decorators have been busy under the wise supervision of Helen L. Hood, Miss Kate Jackson and Mrs. Carrie Whitely, of the local committee, transforming the "den" into a thing of beauty. Now it stands complete with its fireplace and its bay window, which were Miss Willard's especial objects of desire—another memorial of the loving care of Miss Willard's dear white-ribboners. On her last return home the beautiful room was dedicated, Miss Hood, chairman of the local committee, making the address, while Madam Willard, Miss Willard and Mrs. Andrew made fitting responses. But so modest are Miss Hood and Mrs. Andrew that though working side by side with me, they never told me of the affair, leaving me to learn of it through Our Message all the way from Boston. Miss Hood's address, as given in the Message, was as follows:

"MADAM PRESIDENT:—When in the course of human events it becomes necessary to enlarge the 'Den' of a National President, the first work of the committee was 'to raise the roof.' We do not mean this in the parlance of the world, as your committee have, in no sense, committed such an offence. Knowing very well how often nowadays your mind and heart turn towards the South, we arranged so that the addition might be made upon this side. As we thought what the fittings of the room should be, we said oak, iron, and brick must enter into the construction; materials indicating strength, character, purpose, such as the platform of our W. C. T. U. is composed of—a platform which YOU have so largely built, so strong and firm that now the whole world can rest thereon. We knew how you love light and warmth, and so we said there must be a fireplace, and when dark, cold, dreary days come, you could look into the depths of a glowing fire and be warmed thereby, just as out of the richness and warmth of your loving, generous nature you have shed gladness and brightness into the hearts of many, into lives where 'dark and dreary' days have come. The room must have light, an abundance of it, so these broad windows were made to let God's sunlight in, just as by your unceasing efforts you have let the light of a pure gospel come in to many a darkened soul. The floor over which so many feet will pass must be of the sturdy oak, smooth and well polished, indicating the courtesy and gentleness which you have brought into our work—the polish of a true Christian woman. The decorations of the walls must be harmonious in tint and coloring, like those which you have blended and woven in your life work—a pure soul and a spotless name. The table must be broad and strong, for on it will lie many documents, some weighty and massive in character, with letters sent to near and dear ones. We place upon the table an electric bell which shall quickly summon your trusty secretaries to bear away important documents, and 'orders' which, when heard, will 'turn about face' many thousands of true and loving hearts who so willingly execute the commands of their loved commander. * * * In presenting you with the key of this 'Den,' Madam President, we do so, having accomplished the work we set out to do some months ago. We regret greatly that the 'generous donors' who have made the enlargement of this place possible might not have been with us this evening; their names will be given to you later on in bound form. Your committee have given service with willing feet, ready hands, and full, loving hearts. We trust that this room will be a source of comfort and pleasure to you, and that your life may grow deeper and richer each day—your life-consecrated work more outreaching."

President Toby congratulates herself, as well she may, upon the fact that the happy thought which has had this glad fruition was given to two local officers in the Massachusetts W. C. T. U.

THE ENGLISH BREWERY SYNDICATE.

The Chicago and Milwaukee Brewers' Association are carrying matters with such a high hand that a lively war between them and the saloon men threatens. At their last meeting the Association resolved that hereafter no saloon-keeper shall be allowed to change from one brewer to another. If it can be ascertained that a saloon-keeper has transferred his patronage from one brewer to another, the brewer to whom the saloon-keeper goes shall pay to the one whom he has left, a royalty of not less than three dollars per barrel for all the beer he sells to said saloon-keeper. That is personal liberty with a vengeance.

Here is what a leading saloon man in Chicago says about it: "I won't stand that kind of business. I will buy my beer of whom I please so long as I have the money to pay for it, and though I have always patronized Chicago breweries until a few days ago, I am now getting my beer from Anheuser & Busch, of St. Louis. We have had miserably poor beer here for six years, in fact, ever since the breweries began making their beer out of corn. I would not drink corn beer myself, and I won't ask my customers to do so. It is cheaper by far; they can make corn beer for $1.50 per barrel and it has in it fusel oil, a great deal of alcohol and other noxious ingredients. Then these men ask us to pay $6 for this stuff. I can see that the beer industry must undergo a great change within a few years. Since these English syndicates came over here there has been very little pure beer made, and this has been made by small American concerns. I have been buying from one of these up to the time that prices went down so, a couple of weeks back. My brewer, being a comparatively poor man, could not hold out at the cut rate, so he had to go in to save himself. Now, I suppose he will have to make this corn beer, too."

Another declares: "That is simply damnable. It would be all right to say that a man could not go from one to another while he owed the first one, but to say that a solvent business man could not get goods except from one man is going a little too far for even these English syndicates. I wouldn't stand that thing at all. I don't patronize the syndicate. There are two reasons why I don't do this, the principal one being that my customers insist on good beer and because this syndicate is making the very cheapest beer that can be turned out. Their profit? Why, of course, it is large, but they had better make the most of it. It cannot last. This beer business is getting so low since this syndicate came in here that it is impossible for it to remain as it is. The brewers have for years past made a profit of from 30 to 50 per cent on their investment; then these Englishmen come in here and pay a big price for their plants; then to get business in good shape they water the stock so that it will pay 8 or 10 per cent. What is the result? They meet with competition because they start out making bad beer. New and independent breweries go into business and make a good article and everybody who can do so patronizes them. It costs the syndicate money to fight these new concerns and proportionately their profits are cut down. Then they get disgusted and the final rows come, and they will sell out at a great loss, just as they did at Detroit when they first started this syndicate brewery business."

All charge the English syndicate with the mean business; we felt sure good would come to the temperance cause from its purchase of breweries and distilleries, though we did not foresee it would come in this way. But it is welcome in whatever way it comes; if the fight keeps up between the brewers and saloon-keepers, light will be shed "on ways that are dark and tricks that are queer," and light is the very thing that our friend, the enemy, dreads.

WYOMING POLITICS.

Judge and Mrs. Joseph M. Carey, of Cheyenne, Wyoming, have been in Chicago lately, and the Judge has been frequently "interviewed" by reporters of the local press, on the workings of woman's ballot. No man in the world is better able to give a just decision in the case than he. Appointed to the Supreme Bench of the territory by President Grant, twenty years ago, he has been, for a score of years, resident of Wyoming, and intimately acquainted with the working of equal suffrage. He is now serving his third term in Congress, as Territorial Delegate from Wyoming, and will probably be one of the new state's first Senators.

As is well known, the Chicago Tribune has never favored woman's suffrage, so that its report of an interview with Judge Carey does not need to be taken with the "grain of allowance" which might have been necessary if we had been the interviewers. It quotes Judge Carey as saying:

"As becomes the only state in the Union where women can vote for President, our politics are exceptionally pure. The women are great at scratching tickets, and as a rule they are not politicians and do not care for office or political excitement. They are not so subject to party influence as men, and the right of suffrage gives them a certain leverage for their own protection which they are not slow to use. It would be disastrous for a man of bad reputation to run for office in Wyoming.

"The women constitute less than twenty per cent of the voting population of the new state. There are always many more men than women in a new country like ours. Usually about one-half of them go to the polls. The distances are great, and they regard voting more in the light of a duty than a pleasure. Hence it is that ordinarily not more than half of them will vote. Let me say that in the twenty-one years' experience Wyoming has had of woman suffrage, its influence has always been salutary and is regarded by us as one of our most precious safeguards."

These facts, given by one who has exceptional facilities for knowing whereof he speaks, will outweigh tons of conjectures and theories, unsustained by facts.

THE POSTOFFICE AND THE LOTTERIES.

As a first page note, two weeks ago, concerning the proposed change in postal laws relating to lotteries, seems not to have made the matter clear to our readers, we will state the case more explicitly. The present law is inadequate in several particulars: it gives no power to the Postmaster General to seize, detain, or withhold suspected lottery matter without action by the courts. This practically makes him powerless, for under existing law, these cases come mainly before Louisiana courts, because most of the obnoxious matter is mailed in that state, and Louisiana courts are so in the grasp of the lottery octopus that it is next to impossible to secure conviction in them, of lottery offenders. The substitute bill makes the mailing of lottery letters or circulars a continuous offense, triable by courts in any jurisdiction through which they may pass, or into which they may go.

A greater benefit even than this is closing the mails to newspapers containing lottery advertisements and lists of prizes; this will not only, in a measure, cut the line of communication between the lottery and its desired victims, but it will also react on the newspapers, compelling them to choose between a general circulation and lottery advertisements.

These are new features introduced into the substitute bill since we made the previous note; in that the point emphasized was applying postal laws in regard to lotteries, to letters sent to lotteries through agents, as well as to those directed to the companies. If enacted it will close a big gap, as now the law is systematically evaded by having the obnoxious matter sent to a third person; if the substitute becomes a law it will permit the Postmaster General to deny to any agent of the lottery company the benefit of the registry and money order system as well as apply all penalties of the lottery law to all agents dealing in its tickets, be they banks or private individuals.

Our Book Table.

OUR FLAG, by Robert Allen Campbell. Published by H. E. Lawrence & Co., 96 State street, Chicago. Price $1. This book deserves a hearty welcome, as do all that help to make young Americans intelligent and patriotic citizens. It traces the history of the stars and stripes through colonial days, going even further back into the heraldry of England and of Spain for suggestions pointing toward the idea which was finally embodied in our national emblem. Many interesting facts in history are brought to light; here is one new to us, that the idea of the pine tree flag with its motto, "An appeal to Heaven," originated with Washington. That this is the case is proved by two letters written by him October 20, 1775.

The story of the committee that decided on the design of the colonial flag is delightfully told; from it we learn that a lady whose name is not given, was added to the committee at the opening of its first session and acted as its secretary; that its meetings were held at the house of herself and husband in Cambridge, Mass., where Washington was then in camp, and that the main suggestions concerning the flag were made by an octogenarian who comes down in history only as "the Professor." He it was who suggested the innovation of adding a lady to the committee of six gentlemen. He declared that the field of our flag must be new because ours was a new nation, founded on a new principle, the equal rights of man with man, but that while its field must be new, the details in working out may unite ideas already familiar. He therefore recommended the English East India Company's flag as one which can easily be adapted to the purpose. His suggestion was adopted and the colonial flag of thirteen stripes of equal width, red and white alternating, and the Cross of St. George for a union, became the flag which General Washington, with his own hands, hoisted on a pine tree liberty pole, thus unfurling to the breeze for the first time the banner of the colonies. When Independence had been declared, a blue field on which shone thirteen white stars took the place of the union in the colonial flag.

The last new book that has come from Lothrop's is HERMIT ISLAND, by Katharine Lee Bates, that successful writer of thousand dollar prize stories. No story she has written excels this in interest, and none equal it in fine delineation of character. Two sisters, as like and as different as ever two sisters were, are brought by their misanthropic father to Hermit Island after the death of their mother. Here dwelt the lonely, unpractical "Uncle Maurace," with his four boys, jolly Captain Brimblecomb and Baby Merry, his grandchild, who ruled him and everything else in her mimic realm with a rod of iron. Each child is a study, and all, especially the characters of the two little sisters, evince great analytical power. There are few stronger pictures in literature than Dolo's midnight holocaust of all she held most sacred, with a solemn dedication of herself to the Powers of Evil. Yet there is nothing revolting in the weird scene which proves the turning point in a life which from the morning following commenced to open out into a beautiful womanhood. A scene so weird and uncanny would seem to predicate a story full of such influences; on the contrary this is genuinely healthful throughout, and though sometimes powerfully dramatic, is always sweet, pure, and elevating. Price $1.25.

FAITH, OR EARTHLY PARADISE, AND OTHER POEMS, by Ellen E. Hebron. This book is dedicated to the author's mother, and to the brave band of noble men and women who go forth to labor in the Master's vineyard in foreign fields. This dedication shows how much her heart is interested in missions. The poems making up the book were most of them written sixteen years ago, evidently out of deep heart experiences. The main poem depicts the life of an almost sinless woman from her birth, through childhood, young girlhood, maidenhood and maternity, taking her through more than the usual vicissitudes of life, everywhere sustaining her by the strength of God. Scattered through the book are the music and words of several sweet songs. Many of the shorter poems are on temperance themes; several of them being especially dedicated to the Y's of the Southland, the author's home. She is as ardent a W. C. T. U. woman as she is a friend of foreign missions, and testified her loyalty to the cause by sending her manuscript from Edwards, Hinds Co., Miss., to the W. T. P. A. to print. It is illustrated by portraits of herself and family.

A new venture in journalism is the IOWA TEMPERANCE MAGAZINE, published at Charles City, Iowa, by B. F. and L. M. Wright, editors. It is a sprightly, wide-awake monthly of thirty-two pages, exclusive of covers; the only wonder is that it can be afforded for its subscription price, only fifty cents a year. This initial number is properly given largely to the original package decision and its workings in Iowa and Kansas. But it has plenty of other interesting matter to indicate what it can do in that line. Its short paragraphs are especially good, for example: "Beer is legislator for the country: the masses drink it and under its influence choose our rulers." "Don't ask God to deliver you from evil and then go and vote for the greatest evil in existence." We give the new magazine hearty welcome and trust it may have abundant success.

In THE BUSINESS WOMAN'S JOURNAL are opened two new departments. One of these, in the interest of teachers, is edited by Mrs. May Wright Sewall, of Indianapolis. This lady in her first editorial gives the public to understand that THE BUSINESS WOMAN'S JOURNAL intends to make a strong fight for the payment to women teachers of salaries equal to those which are received by men. The other new department is under the editorial management of Mrs. Estelle H. M. Merrill ("Jean Kincaid" of the Boston Globe), and is to be devoted to the interests of journalists. A will drawn up in strict legal form, showing how it should be correctly written on the type-writer, is given in the department devoted to the interests of stenographers and type-writers, together with much other valuable advice. The article entitled "Women Who Mold Public Opinion," is beautifully illustrated with portraits of Mrs. Charlotte Emerson Brown, the newly elected president of the Federation of Clubs, Mrs. Amelia K. Wing, president of the Woman's Club of Brooklyn, and Mrs. Phœbe Hearst, president of the Century Club of San Francisco, and the wife of Senator Hearst, of California. Published by the Mary F. Seymour Publishing Co., 38 Park Row, New York.

The second and third volumes of Dr. Burns' TEMPERANCE HISTORY, the first volume of which we noticed at length on its appearance, are now before us. They bring the record down to 1872, and are as full of interest as the first number. One more volume completes the series. London, National Temperance Publication Depot, 33 Paternoster Row, E. C.

The Watch-Tower.

Here is a pen picture of Carmen Sylva, Queen Elizabeth of Roumania, at the time of her wedding, 1869: "A tall, splendid figure, a finely-molded form, large, blue, dreamy eyes, with a world of poetry in their clear depths; a classical mouth, whose graceful curves seem formed but for smiles; rows of pearly teeth, a finely-cut nose, a profusion of light, wavy hair, and exquisitely-formed hands." Now, at forty-seven, she retains most of these beauties, except that her hair has whitened, and she has acquired a more dignified and stately presence.

Miss Jessie McIntosh, of Georgia, invented an apparatus for preserving fruit in transit by railroad, which proved such a success that she sold the patent for a handsome sum. She invested the money so judiciously that it has almost trebled itself in two years. She is now engaged on another invention which she considers more remarkable than the first, but as it is not quite perfected, she keeps its nature a secret.

Wyoming women know how to appreciate their chivalric brothers who so nobly stood by them in the contest for statehood. At the grand celebration at the capital, Mrs. Theresa Jenkins, superintendent of franchise in state W. C. T. U., was orator of the day for the ladies; in her address she paid beautiful tribute to the work done by M. C. Brown, president of the constitutional convention; George W. Baxter, who introduced the equal suffrage clause into the constitution; J. K. Jeffrey, chairman of committee; J. W. Hoyt, F. E. Warren and J. W. Carey. Speaking of Esther Morris, Mrs. Jenkins said: "In the days of the past there came to this region a woman who had been reared among the hardy minds of the East. She brought with her her family, her garden seeds, her doctrine of woman's equality before the law. Her sons live to do her honor, her garden seeds have been planted, and she has proven to the world that this desolate plain can be made to blossom as the rose, and to-day she sits with us at the age of seventy-seven a free citizen equal with her sons."

The following is written on a blank leaf of the Bible of one of our workers:

"Wm. Taylor, Bishop of Africa, 67 years old, 46 years in the ministry, 6 ft. high, lifts 760 pounds at 59, not laid up with sickness for 54 years, except a few days with measles, 44 years ago. July 21, 1888."

A good record for any man, and he could truthfully have added, "has never tasted liquor or tobacco."

Prof. C. C. Cochran, who reads character in penmanship, analyzed a specimen of Miss Willard's writing, with no more knowledge of its author than was given by the fact that it was labeled "No. 5." Here is his characterization: "One cannot inspect the writing of No. 5 without seeing in his mental vision a minister of the caliber of David Swing, Dr. Thomas, Rev. Mr. McPherson, Dr. Barrows and others. The style is purely literary, with lines and curves suggestive of benevolence, sublimity, conscientiousness, truth, candor, originality, eloquence, logic, language, taste, enthusiasm. An individual of sterling character and clever parts, who would make a great success in literature or science. But his aspirations, talents and taste would incline him to the ministry. He would be too conscientious for an average lawyer, but would make a good one of the Abraham Lincoln style. If the author of this specimen is a minister or lecturer, his teachings or writings would show an earnest desire to benefit his fellows and lead them gently in the 'way, the truth and the life.'"

In the last Lend a Hand, Ramabai gives an interesting report of the first year of her work. No one can read it without heart-throbs of pity for the poor child-widows, and of thanksgiving that even a few of them are rescued from their terrible fate by the heroic little woman who is devoting her life to them. The report shows some of the many obstacles in her way. An educated prince came to the school one day, not to see it, he proudly averred, but to give Ramabai a good scolding for teaching widows. "A school for widows!" he exclaimed contemptuously. "Of what use is it, and what right have the widows to wish for happiness and education? Those who have neither a husband nor a son to care for are of no more value than street dogs and crows." Hindu scorn could go no further, for these are the most unholy animals. Another man, whose daughter was almost persuaded to send her daughter, a little widow fourteen years old, to the school, proudly declared that she should not go to a Christian woman to be taught Christianity, defile his caste and spoil his reputation. To prevent this he sold the poor child to lead an immoral life, and no one could redeem her from it.

WORLD'S W. C. T. U.

CANADA.

Compton county convention was held in Sawyerville, June 25, and this, the sixth annual convention, was the most successful yet held. Mrs. S. J. Craig, county president, presided with much ability and tact over the proceedings of the day and evening. Mrs. E. Middleton, honorary president for the Province of Quebec, and Mrs. M. A. Sanderson, provincial president, were present and gave counsel and advice when needed. Mr. John A. Nicholls was present during the day and was the speaker of the evening. Devotional exercises were conducted by Mrs. Maddocks and Mrs. Betts. Reverends Goffin, Staples, Skinner, Baker, Adams and Jones, gave us brotherly assistance in making the convention a success.

Mrs. W. B. Williams gave a cordial greeting, to which Miss Dennis responded. Mrs. Middleton conducted the memorial service, three of our dear sisters having gone home during the year. Papers on social purity and Y work were given by Mrs. E. W. Parker and Miss Cass.

A report of the Dominion Convention, recently held in Montreal, was given by Mrs. Cleveland. Resolutions touching on Sabbath observance, social purity, scientific instruction, evangelistic work, Demorest contests, woman's ballot, Loyal Legion text-books, and the receiving of only properly accredited temperance workers, were unanimously passed.

The plan of work recommended and adopted takes up the departments of evangelistic, literature, press, heredity, and hygiene, unfermented wine, flower mission, juvenile, and scientific instruction. The Woman's Journal, of Ottawa, was voted to be taken as our county organ; introduction of historical study into the regular work of the Y's; flower mission observance of Easter Sunday; petitioning local legislature to prohibit sale of tobacco to minors; circulating temperance literature among the French in their own language.

The final roll-call revealed the gratifying fact that the county officers and seventy-eight delegates were in attendance. Every year the general public give evidence of increasing interest in our work, the outside attendance, particularly of men, constantly growing larger. A large delegation of Royal Templars attended the evening meeting, and their S. C., Mr. Jos. Boyd, gave the convention hearty fraternal greetings; the county secretary responded briefly for the W. C. T. U.

Addresses by resident ministers, Mr. Nicholls, and a gold medal contest, in which nine silver medalists took part, filled up the evening program. Ethel Swail, aged twelve years, was the happy recipient of the medal. Mrs. Middleton presented the books given to the other competitors, her brief little speeches to each one making disappointment seem almost a thing to be desired. The officers elected were: President, Mrs. S. J. Craig; vice-president, Mrs. J. W. Bridgette; recording and corresponding secretary, Mrs. G. B. Cleveland; treasurer, Mrs. Geo. Skinner. Convention closed by singing, "God be With You" and the benediction. Collection sixteen dollars.

CALIFORNIA.

JOTTINGS.

The annual School of Methods, at Pacific Grove, was a grand success. As usual, the railroads generously granted reduced rates, and the attendance was large. Pacific Grove is the very paradise of American summer resorts, the climate rendering the weather all summer as cool as the Eastern May time. Golden sunshine keeps the flowers—and such radiant flowers—in constant bloom, while the swaying pines sing a perennial song of love to old Neptune, the god of the sea. "Prohibition does prohibit," for under the wise management of the Methodist Episcopal church the liquor traffic was "tattooed" at the beginning, and mothers feel safe to bring their children here.

When the National convention honors California with its presence, a special excursion will be run to Pacific Grove, and a visit will be made to Mrs. Henrietta Skelton's "home beside the sea," which her W. C. T. U. sisters are preparing for her.

The School of Methods was opened by a consecration meeting, led with fervor by Mrs. S. J. Churchill, our honored ex-president. Mrs. R. R. Johnston presided. The song of welcome by the Pacific Grove Temperance Legion—one of the best in the state—under the rare supervision of Mrs. Eva Heath, was beautiful. Mrs. Emily Hoppen gave a most interesting chalk talk. Miss Edith Reynolds, a tiny maiden, delivered a choice recitation. Mrs. Johnston made an opening speech full of inspiration and methods of practical work. Classes were then organized: Evangelistic, Mrs. S. J. Churchill; Hygiene and Heredity, Dr. Van Kirk; Franchise, Miss S. M. Severance. A parliamentary drill was given every afternoon, showing our women to be experts in Roberts' Rules of Order. Miss Fanny Ward, the well-known elocutionist, of Oakland, held her daily class in raptures over physical culture, a la Delsarte. Miss Darling ably assisted in voice culture.

The evening session was opened with devotional service, led by Mrs. A. B. Gove, an address of welcome by Mrs. Dr. Briggs, and response by our recording secretary, Mrs. N. E. Brown. "Childhood the Seedtime" was eloquently set forth by Rev. T. B. Stewart. "The Gospel Remedy," by Mrs. S. J. Churchill was a powerful plea that God's great panacea for sin be more thoroughly applied to all lives. Mrs. A. B. Gove well delineated Christ's power to save, by the blessed results of many converts being made in her work among the prisoners. "Systematic Study of the Bible" was an earnest pleading by Mrs. E. H. Burbank that our white-ribboners give the Scriptures patient and prayerful attention. "The Destruction that wasteth at Noon-day and the Responsibility of the Church," by Mrs. L. M. Carver, was an appeal to Christian voters to blot out the liquor traffic. The music, under the direction of Mesdames Launtz and King, was very beautiful.

One of the very finest papers of the conference was delivered by Mrs. Emily Hoppin on "The Claims of the Bible." "Society's Plague Spot" was a brave address on the social evil and its remedy by Dr. L. J. Kellogg. "Evangelistic Work the Nation's Need" was a masterly speech by our gifted National organizer, Mrs. L. M. Wells, of Tennessee. The question-box, conducted by another National worker, Mrs. J. C. Bateham, of Ohio, was most interesting, and her answer to the non-partisan question as to our attitude to political parties most unique: "Any party that puts in its platform a plank for prohibition puts in the W. C. T. U. women, for they stand upon that plank." Mrs. Bateham's address upon Sabbath Observance was a fine presentation of that important department.

The Oakland Temperance cadets, three companies strong, under the supervision of Mrs. S. C. Borland and Mrs. J. H. Mathews, roused the greatest enthusiasm. The Pacific Grove Temperance Legion tendered them and the entire convention an elegant banquet.

An entire day was given to Franchise. Mrs. S. J. Churchill gave a paper, "Woman as an Evangelist," pleading for the ballot because it will give woman greater power to work for Christ. Mrs. M. E. Congdon gave an excellent address on "Woman's Legal Status" and how it could be infinitely bettered by the ballot. Mrs. L. M. Wells ably presented the subject in a brilliant speech, "Something about Franchise." "What will She do with It?" was pertinently answered by Miss S. M. Severance. An appeal was made for the suffrage campaign of South Dakota and $33.10 immediately raised.

Among the most enjoyable features of the convention were the splendid poetical orations of A. J. Waterhouse, of Stockton, "Woman! Heaven Bless Her," and "Three Lives." A most delightful concert was given by the California University Glee Club, every number being encored. The reputation of the club will ere long become national.

"State and County Fairs" was practically considered by Mrs. J. B. Russell. Master Wilson Wythe told well the history of the Oakland Temperance cadets. "Our Toiling Sisters" was an admirable essay by Mrs. Emma Pow Smith. Her labors in the Tri county, San Joaquin, Contra Costa and Yuba counties have been abundantly blessed of God and resulted in many new unions and large accessions of membership. "The Body a Living Sacrifice," by Dr. Van Kirk, was a tender plea for consecration of the body. "The Temperance Outlook," by Rev. E. D. McCreary, was a magnificent oration as to the sure victory of prohibition. The day devoted to Sabbath Observance was made interesting by able speeches from Mrs. M. E. Congdon, Mrs. D. J. Spencer, Mrs. Mary Frank Browne, Mrs. R. R. Johnston and Rev. T. B. Stewart.

The crowning event of the session was the celebration of the seventieth birthday of Dr. R. H. McDonald. Congratulatory speeches, every one voicing gratitude for the many benefactions of the noted philanthropist, were made by Mrs. R. R. Johnston, Mrs. L. M. Wells, Mrs. Mary Frank Browne, Mrs. M. E. Congdon, Mrs. Spencer, Mrs. Davis, Miss Norton, Miss Ward, Mrs. Churchill, Dr. Briggs, Dr. Bentley, Dr. Sinex, Rev. T. B. Stewart, and Mr. Wythe. A birthday song composed by Mrs. Nellie B. Eyster, and sung by the four grandchildren, Master McDonald, Misses Mattie and Alice and Master Scott Spencer, under direction of their father and mother, Dr. and Mrs. J. C. Spencer, was specially beautiful. The Pacific Grove Temperance Legion fairly deluged the doctor with flowers. Dr. McDonald was deeply moved, and in a fine response gratefully thanked his legion of friends for the ovation. Hundreds of telegrams and letters were received. A reception was tendered Mrs. L. M. Wells, in the beautiful seaside home of Mrs. Page.

The evening devoted to the Y's was especially interesting. Mrs. D. J. Spencer made a fine address of welcome. Dr. Van Kirk presided. A resolution of Godspeed to Miss Jessie Ackerman was unanimously passed. An original poem was finely recited by Miss Emma Southerland. Miss Winnie Morris read an excellent paper. Miss Fannie Ward gave Harmonic Gymnastics, a series of beautiful poses, Mrs. Dr. Southard ably presiding at the piano.

The Lord's Day was full of excellent services. Morning sermon by Dr. Briggs; a splendid afternoon children's meeting, led by Mrs. L. M. Wells and others, and a crowded evening meeting, addressed most eloquently by Mrs. Wells, "Watchman, what of the night?"

The last day's program was a feast. "The Sailor Boys" were pleaded for by Mrs. Mary B. Edow; "Our Duty to Our Indian Neighbors," by Mrs. L. P. Williams; "Notes from the Field," by Mrs. Henrietta Skelton; "How shall we fill the Treasury?" by Mrs. M. C. Hart; "Is Alcoholic Medication Justifiable?" by Dr. Rebecca Hallowell, late of Philadelphia; "The Relation of Heredity to the Present Condition of Manhood," by Mrs. F. H. Bentley; "Practical Suggestions," by Mrs. W. H. H. Hamilton; "The Necessity of Scientific Temperance in Our Public Schools," by Mrs. D. J. Spencer; "Our Friends of the Press," by Mrs. C. E. Babb. The Pharos and its claims were ably presented by Mrs. Mary Frank Browne, its talented editor. "The Last of School," was a pathetic yet cheering address by our beloved teacher and president, Mrs. R. R. Johnston, to whom a special vote of thanks was rendered.

Thanks were tendered to the Southern Pacific railway, S. F. & N. P. R. R. and stage lines, for reduced fares, to Pacific Improvement Company, to the press and the Pacific Grove people.

All joined in singing, "God be with You till We Meet Again," and the School of Methods adjourned till 1891.

MICHIGAN.

ETCHINGS.

As a state to-day we sit in the shadow of our great loss in the death of General Fisk, and we are glad every week till the autumn comes to lay our floral tribute of love and affection beside his last resting place in our beloved state.

Our president is just home from Maine, where she spoke twenty-seven times in twenty-five days, attended conventions, giving Bible readings and being helpful every way; this week she goes to Illinois for three weeks' work.

The first district, Detroit, sends me a W. T. P. A. report by superintendent W. K. Willis, who has done a very successful work in keeping twenty-five pockets, located at depots, stores, street-car barns, casinos and factories well filled with choice, fresh literature. She makes an urgent plea for this work to enlighten the laboring classes on our side of the question.

Plymouth, the home of their district president, held their anniversary July 10, in the M. E. Church, one hundred in attendance. The exercises consisted of an address by the president, report of department work, and an original poem by a member, entitled "Somebody." Refreshments were served, and all agreed that the year's work had been a success.

At Kalamazoo, fourth district, through Mrs. Pengelly's planning, they had a temperance mass-meeting, July 4, in the park. "We had a first-class speech from a temperance Prohibitionist, the colored orator, Rev. D. A. Graham; had a good crowd, and we felt repaid for the work of preparation."

As I take up the next letter the unique envelope attracts me: "The King's Insurance Co., Cash Capital, the Unsearchable Riches of Christ. Assets, Real Estate, An inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away. Cash in Bank, Gold tried in the fire."

The letter is from Dutton, Kent county, and tells of a genuine W. C. T. U. Academy. About twenty boys and girls over twelve years old are educated there each year, a home for orphans; there are no solicitations for the school, only One above is asked for means. There are four courses of study: Teachers', preparatory, Bible training, and house-keeping course; political economy and parliamentary law are in every course of study; eating, drinking and dressing are all on the hygienic line. No corsets worn. The girls while at school dress plainly, and must be school-girls, not fashionable women. They have a Y society and an L. T. L. Lura A. Mains has charge of the school.

From Port Huron in the seventh district comes a report of the Fifth Ward Union. At their meetings they take up the lives of noted temperance workers, reading their biographies, and find much to interest and encourage, Father Mathew being the first. These meetings alternate with a song service and social purity meeting. The name of the union was changed at the last meeting to Mitts union, in honor of the president, Mrs. Geo. Mitts.

From Ithaca, eighth district, comes the following from Rev. Mr. Pettit: "Mrs. M. M. Weeks, our state chalk talker, gave a very interesting Sunday evening lecture, 'Two Life Paths,' illustrated." The writer adds: "Surely with her chart and her ability as a speaker she is doing a good work for temperance."

Our treasurer writes me up to date, "Thirteen unions have sent subscriptions for Nebraska, Petoskey sending the first amount, to which they have made an addition, making $25 in all."

Mrs. A. S. Benjamin goes to that state for work in September. She has been in New York recently for parliamentary drills, also to Ohio; has engagements in this state as far ahead as November.

Our state superintendent of physical culture, Miss L. J. Newcomb, is engaged for Lake Bluff and Bay View; she is also superintendent of juvenile work. They have chosen as their flower the pansy; and for their motto:

"Do to-day's duties;
Resist to-day's temptations."

PHILADELPHIA COUNTY CONVENTION.

Our sixth annual convention was held in the Fifth Baptist Church, June, 1890. The attendance was very good, considering the intense heat. The address of welcome, delivered by Miss A. M. Greene, of the First Y, was cordial, and was heartily responded to by Mrs. A. C. Peacock, of the Philadelphia union. The annual report of the secretary showed that the special features of the work during the year were as follows: Twenty-six departments in the county, of which three, those of mercy, peace and arbitration, and franchise, have been adopted during the year. Twenty unions report one hundred and thirty public meetings held, fifteen headquarters, parlors for boys, reading-rooms, etc., and expended $6,139.54. All the unions are in good condition, and laboring earnestly for the advancement of temperance, especially in the preventive departments. Monthly conferences have been held, at which the various departments of work were discussed and plans arranged for better work to be accomplished.

The state convention met with us last fall, and our unions, the smaller as well as the larger, gladly contributed time, labor and money toward its success. Two barrels of clothing and $36 were sent to the sufferers at Johnstown. The treasurer's report showed a goodly balance on hand. The reports from the departments showed efficient, faithful labor, the only difficulty being the diffidence exhibited by the local superintendents as to keeping a record of their work; for instance, in the literature department the report is 530,557 pages distributed and $145.99 expended, and the county superintendent believes that if this were doubled the number would not be exaggerated. The department of young woman's work reports the organization of two Y's, "The George Institute Y" and the "Thomas Potter Y," numbered respectively the Third and Seventh.

The president's address was full of enthusiasm for the work, words of encouragement for her co-laborers, and suggestions for advancement all along the line. Again the county showed their confidence in their tried and true leader, Dr. H. S. French, by unanimously reëlecting her as president.

The delegates to the National Convention are Dr. H. S. French, Mrs. H. H. Hubbert, Miss M. R. Young, with the following alternates: Miss A. M. Greene, Miss S. S. Sterrett, and Dr. C. M. Dodson.

The address by Rev. T. B. Neeley, D.D., on "Mysteries of Parliamentary Practice" was replete with instruction, and will undoubtedly bear fruit at our succeeding conventions. We also had the privilege of listening to Mrs. S. S. Fessenden on "The Responsibility of the Government for the Liquor Traffic." She captivated her audience by her womanly yet strong presentation of the subject.

FLOWER MISSION DAY AT NEW ORLEANS.

Our union desired me to tell you how Miss Jennie Casseday's birthday, June 9, was spent. The flower mission, assisted by the older members of the union, met at our rooms, 106 Camp street, quite early, and busied themselves in arranging bouquets of flowers, dividing the fruit, cakes and other delicacies provided by members and friends. They then separated into little companies, one going to the almshouse, another to the hospital, and a third to the parish prison. To each little gift was attached a floral card on which was a verse of Scripture. It would be impossible to describe the gratitude and appreciation of the recipients. As they were arranging the bouquets some said, "Oh! it is useless to take any flowers to the parish prison; for what do they care for such things?" But the gifts were accepted and pressed to their lips with the keenest sense of appreciation; for not a blade of grass is to be found within the prison walls. Only two white women were confined there. Sad to say, nearly all were young men and boys, and liquor had brought them all there. "How long, oh! Lord, how long!" Religious services were held at the prison; the ladies were treated with the greatest courtesy, and all the prisoners were assembled in the chapel, the exercises conducted by our local president, Mrs. J. J. Lyons. After prayer and singing of several hymns she spoke to them very seriously about their responsibility to God and the dreadful meeting at the judgment. They seemed deeply affected; not one was careless or indifferent, and as they were about to leave, she asked, "Is there anything you would like to say?" One young man said, "Will you all just sing, 'Shall we gather at the river?'" This request was complied with. And as all wended their way homeward, weary in body, they were satisfied that the day had been passed as she whose birthday was celebrated would have wished.

NEW HAVEN COUNTY CONVENTION.

Our semi-annual convention was held in Meriden, June 3. The convention met in White Ribbon Hall, the headquarters of the Meriden W. C. T. U. A devotional service was held at 9:30, and led by Mrs. Green, after which the county president, Mrs. Holmes, called the convention to order, and the roll-call was responded to by fifteen unions. The credential committee reported thirty-eight delegates and sixty-three visitors. The reports from the local unions gave evidence of growth, and increase of membership in the county. Miss M. Emma Landfear gave a very interesting report of the temperance work in South Africa where she has spent some time as a missionary.

Mrs. Forbes, our state president, gave a very helpful talk to us. The workers' conference was conducted by Mrs. Andrews, state secretary. "An hour with the Y's" was very enjoyable, and gave evidence of talents that are being brought out and used. A bountiful collation was served at noon, also after the afternoon session, in the dining room of the Hall. New Haven county W. C. T. U. has been invited to hold its annual meeting with the Wallingford union.

W. C. T. U. DAY AT CAMP-MEETING.

Saturday, July 12, was the day devoted to temperance by the Appleton district camp-meeting of the M. E. Church then in session at the Driving Park, West De Pere. The services were given up to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the fifth district. Mrs. S. M. I. Henry, National evangelist, was present and addressed the audience, and was listened to with marked attention.

The afternoon services the Sunday following were also conducted by the ladies. A large audience gathered to listen to Mrs. Henry, who held their attention for two hours.

The work of the two days cannot help doing good, as it has awakened a deep interest and already begins to bear fruit.

This is the first time the camp-meeting association has ever recognized the W. C. T. U., as an organization. The board of directors have offered to give it a place upon the program another year, and make it one of the leading features.

A GOOD PROGRAM.

Among the many interesting and instructive things of the Ottawa Chautauqua Assembly, the school of methods conducted by the state W. C. T. U. occupied a prominent place. The location of the W. C. T. U. headquarters was desirable and furnished a pleasant resort for all interested in the temperance work. The following is a list of the subjects presented:

"Physical Culture," by Miss Julia Leavans, of Chicago; "Scientific Instruction," Mrs. A. L. Slosson; "Organization," Mrs. Dora A. Evans; "Need of Temperance Teaching in the Sunday-school," Mrs. A. L. Slosson; "Work among Foreigners and Colored People," Mrs. L. B. Smith.

On Monday evening a temperance reunion and social was held where prohibition songs and short speeches from several ministers of the gospel added to the enjoyment of the hour. The subjects treated of the following days were as follows:

"Franchise," Prof. Carruth; "Mothers' Meetings," Mrs. Chase; "Work among Soldiers and Prisoners," Mrs. Chase; "Our Literature," Miss Bray.

Two evenings were given to the Y's, who held very interesting meetings addressed by Mesdames Rastall, Chase, Slosson, and Miss Bray.

Most of these meetings were well attended. The speakers without exception thoroughly understood their subjects, and all went away feeling that good had been accomplished and that it paid them to attend the Chautauqua Assembly and the W. C. T. U. school of methods.

HILLSBORO COUNTY CONVENTION.

This was held at Greenfield, June 26. The weather was fine, attendance good, and an interesting program was carried out. Mrs. M. W. Richardson, county president, presided in an able manner, assisted by the county secretary, Mrs. Jewett. After devotional exercises, and business, interesting and helpful reports were read from nearly every union in the county. Many branches of work are undertaken. Some are doing much good work through their reading rooms, and all are trying, more or less, to suppress vice in every form. Several unions remembered the G. A. R. on Memorial Day, by presenting each comrade with a bouquet, accompanied by a card on which was a Scripture text. An interesting paper was read by Mrs. Bowers, on "What Constitutes a Live, Efficient Local Union, and How Often is it best to Meet?" followed by thoughts from others. During the address on "Narcotics," Mrs. Jewett, state superintendent for this department, the audience reached the highest point of enthusiasm of the day. The words of King Solomon, "There is an evil which I have seen under the sun, and it is common among men," were forcibly applied to the tobacco habit.

A very interesting and encouraging report of the "Mercy Home," at Manchester, was given by Mrs. Chase. Having a worthy superintendent and matron, much good work is being done for the inmates. Depending mainly on gifts for the support of this Home, three needs were stated, viz., a cow, an oil stove, and cloth. An interesting feature of the afternoon's exercises was the children's hour. They were addressed by Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Richardson, and with songs and recitations by the children; all the exercises were listened to with pleasure. Mrs. Knox, state president, was unable to be present on account of illness, and to give the evening address, but the time was well occupied. The officers of the past year were reëlected, with the addition of an assistant secretary. President, Mrs. M. W. Richardson; secretary, Mrs. E. K. Jewett; assistant secretary, Miss Wheeler; treasurer, Mrs. M. A. Chase. Much credit was due the Greenfield union for their beautiful floral decorations, and open-hearted hospitality.

JEFFERSON COUNTY CONVENTION.

The W. C. T. U. met in convention at the First Baptist Church, Watertown, June 5 and 6. The church was decorated with beautiful flowers and mottoes; "Save the Boys," "No License for Sin," and others equally appropriate. The meeting was opened by the president, Mrs. E. L. Wood. The attendance of delegates was not large, but all were workers, with zeal and earnestness. A good program was carried out, and the routine work of the convention went on harmoniously. Devotional services preceded every session. Lunches were served in the church parlors during the convention. The reports from local unions show growth and enthusiasm, two unions having been added during the year, making in all nineteen unions; thirteen departments of work are carried on in the county. Mrs. Nellie Fish, recording secretary has died during the year. Rev. J. F. Nichols, rector of Grace Episcopal Church, gave the pastor's welcome in a happy manner.

Our president's address, given the first evening, was earnest and strong. The solos sung during the evening added much to our pleasure.

The convention was invited to the gardens and conservatories of W. W. Green, and the white-ribboners, in a body, visited this lovely place on the morning of the second day. Reports were read later from superintendents of departments. Wholesouled, hearty resolutions were passed, showing our motto to be "Onward and Upward," with no backward steps. A telegram was sent to the St. Lawrence county W. C. T. U. convention, in session at Gouverneur, and one was received by us from them. Resolutions in memory of Mrs. Nellie Fish were read. Papers were read by several superintendents on their department work. Much interest was shown in the department represented by Mrs. J. L. Tracy, superintendent of scientific instruction, also that of young women's work by Miss Frances Barker, narcotics, by Mrs. H. G. Smith, and mothers' meetings, by Mrs. M. M. Rice. Mrs. E. A. Boole, our state corresponding secretary, was with us, and held a school of methods in the afternoon, and gave an address the evening of the second day. The question-box, conducted by Mrs. Boole, was an interesting and profitable feature of the exercises. The collection speech by a little girl of seven years was charmingly given. Mrs. Boole's address, delivered in her clear and pleasant manner, was able and instructive. A resolution was read giving thanks to all who had contributed to the success of the convention. The benediction was pronounced by the Rev. Mr. Maxfield, pastor of the church.

ANNA C. B. DEVENDORF, Cor. Sec.

W. C. T. U.

ONONDAGA COUNTY CONVENTION.

This was held in the Congregational Church at Elbridge, June 12 and 13. A large delegation was present. A generous and hospitable welcome was given them by the Elbridge union.

Much sorrow was felt and expressed that our beloved president, through bodily weakness, was unable to be present. Mrs. C. B. Miller, first vice-president, took the chair. The fifteen unions of the county were all represented except Jamesville. Mrs. A. D. S. Bates led all the devotional exercises in an impressive manner. The report of the treasurer, Mrs. H. C. Merriman, showed the finances to be in a flourishing condition. Mrs. M. D. Fergusen, the corresponding secretary, gave a model report.

Notably among the many interesting reports of the superintendents of department work were, soldiers and sailors, Mrs. Willis, fair work, Mrs. Fergusen, evangelistic work, Mrs. Stanton, and prison and jail work, Mrs. M. J. Vilas. Mrs. M. D. Fergusen was recommended as a member of the Onondaga County Agricultural Board. The report of the National delegate for Onondaga and Herkimer counties, Mrs. M. A. Bellinger, was read by the secretary, Mrs. Merriman.

The address Thursday evening was given by Mrs. S. A. Kenney, who in an able and scholarly manner, demonstrated to us from the history of the past, that the members of this organization were "workers together with God" for the redemption of humanity. Mrs. Rev. L. Wiseman gave a most magnificent speech on "The Great Problem."

Resolutions were passed pledging ourselves to coöperate with the state officers in their plans for state fair work; pledging our influence to encourage the enforcement of existing law for Sabbath observance, recognizing the approaching amendment campaign as an opportunity for educational effort, expressing sympathy with our president; and thanks to the Elbridge union for their bountiful entertainment; these were all passed unanimously, while one that seemed especially important at this time, a resolution asking that a department of franchise be added to our county work, was tabled in committee after an excited discussion, and in open convention, when the reading of this resolution was called for, it was again tabled, out of deference to the will of the opposing small minority.

The officers elected for the coming year are as follows: Miss S. T. Wilkinson, president; Mrs. C. B. Miller, first vice-president; Mrs. F. K. Wright, second vice-president; Mrs. M. D. Fergusen, corresponding secretary; Mrs. H. C. Merriman, recording secretary; Mrs. S. C. Stillman, treasurer.

REC. SEC.

MONROE COUNTY CONVENTION.

This was held June 5 and 6, at Honeoye Falls, a village located in the extreme southeastern corner of the county, and was in no way an exception to the uniformly successful meetings of our organization. The Methodist Church was tastefully decorated, and the generous hospitality of the people anticipated and supplied every want of the one hundred or more delegates and visitors assembled. The place of our president, Mrs. J. S. Griffith, who was unavoidably detained, was ably filled by the first vice-president, Mrs. L. A. Parish.

Nearly all the lines of work taken up by the county union since its organization, in 1879, were ably presented; fair work, Sabbath observance and press work receiving especial attention.

The claims of THE UNION SIGNAL and of the state paper, Woman's Temperance Work, were not overlooked, and the reports of some of the local unions showed a large increase in the circulation of these publications. A weekly paper published during the past three months by Mrs. H. R. Edgett and daughter, of Fairport, was adopted as the organ of the county union. Mrs. Edgett is a veteran temperance worker of this county union, was for six years its corresponding secretary, and now holds the position of state superintendent of fair work. Frequent reference was made to the prohibitory amendment which has been submitted to the people of our state by the last legislature, and which it is expected will be presented for the suffrages of voters on the first Tuesday of April, 1891.

The following resolution, unanimously adopted, shows the spirit with which the women of Monroe county are entering upon this, to them, new work:

Resolved, That in view of the impending conflict with the liquor traffic, in the election to secure a prohibitory amendment to our state Constitution, we accept the added responsibility, and give ourselves heartily to such effort as the exigencies of the work may demand, and that we will encourage our brothers in every possible way, as they strive for this glorious achievement.

Resolved, That members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union should avail themselves of the privilege of school suffrage, to the end that only persons of known competency and temperance principles be put in charge of the public schools.

The resolution which elicited most hearty expressions of approval from the convention was the following:

Resolved, That we express to the world our allegiance to the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and that as our National President, Miss Willard, is a native of Monroe county, we desire especially to assure her of our sisterly affection and loyalty.

This county has now forty unions, including Y's, and has nearly fourteen hundred paid members.

Rev. Annis F. Eastman, who was recently appointed to the pastorate of a Congregational Church in Canandaigua, gave a fine address Thursday evening, and conducted the devotional services of the convention Friday morning, June 6. A juvenile convention to be held in Rochester at an early date has been planned. It is expected that Mrs. Helen G. Rice will be present.

S. J. V.

WASHINGTON COUNTY.

The W. C. T. U. held its annual meeting in Salem on June 6 and 7. A sweet devotional spirit characterized every session which was voiced in the response of Mrs. J. M. Ransom to the gracious and graceful welcome given by Mrs. Lizzie M. Fraser. Mrs. Ransom very happily compared our coming to Salem to God's people coming up to Jerusalem, auguring a benediction on the former as was true of the latter.

Reports of officers and superintendents were encouraging and stirring appeals were made on all lines of work taken up by the county union, now fourteen. Eight National and state lecturers have been employed by the various unions during the year. The work at county fairs is financially and morally hopeful.

The address of the president, Mrs. M. W. Tefft, was of special merit and honored the occasion as well as the woman who created it. A workers' conference conducted by Mrs. M. E. Allen, and a question-box, in charge of Mrs. H. R. T. Warren, were two features of peculiar interest and profit. The pastors of the various churches in the town gave a cordial welcome to the convention at the opening of the evening session. This was followed by an address rarely equaled in our county, by Mrs. Mary Woodbridge, of Ohio, who held her audience for an hour, while she logically, eloquently, sometimes pathetically set forth facts and principles vital to the temperance work. Grand in her power to speak, womanly and sisterly in her power to feel, she has even more strongly insured the loyalty of these women to the National. An impressive memorial service closed the most helpful and inspiring convention in our history.

SECRETARY.

MICHIGAN.

FISK MEMORIAL SERVICE AT ALBION.

Our whole Nation mourns for its fallen hero, but beloved as he was by all, Michigan claims him as her own, as the formative period of his life—his childhood and boyhood—was spent within her borders.

No place in Michigan holds him more dear, or more sincerely reveres his memory than our little city of Albion, where he came when only fifteen years of age, homeless and almost penniless, to acquire the knowledge which his hungry soul craved. While here he gained more than earthly wisdom, he found the "pearl of great price." He counted the cost, and began that noble Christian life whose stainless record is so well known.

The Albion W. C. T. U. set apart Sabbath evening, July 21, for a solemn memorial service. Loving hands decorated the M. E. Church in remembrance of him whose early life was spent among us, and whose cheerful presence was always so welcome in Albion Assemblies. A faithful portrait of the deceased, draped in black, stood mounted at the left of the platform. Leaning against the portrait was the emblem of his country. At the right were arranged beautiful floral tributes, intertwined with the badge of the W. C. T. U., whose cause he so warmly espoused. In the center were lovely designs of white flowers, upon one of which was traced the word "Fisk," upon another the appropriate word, "promoted." Around all of these was draped the flag he loved so well.

The pastor, Rev. J. C. Floyd, presided and made the opening remarks relating to his childhood, youth and early manhood, after which Rev. B. S. Taylor spoke of him as a citizen and Christian soldier.

Upon no one in Albion did the news of his death fall more heavily than on Mrs. Chairman Dickie, with whose husband Clinton B. Fisk had been so intimately associated in the work so dear to the hearts of both, and she was chosen to speak of him in his relation to the temperance work. She spoke feelingly and effectively of this brother, so dear to all white-ribboners, whose cause he always championed; his earnest devotion to his convictions of right in the midst of opposition, and of the great struggle through which he passed before deciding to undertake the leadership of his adopted party; of his fidelity to every trust, public or private, also of his beautiful home life as a Christian husband and father. Truly those who knew him best most deeply feel his worth and most deeply deplore their loss. Elder Wightman spoke of his great interest in Sunday-school and educational work as well as in all beneficent and reformatory measures.

Rev. Washington Gardner dwelt on his life as a Christian, showing his love to God and humanity to be the motive power of his whole life, by which he achieved the grandest success in all his efforts to ameliorate the world. All united to do him honor, and went away feeling that it was "good to go to the house of mourning."

ELLA T. AVANN.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

THE W. C. T. U. of Lake City, Minn., has been reorganized, with Mrs. John G. Woolley, as its president.

THE W. C. T. U., of Chester county, Pa., are now in encampment on the historic grounds of Valley Forge, to continue till August 9. Prominent speakers address the day and evening meetings, and a School of Methods is held during the sessions. The County Quarterly Convention was held July 31st.

MRS. S. M. PERKINS, of Ohio, gave a lecture in Green Island, Albany county, N. Y., June 29, and at the conclusion of the address, four young ladies passed through the audience with papers and pencils, and secured thirty new members to the union. This doubled their number and rejoiced the hearts of the workers. The M. E. pastor was most helpful, and made an earnest plea for the cause.

THE fourth annual prohibition camp-meeting at Glyndon, Maryland, opened July 18, and was most successful. Among those on the program were Ex-Gov. St. John, Walter Thomas Mills, Rev. Wm. H. Boole, Helen M. Gougar, Rollo Kirk Bryan, Dr. Anna Shaw, the Silver Lake and Walter Harman quartettes. July 29th was W. C. T. U. day, and July 30 the date of the annual convention of the Prohibition Party of Maryland.

THE series of meetings arranged for the Lakeside, O., Assembly opened July 19 with a Bible reading, by Mrs. W. A. Ingham, upon "The Prophet Daniel as a Temperance Man—and his Methods of Work." The exercises were participated in by ladies from Michigan and Ohio. Among the latter were Miss Jessie Morgan, state superintendent of young women's work, and Mrs. H. B. Wisner, superintendent of juvenile organizations for Ohio. Mrs. J. T. Foote read a letter from Miss Jennie Casseday.

A MOST impressive memorial service for Gen. Fisk was held at Seward, Neb., under the auspices of the W. C. T. U., Sabbath, July 21, Mrs. C. M. Woodward giving the principal address.

SINCE September 1, 1889, Miss Vandelia Varnum has given 321 addresses; held thirty parlor meetings; organized eight unions and five Y's; attended five county conventions and the National convention at Chicago; had the "Grippe" twice; was lame four months from a sprained ankle, and on crutches three weeks.

THE Berrien county, Mich., W. C. T. U. held a very interesting and profitable convention at Berrien Springs, June 24 and 25. Owing to the excessive heat the attendance was not as large as expected. Delegates were present from seven unions. The president reports five new unions organized during the year. One Loyal Temperance Legion reports seventy-four members. Tuesday evening after devotional exercises, Mrs. Brown read a paper of worth and interest, which was followed by short speeches and a recitation. Wednesday evening an address was given by Rev. J. W. H. Carlisle, of St. Joseph, the whole program being interspersed with appropriate music. This is the third annual county convention.

THE union of West Haven, Conn., mourns the loss of a dear and valued member, Mrs. Salome Tuttle, who passed away July 14. "Her work, prayers and open hand, ever ready to assist the drunkard's family, will be sorely missed."

THE W. C. T. U. convention of Fillmore county, Minn., met May 13 and 14, with about thirty officers and accredited delegates representing six local unions, Mrs. Frank Farmer in the chair. Good reports were given, and two papers were read, one on "Life Membership," by Mrs. E. A. Sykes, and one on "Individual Effort," by Mrs. F. E. Selby. Mrs. Marion B. Baxter gave an excellent address. The address of welcome was given by Mrs. Terwilliger, and the response by Mrs. S. M. Fletcher. Essays were read by Mrs. J. L. Tagland and Mrs. R. A. Clark. The church was tastefully decorated, and the exercises were all full of interest.

REPORTS have come from the following Demorest medal contests, since the last record was given in THE UNION SIGNAL: At Englewood, Ill., date not given, successful contestant, Elma Weed; Woodhull, Ill., three contests in the spring, the winners being Loren Newton, Verne Huey and Mary Chamberlain; Olney, Ill., May 10, name of successful contestant not given; Reynoldsburg, Ohio, May 24, Oliver Wright; Hillsdale, Mich., May 31, Aura Wager; Cassopolis, Mich., June 23, Maude McIlvain; Trumbull county, Ohio, June 30, Byron Spencer (this county now has three gold and thirty-four silver medals); Nile, New York, July 2, Freddie Whitford; De Kalb, Ill., July 10, Helen Duffy. One hundred and twenty-five contests have been held in Pennsylvania since last October, with crowded houses. One contestant remarked to THE UNION SIGNAL correspondent: "I gave my recitation eight times after I received the medal. At the Sunday Breakfast Association in Philadelphia seventeen men signed the pledge after I had given it. I want to do all the good I can in this way."

Official Communications.

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS DEPARTMENT.

Dear Superintendents:

As the time is not far distant when reports of work for soldiers and sailors in your states will be in order, and as it is very desirable that the National superintendent shall gather up in one sheaf the various bundles which each helper, near and far, has collected during the year, I make my request to you in good time. For two or three years past I have not prepared any formula of questions with blanks, believing you could do this best for yourselves, aided by my circular letter, containing suggestions and recommendations, which was mailed to you early in January, 1890. If any of you want another copy, it can be had by addressing me.

Another object I have in addressing you now is to request that each state superintendent shall at once prepare a petition to circulate at summer encampments for signatures, asking your state legislature to remove and prohibit saloons within one mile of any military fort, camp or home within your boundaries. I have the assurance that such a petition will be received favorably by officers everywhere, that and many of the national and state guards at the summer encampments would also sign. You will readily appreciate the advantage of using such an opportunity

Yours in this labor of love,

SARAH A. MCCLEES, Nat. Supt.

East Orange, N. J.

STATE AND COUNTY FAIRS.

This department needs real practical work, and practical women must take the lead to make it successful. So many letters have piled up on my desk asking questions about how to proceed, that I will condense them into one and answer for the benefit of all. We know that the aim of this department is to educate the masses that attend these festivals up to a high standard of temperance and morality. There is any quantity of literature given out, from the beautifully bound and illustrated book concerning farm machinery to the smaller, but just as pretty, about the sewing machines. The children gather them as souvenirs. This is a hint to make ours attractive. A pretty card for the boy, a fan tied with a white ribbon, with an appropriate motto of our work pasted on, a package of leaflets, bound with a strip of bright paper, or a nicely folded newspaper for the adults. There is much to be gained by properly presenting it. Have the lady or gentleman who distributes make the receivers feel they are conferring a favor by accepting the article. Who knows, save He who knows all, how much influence these may have in the homes? The expense of the outlay for literature must be met by sales. To this end, if a building is not available, pitch a large tent, decorate it with banners, bunting and garlands. Have our name and motto conspicuous, as well as our national colors on the center pole. Serve light refreshments, cakes, fruits, ice-cream, etc. Have moderate priced fancy and useful articles on sale, or whatever may suggest itself to the many fruitful minds. Every local union should be interested and send their donations and assistant. I do feel that this is a very important work. There is so much intemperance in and about these gatherings, that if we can only influence a few it should incite us to work more zealously. Think of the thousands who attend these places. In Pennsylvania alone there are over ninety fairs announced to be held between August 18 and October 20 this year. Let us do our full duty, my sisters, and let 1890 record the fairest of all the years in this department.

MARY I. STILLE,

Sec. Dept. State and County Fairs.
